THE UNTIMELY JEST.

A College Reminiscence.

BY MRS. EMMA C. EMBURY.

EVERY one has heard of Princeton, the abode of the most abused and insulted alma mater that ever attempted to restrain the wild sallies of youth. Fifty years ago Princeton was as much distinguished for its belles as for its rebels. The students were not forbidden a proper degree of intimacy with the young females of the neighbouring families, and many a mad prank, which ended in the discomfiture of the grave professors of the college, originated in the merry malice of these fair daughters of Eve. I was at that time at the head of the senior class. A laughing eye, a light heart, a great passion for beauty, and a wonderful liking for fun, were my sole recommendations to the favour of the ladies; but I soon found these sufficient. At all the tea-parties, quilting-frolics, apple-peelings, &c. my presence was deemed indispensable; and as I flirted with all without making love to any, I soon became a universal favourite. By the way, let me recommend such a course to all young gentlemen who wish to shine in the light of female favour. A particular partiality for one implies a degree of inferiority in the other members of the coterie; but when each can claim a portion of attention, all are flattered and all gratified. This piece of information is somewhat too valuable to be given gratuitously; however, let it pass.

How it happened that such a giddy and volatile fellow as myself should ever have become the friend of the serious and intellectual Mordaunt Ormesby, I could never exactly understand. He had been a pupil in the college, and after completing the prescribed course of study, had entered the theological seminary with the intention of devoting himself to the gospel ministry. For this vocation he seemed peculiarly fitted, both by nature and education. His expressive countenance, his soft dark eyes, his cheerful yet dignified manners, and above all his voice, low, rich, and clear as the tones of a flute, all seemed to mark him out as one worthy to be an apostle of the cross. There was one peculiarity in his character, which may perhaps explain the mystery of his regard for me. This was an extreme timidity, amounting almost to nervousness. He had a morbid fear of ridicule, which frequently exposed him to the very evil he sought to avoid, and probably it was the frank and fearless confidence of my manners which first attracted him towards me, and afterwards rendered me a necessary support to him.

Every body wondered at Mordaunt's choice of a friend, still more did they wonder at his choice of a mistress. When it was first known that he was the accepted lover of Cecilia Davenant, the quantity of gossip which issued from the rosy lips of the Princeton belles was absolutely terrifying. To be sure Cecilia was pretty and good-natured, but then she hated the very sight of a book; she was as fickle as the wind, and "so fond of frolic, that she would rather lose a friend than spoil a joke." Such were the remarks most volubly poured into our ears by the fair scandalizers, (I beg their pardon, but we all know that ladies are always scandalizers in a moderate way.) Cecilia Davenant was certainly the loveliest little romp that ever witched away the sober senses of man. I recollect perfectly well the circumstances under which Mordaunt and myself first beheld her. We had long been intimate in the family of Mr. Wilson, and had frequently heard his daughter, the gentle Mary, speak of her orphan cousin, the rich Carolina heiress. At length we were told she was coming to spend some time in Princeton, and the belles were all in fearful anticipation of a formidable rival. Late one afternoon as Mordaunt and myself were sauntering along the path which led to Mr. Wilson's house, we heard in an adjacent field loud bursts of laughter, occasionally interrupted by the barking of a dog, and the merry cries of a child. Though the field was concealed from the road by a thick hedge, we succeeded in finding an opening after some difficulty, and beheld a singular and amusing spectacle. Seated on the grass was a beautiful child, whom we instantly recognised to be Mr. Wilson's youngest boy, and beside him a young female, busily employed in adorning a large Newfoundland dog with a straw hat and rich scarf, of which she had evidently just despoiled her own pretty person. When she had finished she started up, and running several times round the field, with a swiftness which completely baffled the pursuit of the dog, encumbered as he was with his unwonted trappings, threw herself on the grass, and laying her head on the child's lap, indulged in an immoderate fit of laughter. I never saw such picturesque beauty as she then displayed. The perfect symmetry of her form, as she lay extended on the grass, with her little feet carelessly folded over each other, the bright eye and flushed cheek, of which we obtained casual glimpses as the wind lifted her clustering curls, were exquisitely lovely. When, a few hours after, we were introduced by Mary Wilson to "my cousin, Miss Davenant," we had no difficulty in recognising the pretty romp, notwithstanding the smoothly combed locks and demure countenance which she then exhibited.

I never could see the use of making a long story out of a short one. We all know what stupid people lovers are, (to all but each other, I mean,) and the manner in which love affairs are conducted, has always been the same from the time of the deluge. My story only differs in its dénouement. Mordaunt had been the acknowledged lover of Cecilia for some months, and their union was only deferred until he should have taken orders. His fortune was considerable, and hers was very great, so that pecuniary considerations were of no weight with them. One evening I accidentally overheard a conversation between them, which gave me some painful doubts as to their future happiness. They had just returned from a walk, and as they seated themselves on the piazza, near the window where I was reading, Cecilia exclaimed, in a half petulant tone,

"Really, Mordaunt, you have grown so stupid and dull lately that you are absolutely tiresome—what on earth is the matter with you?"

"Tiresome," returned he, in a tone of melancholy sweetness, which thrilled my very heart, "tiresome even to you, Cecilia?"

"Oh! well I didn't mean tiresome exactly; but what is the reason that you are always so dull? I wish you loved mirth as well as I do."

"I am sorry you even indulge such a wish as that," said he, gravely, "as you well know it is one which never can be gratifying. I love to see you gay, but certainly never expect to possess such a frolicsome spirit myself."

"I declare, I am absolutely afraid to talk to you, you take every thing so seriously," returned she. "I once heard you called 'the knight of the rueful countenance,' and I really believe you deserve the title."

This was touching Mordaunt in the tenderest point. His dread of ridicule rendered him tremblingly alive to such a remark.

"Pray who was witty enough to bestow such an appellation upon me?" inquired he in a tone of pique.

"There," said she laughing, "didn't I tell you that you took every thing too seriously; now you are vexed about that harmless jest?"

"Will you be so kind as to inform me the name of the person?" asked he, in the same tone of vexation.

"Oh, I forget," answered the heedless girl. "Ned Willoughby, I believe."

I was about to start forward and repel the false accusation when Mordaunt replied,

"No, Cecilia, that I cannot credit; whoever it might be, I know it was not Edward. He has too much regard for me to wound my feelings by unmerited ridicule. I can easily believe that woman's affections are governed by caprice, but with man's nature I am better acquainted. You may be amused by a senseless jest even when I am the subject of it; but Edward Willoughby would never heap ridicule upon his friend."

He spoke this in a tone of the deepest mortification, but she only laughed still more heartily, and asked him if he was practising a homily! He rose hastily.

"Cecilia," said he, "I am not just now in the humour for merriment. If you will trouble yourself to recollect that on the coming sabbath I am to preach my first sermon you will probably understand the reason of my gravity. Allow me also to remind you that you have in your possession a manuscript which I wish to make use of on that occasion. As you have probably been too much occupied to peruse it, will you be kind enough to return it to me?"

"Oh, I cannot go for it now," said she carelessly. "I suppose it will be time enough to-morrow. I dare say you know it by heart already."

"I know somewhat too much by heart," muttered he. "I will send for it to-morrow." And before she could reply, he bade her good day and departed.

As soon as he was out of sight I issued from my retreat.

"For heaven's sake, Cecilia," said I, "take care what you are doing. I have overheard all your conversation; and, believe me, you are trifling with Mordaunt in a manner which you will repent."

She burst into an immoderate fit of laughter.

"Why, really, sir, I thank you for your advice, but I have seen him in such a humour fifty times. He will come to-morrow and beg my pardon for his ill-humour. I will pout for a little while and then forgive him, and we shall be as good friends as ever."

In vain I remonstrated with her. The thoughtless girl had too often seen the power of her charms to doubt it now, and I left her with a painful presentiment of evil upon my mind.

The next day was Saturday, and Mordaunt, who was deeply impressed with the importance of the task he had undertaken, shut himself up in his room, and begged I would not interrupt him.

"Shall we go to Mr. Wilson's this evening?" said I.

"No," replied he hastily; "Cecilia's gaiety is too oppressive sometimes. I have reflected upon the duty which I have to perform to-morrow, until I am unfit even for your society. My feelings are certainly not in unison with her light and cheerful spirit."

In the evening I was admitted to his apartment and found him despatching a note to Cecilia, requesting the return of his manuscript. The messenger was delayed a long time and finally returned without it, saying, "Miss Davenant was engaged with company, but would send the manuscript in the morning." Mordaunt bit his lip, and the flash of anger passed over his pale cheek as he dismissed the servant.

"Edward," said he, "I sometimes do not know what to think of Cecilia. She is so incorrigibly volatile that I frequently fancy we can never be happy together. Last week I gave her the sermon which I intend preaching to-morrow, with a request that she would read it, and give me her opinion of it. Perhaps I asked too much from a gay and giddy girl; but she might at least have tried to comply with my wishes. I have in vain endeavoured to obtain possession of it since, and I dare not trust myself in the pulpit without it; for although I am perfectly familiar with every line, yet I know that my self-possession will fail me when I am compelled to address a large audience."

I saw that Mordaunt's feelings were deeply wounded, and I in vain endeavoured to soothe them. Though it was rather late, I went to Mr. Wilson's house in the hope of getting the manuscript, but Miss Davenant had retired to her apartment, and returned unsuccessful.

The next morning, as soon as I thought Mordaunt would admit me, I sought his chamber. He was exceedingly pale, and I could easily discover that he was very much excited. About an hour before church-service commenced, the manuscript arrived. Mordaunt opened it, and after reading the first few pages, said,

"I have not time to overlook it now. I believe I may trust my memory."

We went to the church together. An unusually large audience was assembled; and, seated in the front pew directly below the pulpit, was the gaily attired and beautiful Cecilia. Mordaunt read the psalm in a low sweet voice, which, like the air, rather felt than heard, seemed to pervade every part of the building. The prayer which followed was one of the most affecting appeals to heaven that ever issued from the lips of mortal. When it was finished he sat with his face bent down between his hands as if to recover strength for the more important task which now awaited him. At length he rose. His voice was extremely tremulous as he repeated the text which he had chosen, but in a few moments his self-possession seemed to return, and his manner, so calm, so dignified, and so impressive, gave new force to the truths which his eloquence had adorned. The attention of the audience was intently fixed upon the preacher as he proceeded to explain the disputed points of his subject, and he was gradually approaching that part of his discourse which is usually designated the practical application, when he suddenly paused. A deep silence and almost breathless attention denoted the interest of his hearers. Still the pause was unbroken. I looked at Mordaunt; his face was crimsoned with emotion. He appeared busily turning over the leaves of his manuscript as if in search of some connecting link which had been found wanting. His search seemed vain. His brow grew almost black with suppressed agitation. A slight titter began to be heard among the younger part of the audience. Mordaunt was still silent. At length a laugh was distinctly heard from the pew which Cecilia occupied. Mordaunt bent over the pulpit, and for a moment fixed a stern and wild gaze upon her. He in vain endeavoured to speak. The words seemed to rattle in his throat, but he could form no articulate sound. He sat down. The more serious part of the audience remained in mute amazement, while the laugh had become almost universal among the young people. After the lapse of several minutes Mordaunt again rose and, in a low and hurried voice, muttered something about the loss of a part of his sermon, and hastily apologizing to the audience, abruptly left the church. The confusion which followed can scarcely be conceived. I made my way to Cecilia as soon as possible. Her immoderate mirth convinced me that she knew more than any one else of the mystery. But I could get no information from her, and, disgusted at her heartlessness, I left her and hastened to Mordaunt. In vain I knocked at his door and implored to be admitted. He refused to allow me to see him. I could hear him pacing his apartment with steps which betrayed his agitation. But it was not until some hours had passed that I was allowed entrance. His face was dreadfully pale, his eyes blood-shot, and his whole appearance was that of a man just recovering from an attack of epilepsy. The mystery was soon explained. In the anticipation of a frolic Cecilia had cut out a leaf of the sermon. Taken completely by surprise, Mordaunt entirely lost his self-possession. In vain he endeavoured to regain the thread of his discourse. Overwhelmed by mortification and anguish (for he well knew that it could be ascribed to no hand but Cecilia's) he was unable to frame a connecting link for his ideas, and the consequence was utter humiliation.

After a long and agitating conversation between us he rose to seek Cecilia.

"Shall I accompany you?" said I.

"If you choose," was the reply; "but remember I must see her alone."

When we arrived at the house I took a seat on the piazza with Mary, while he, having requested a private interview with Miss Davenant, retired to the drawing-room.

What passed during the time they remained together I never heard. Mary and myself were completely engrossed in the discussion of the painful circumstance in which a thoughtless jest had placed both. I remarked with some surprise that Mary seemed much agitated, and spoke of her cousin with a degree of severity very foreign to her usual sweetness and gentleness. For a moment a suspicion that Mordaunt might have found a more congenial spirit in her crossed my mind, but the recollection of her uniform tranquillity during the progress of his love-affair with Cecilia, entirely destroyed the probability of it.

In a few minutes we heard a confused murmur from the room. The low and tremulous tones of Mordaunt's voice were distinctly heard, followed by the accents of deprecation and entreaty from the lips of Cecilia. By degrees the voices were raised. We heard Mordaunt utter these words:

"I have loved you as few men can love, as few women deserve to be loved; but in proportion to the strength of my affection, is now the force of my hatred. I know that christian charity would condemn me for this, but I cannot help it. You have humbled me to the very dust, trampled upon my feelings, ruined my prospects, and crushed my spirit beneath a weight of humiliation which never can be shaken off, and at this moment the poisonous adder is less loathsome to my sight than the vain and selfish being who could sacrifice her best affections to a senseless jest. Farewell."

In an instant he issued from the room, and hastening down the steps of the piazza, scarcely allowed me time to overtake him before he arrived at his own apartment. The next morning a note was handed me from Mordaunt, stating that he had quitted the country forever. I hastened to his lodgings, but he had left them at day-break, taking with him all his baggage, and none knew his destination. What were the feelings of Cecilia at this unforeseen event, I never knew. She loved Mordaunt as well as such a gossamer spirit could love, but she probably soon forgot his loss and her folly. She immediately left Princeton, and a few months after I heard of her marriage with a southern planter.

Fifteen years passed away, during which time, being deeply engaged in professional duties, I heard nothing of my early friends. One afternoon, conversing with a gentleman from England, the discourse turned upon the popular preachers of the day. He mentioned one who had for some years, he said, attracted the largest audience in London.

"One of our countrymen too," added he, "educated, I believe, at Princeton."

Feeling a vague sort of interest in his account, I asked the name of this popular preacher.

"His name is Ormesby."

Scarcely believing my own ears, I eagerly questioned him concerning his private history, and was told that he had taken up his abode in London about ten years since, had soon become very popular, had accepted a valuable living in the gift of a nobleman who was very much attached to him, and through whose means he had risen to the highest dignities of the church; that he had been married about five years to an American lady whom he had met with in London, and, finally, that he was living in great splendour, as much beloved for his virtues as honoured for his talents.

As I was upon the point of visiting England myself, I obtained Ormesby's address, and my first visit after my arrival in London was to him. He received me with the utmost affection, and introduced me with a smile to his wife, the identical Mary Wilson whom I had once known at Princeton. I learned from his own lips the particulars of his history. After he had been for some time established in London he accidentally encountered Mary Wilson, who, with her father, was travelling in search of that health which a hopeless love for Mordaunt had destroyed. He had by that time learned more of human nature, and he could not have long remained blind to Mary's partial regard. He offered his hand, and never had cause one moment to repent his generosity. Though not warmly attached to her when he married, her sweetness of temper and tenderness had won his most devoted affection, and they were now completely happy. I ventured to ask about Cecilia. He smiled sadly.

"She is a widow, the mother of two destitute children," said he. "Her husband squandered away her fortune, treated her with the utmost harshness, and finally died of intemperance, leaving her without a friend or a shilling in the world. She is now an inmate of my house. Mary sent for her as soon as she heard of her misfortunes, and for the last two years she and her children have been members of my family."

The next day I dined with him and saw Cecilia. Her sunken eye and pallid cheek told a melancholy tale. Her spirits were entirely gone, and when I contrasted the blooming appearance of the happy Mary with the faded and wretched countenance of her once brilliant cousin, I could not but feel that Cecilia had paid dearly for an untimely jest.

SHE SAW HER FLOWERS WITHER.

AIR—The Soldier's Tear.

SHE saw her flowers wither
And her fondest hopes decay,
And all their bright creations,
Like shadows pass away.
But she gazed on him, whose smiles
Like the summer's sun could cheer,
And thought to weep upon his breast,
Love's home of peace was there.

But she saw no more the smile
Of joy upon his brow;
And the breast, which oft had pillowed her,
No home of peace was now;
For cold the heart that beat within,
To its first love had grown,
And affection's smiles which cheered her once,
With hope's young dreams had flown.

There is no lustre in her eyes,
No bloom upon her cheek;
And yet she weeps not, though her sighs
The soul's despair bespeak.
She's fading like a summer plant,
Forever from the earth,
To dwell where sorrow ne'er exists,
Where angels have their birth.

FRENCH LITERATURE.

AN ENGLISHMAN ABROAD.

MR. MORRIS—The following sketch, which I have translated from "Le Courrier des Etats Unis," is a good-humoured caricature of that singular being—an Englishman abroad. It is good-humoured, for the French no longer look on their neighbours as their enemies, but as their friends and allies. As a proof of this I may mention, that lately at the theatre at Marseilles, when a "Pas Anglais" was to be danced, in ridicule of the proverbial awkwardness of a nation whose feet do certainly "hang too heavy on their hands," the spectators would not allow it to be concluded. TRIBULATIONS OF MILORD KITTLEPING,

ON HIS LATE ARRIVAL AT PARIS.

"Honi soit qui mal y pense."

To the stranger who was suddenly transported among us from London, St. Petersburg, Vienna, or Madrid, how astonishing a sight must the city of Paris have presented during the three "glorious days"! How could he at the first glance decipher the strange spectacle before him? How understand those crowds—that ocean, whose waves grew and swelled every moment? How could any one who had not read the infamous "ordinances" feel, think, and act with that people, so terrible in its anger, so noble in its humanity—that people which breathed only one feeling, one thought, one threat? It was enough to set him beside himself, and make him think he was mad or dreaming; just as when we enter in the midst of a ball, we stop our ears, and cannot conceive what sets so many limbs in motion at once. Such was the situation of Milord Kittleping on the twenty-ninth of July. The story of his tribulations, which are worth telling, we have from himself. Their ridiculousness is but exterior, beneath is philanthropy, sympathy for France, courage, and true love of liberty. Honour to those who are thus ridiculous!

The wandering spirit of the English is well known. They are generally so adventurous that one might suppose them descended from the wandering jew, of peripatetic memory; and besides, there is the fashion which requires every gentleman to visit Switzerland and Italy, once at least in his life, as the Mahometan religion orders every true believer to bow the knee once at least before the tomb of the prophet. Economy also imposes a term of exile on many of them. They are persuaded that they can ruin themselves cheaper in France than at home.

Milord Kittleping had, at the age of thirty-two, traversed the four quarters of the globe; he had eaten pine-apples in Brazil, had seen the interesting reptiles of Africa, had inhaled the fragrance of the roses of Bengal, had even sipped tea in Canton. This was something, but he had neither seen St. Peter's at Rome, nor the Cretins of the Alps, nor the pirouettes of our opera, consequently he was looked upon in the London saloons as only half a man. Anxious to earn the other half, he finally determined to set out on the fashionable pilgrimage. He embarked, disembarked, bought a post-chaise, filled it with provisions, stretched himself out at full length, closed the glasses, and went to sleep, in order to have a better view of the country, nor did he awake till he reached Paris. The horses stopped before the hotel. Milord, supposing himself at his journey's end, looks out. What does he see? An immense crowd surrounding the carriage, and calling to him to get out! Milord does not understand them, and remains motionless. "Oh! oh! he is obstinate—he won't get out! let us upset the carriage, and set it cross-ways in the street—it will do for a barricade for want of better." And they go to work accordingly. Milord, who understood the Burman language, the Arabic, the Turkish, the Syrian, and the Monomatan perfectly well, and who spoke Chinese as purely as M. Rémusat himself, unfortunately did not understand a word of French. Feeling himself overturned, he cries, swears, rages, but in vain; the carriage describes a quarter of a circle, and falls on its side. Luckily for Milord, his stock of provisions deadened his fall; his head struck in an excellent poté de foie gras, which adorned it like a light-horseman's cap. Thus qucerly equipped, but uninjured, he managed to creep out of the upper side of his post-chaise, as one would out of a chimney.

"Good heavens!" cried he, in English or in Monomatan, I am not sure which, "is this the way they receive strangers in France? To judge by this specimen, they must be a most original people."

In the meantime the mob surround him, and offer him their unintelligible condolences. But in such emergencies little time can be sacrificed to idle courtesy, they only ask him,

"Are you hurt?"

"No; silence is consent."

"He is not hurt."

"He is an Englishman."

"Long live the English! they are friends of liberty! they are at work with us every where. No doubt this one set off on purpose to lend us a hand; no doubt that's what he was saying just now. Come, give him a crow-bar, he'll help us to make our barricade."

"Long live the English!"

And with these words they put in his hands a long and heavy bar of iron. Milord, who doesn't know what all this means, at first refuses, and cries out, purple with rage,

"Good heavens! what an original people!"

But they make signs to him to tear up the pavement, and in spite of himself to work he goes, tearing up the pavement; tearing up indeed more than any one else, for he was in a glorious rage. His reflections, in the meantime, were most curious.

"Zounds," thought he, "what an original people! to treat strangers in this way! not even to give them time to get out of their carriage or to eat a beefsteak! To be sure, it's very well that every country should have its peculiar customs; it gives more variety to the human race; and I too am fond of original people, but really this is going a little too far."

When the barricade was finished, Milord wished to retreat.

"Another!"

"Huzza for another!" was the general cry, and Milord Kittling is carried in triumph to the other end of the street, amid shouts of

"The English for ever!"

Milord, who was but little flattered by proofs of gratitude and admiration he did not understand a word of, began to storm most terribly.

"What a devil of a people! I can't fathom them, and yet I have seen some very curious ones; I've seen Esquimaux, Monomatapans, and Hottentots, but never any thing equal to this. What fury possesses them to unpave their streets, and to make strangers work at it! Zounds! what an original people!"

What became of him when, after the second barricade was finished, a third was to be put up, then a fourth, then a fifth, then the sixth—no, the sixth was only proposed. Milord could bear it no longer; he had already raised his crow-bar, not to take up the pavement, but to establish a cordon sanitaire around himself, when a volley of musketry scattered the crowd, and left him once more his own master. He regained the street where his carriage was lying, entered the hotel, the address of which he had, and had only breath enough left to say,

"Give me some dinner, that is, if they dine at all in this accursed country. What a most original people!"

The host took occasion to explain to him what was going on. At each word, Milord's face varied its expression. His anger gave way to surprise, his surprise to enthusiasm.

"I understand, I understand!" says he, "it is all for liberty! Oh, what a great people! This is a sublime, and not an original people! I'm not hungry, I will assist them still farther."

He seizes his crow-bar again, rushes out, and with his head full of barricades, tears up the paving-stones, and piles them up before the door of the hotel. In vain does the owner try to restrain him, Milord grows warm, threatens to put him into the barricade himself, and in an instant the door is hermetically closed, so that there is no entering, except by the window. Thence he sets off, flying up and down the street, braving the musketry and grape, brandishing his crow-bar, and crying, "Long live the French! a great people! a sublime and not an original people!" and leaving mountains of stone behind him wherever he passes. One might compare him to the whirlwind, which gathers up the sand in heaps as it sweeps over the desert.

The tri-coloured flag was already waving on the mutilated front of the Louvre, the capital, like one shaking off a heavy burden, was making its last effort to cast out the fallen dynasty, and the barricades were useless, but Milord was still constructing new ones. In his noble enthusiasm for our regeneration he would have ended, I firmly believe, by unpaving his chamber and fortifying his bed, had he not met one of his countrymen, who like himself was fighting for our freedom, for the freedom of the world.

Milord Kittling learned from him that despotism was breathing its last. The cannon of the guard had rattled for the last time. The ball rang against the front of the Tuilleries, after which nothing, nothing, nothing but shouts of triumph!

"Long live liberty!" said the two fellow-countrymen, clasping each other's hand,

"Long live the French!"

"They are a great people," said the one.

"And not original," added the other.

And we—what shall we say to these brave Englishmen?—Thanks, gentlemen! you have fought for us—we owe you the same good turn!

As for Milord Kittling, once aroused from his habitual phlegm, he grew so fond of this busy life, that when there were no more barricades to make, he was at a loss for amusement, when luckily he heard of the disturbances at Brussels.

Three days afterwards he and his crow-bar were there. Thence, as he told me when he set out, he will go to Turin, from Turin to Milan, from Milan to Venice, from Venice to Rome, from Rome to Naples, from Naples to Madrid, from Madrid to Lisbon, from Lisbon to London, where his new talent may perhaps, sooner or later, find employment.

Glorious journey! may he accomplish it speedily! And all under a promise of returning among us, he and his crowbar, if, in the mean time—

UNWELCOME THOUGHTS.

BY ISIDORA.

Away, away! why come ye here
Unwelcome thoughts that darkly rise,
Like shapes embodied forth by fear,
Flitting before the slumberer's eyes!

Away! nor thus with visions dire
People my silent solitude,
To quench the spark of fancy's fire,
And e'en on reason's throne intrude.

Hours that were spent in ceaseless tears,
Days wrapt in melancholy gloom
Ye bring, with sadly boding fears,
A breaking heart, the silent tomb.

Ye whisper 'tis in vain to seek Friendship unsullied, truth sincere;
Ambition, time, or chance may break
The bonds that bind my spirit here.

Ye tell of generous trust betrayed,
Of glowing words, and callous heart,
Of guileless hopes in ruin laid,
And links of kindness torn apart.

In vain my soul invokes the aid
Of hope, the charm of memory woes;
Hope hides her troubled glance, afraid,
And memory for oblivion sues.

Oh! let your tyrant reign be o'er,
Ye thoughts that darkly thus intrude;
My heart can hope, or trust no more,
Then leave it to its solitude!

FINE ARTS.

MUSIC ON THE LAST PAGE.

THE task imposed upon us by our worthy friend, the editor of the New-York Mirror, in reviewing the music of the present number, is not of a trivial nature. Had the composition submitted to us, been a song, a duet, a trio, or any other species of music, concerted or otherwise, composed by a Mozart, a Haydn, or a Handel, we should have found no difficulty in giving an opinion, according to our humble ability, on its beauties or peculiarities; but a morceau from the opera of Der Freischutz, is a much more serious affair, and embraces a vast number of considerations. Indeed it cannot be scanned by a critical eye, except as a link of that wonderful chain of ideas which, collectively, renders Weber's works the "ultima thule" of dramatic perfection. In noticing the "Laughing Chorus," as published to-day, we are consequently compelled to enter into some detail. Most composers, whether of the Italian, English, German, or French schools, have chiefly attended to the object of setting the words of a given drama to music, according to the sentiment which such words convey, and many have been highly successful in the combination of poetry and music; nevertheless, among the best of them a lack of design may be found, and a want of perfect union between the musical and the dramatic plot: Weber has taken up ground hitherto unoccupied, and with perfect success; for he has selected a drama replete with imaginary creations and supernatural agency, directly operating on the feelings and actions of mankind, and forming a complete underplot of his music, he has expressed through that vehicle sentiments which not only go straight to our comprehension, but literally he has explained circumstances beyond the reach of language.

Boieldieu and Rossini are two of the best writers of the age, as regards musical consistency and arrangement of subject; but Weber has made his music so much a part of the drama, that he may be truly said to divide the poetry with the poet, while other composers are contented merely to embellish and add force to the muse. To prove this, even to moderately informed amateurs, is a matter of no difficulty. The piano forte arrangement of Der Freischutz ought to be found in the drawing-rooms of all people of taste, and we presume that it is to be found at least on the desks of those persons who crave after Italian music, unless such craving be merely "a babbling about green fields;" indeed all who raise the said cry ought to be well informed on music generally, or the cry becomes little less than folly. But to our business. The composition in question consists of a solo part and chorus, the former sung by Kilian, the latter by foresters and peasant girls. Kilian boasts of his triumph in having won the prize by shooting at a target, and defeating the best marksmen in the country. They laugh at Adolph's failure, and address Kilian in mock gratulation. Did the idea rest here, it would be easy to pronounce the chorus beautiful and well conceived, and after pointing out the remarkable features in the melody and harmony, our task would be over. But in this case, such a mode of proceeding would be highly unjust to the great author, for so closely has he entwined his music with the drama, that he has made the very subject of this chorus a prominent feature among the grand effects of the incantation scene. Zamiel, who is the chief cause and promoter of the events which occur throughout, is perceptible in every scene. The derision of the foresters at the triumph of Kilian, and the despair of Adolph, are all of Zamiel's kindling; and when the unfortunate forester, goaded by anguish at the probable loss of Linda, works himself up to the highest pitch of desperation, and ventures into the wolf's den at midnight to meet the villain Caspar for the sake of traffic with the fiend, the subject of this taunting chorus is again heard played softly by the band, evidently to impress upon the audience the agency of Zamiel in keeping alive the feelings under which Adolph is suffering, and to add nerve to his resolution: also in the same scene, the wild snatches of melody played by an octave flute, from Caspar's drinking song, by which he excites Adolph and plies him with wine, are repeated—and it is impossible not to be strongly impressed with the certainty that the recurrence to those passages alludes to the instrumentality of the fiend in Adolph's failure, and to his temptation by Caspar. In short, it is a glorious description of the ironical sporting of demons with the vices and weaknesses of mankind. Can ideality, embodied in music, go beyond this?—we think not; and yet, Weber is replete with similar ideas throughout all his works.

Those persons alone who can enter into the comprehension of Weber's beauties, ought to attend a representation of his Der Freischutz and Oberon. To the ignorant, it is a casting of pearls before swine. Any vulgar melo-drama would do as well, where red and blue fire with dead men, and dire music form a mélange more agreeable to their taste, and better suited to their capacity.

During the late sojourn of the French company in this city, an article appeared in this paper, on the extraordinary bad taste manifested in changing the name and location of Weber's drama, the title being "Robin des Bois," and the scene being laid in Scotland; and the writer comments on the marked superiority the English piece possesses from its adherence to the author. The chorus now presented is strongly in corroboration of the opinions therein advanced. A few words will render this evident. The Frenchman who has translated or adapted the German version, has thought proper to deprive the chorus in question of its great feature—the imitation of laughter—thereby overthrowing the effect of the repetition of the subject in the incantation scene. His version of the words, to the best of our recollection, is as follows.

Oui des chas - seurs il est le roi.

Our version, and that of the Germans the same, thus:

Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha.

We do not think that the result of a comparison admits of a moment's doubt, and our previous observations will bear us out. At the Park theatre, Mr. Placide as Kilian, by his excellent acting and correct singing, gives due weight to the part.

ANTIQUITIES OF NEW-YORK.

MR. MORRIS—I regret that you did not apply to me for information on the subject of the curious and interesting building at the corner of Broad and Beaver streets, before you published the engraving in your paper a few weeks ago; but, as you then expressed a wish to know something of its history and that of its various possessors, I take this opportunity of complying with your desires. My whole life has been spent in inquiries of this sort, and there are few families in the city of whom I don't know more than they do themselves. I may, perhaps, furnish you with some of the fruits of my studies. Your constant reader, ANTIQVARIUS NOVA EBORACENSIS.

Legend of the ancient Tile-roofed Cottage,
Corner of Broad and Beaver streets.

I find by consulting some ancient records, which came into my possession by reason of my descent from Governor William Kieft, the building in question was erected by Petrus Cornelis Van Gelder, a native of the province of Guelderland, where his ancestors for thirteen generations had been proprietors of a famous windmill. Petrus came over in disgust, in consequence of their high mightinesses, the states general, having taxed the wind which turned his mill. People don't mind such trifles now, but at that time it was thought rather unreasonable.

I gather that honest Petrus was something of a politician, and was chosen scheepen, under the dynasty of Wouter Van Twiller, on account of the popularity he acquired for his steady resistance to laying out strait streets in his neighbourhood. He continued in this post for many years, and came to his death, as is related by the historian Knickerbocker, by breaking a blood-vessel, in attempting to force a laugh at one of the governor's jokes.

Petrus left only one son, which was but reasonable, as he had but one house to leave behind him, a piece of honest Dutch prudence, which I am sorry to say is not much imitated in these extravagant times. It was an inflexible rule of these prudent people to apportion the number of their children to the amount of their property.

Petrus Cornelis, the second of the dynasty, was called after his father, another excellent custom, which hath likewise been superseded by numberless heathen names, which all good christians ought to eschew as they would paganism itself. He was a renowned smoker and fisherman, for which latter occupation his house was singularly convenient, being situated on the very edge of a creek, which in those days furnished a variety of fish, more especially the fish anciently known by the name of tom-cod, but which the fantastic affection of the times hath metamorphosed into tom codus fuscus, as I hear. This creek was moreover a source of health and salubrity to the worthy inhabitants on its borders, until the spirit of public improvement, in an evil hour, changed it into a villanous conduit, teeming with filth and yellow-fever.

In the time of Petrus Cornelis the second, though the people all studied the scriptures, nobody ever quoted Job, as an example of patience. It was not "as patient as Job," but "as patient as Petrus Cornelis Van Gelder," who of a truth was a glorious example of that christian virtue. It must be confessed that Petrus had one great advantage over his rival Job, in his pipe, than which there is no more potent auxiliary to patience. Truly he was an example to all men, for he would sit from morning till night, smoking his pipe, and hauling up his line and throwing it out again, with a most rare and philosophic indifference, without a single nibble, while his wife was exercising all her powers of reasoning and eloquence to convince him he was a fool. Once on a time, after having sat upwards of three days and three nights, with his pole in his hand, without being vouchsafed a single demonstration that there was a fish within ten miles, he was at length aroused, by a sudden jerk, which pulled him headlong, headforemost into the creek. His excellent wife immediately ran screaming to his relief; but as ill luck would have it, in her praiseworthy attempts to convince him he was a fool, and deserved what he had got, she neglected to afford him assistance, whereupon, after exclaiming triumphantly three times, "Ish cot him! Ish cot him! Ish cot him!" he sunk to the bottom, and thus endeth the history of Petrus Cornelis, the second of that name.

Petrus Cornelis the third was reckoned a genius in his day, and mighty in eloquence, wherein he resembled his mother, of whom it was said she could talk down a northwester. He saw a great way into futurity, but was apt in so doing to overlook the lessons of the past, and let the present moment slip through his fingers. He predicted the time when New-Amsterdam would grow into a great city, and his posterity become immensely rich, by being proprietors of the little tiled cottage, which was then reckoned the second best house in Broad-street. Petrus founded his calculations on the gradual increase of his taxes, which he considered as proof positive that he was growing rich apace. It is astonishing to read with what satisfaction he saw his pocket picked every succeeding year of a few additional guilders, and with what triumphant reasonings he proved that the more money a man paid away for nothing, the richer he became. He lived to a good old age, in the happy enjoyment of his wealth and the payment of his taxes, but was suddenly cut off by a fit of mortification, at beholding the good city of New-Amsterdam conquered and taken possession of by the English, and its goodly name changed unto New-York.

Petrus Cornelis the fourth was the first of the family that ever subjected his rebellious tongue to the speaking of English, which he did in consequence of falling violently in love with a blooming English damsel, who used to come and rinse clothes opposite the little tiled cottage. She at first demurred to his proposals in Dutch, but his English proved irresistible, and he married her. By this untoward incident the genuine Dutch blood which had flowed in the veins of the Van Gelders was corrupted by extraneous mixture, and the way prepared for the downfall of the dynasty, as will be seen in the sequel.

The first innovation brought about in the domestic economy of Petrus Cornelis the fourth, by this unreasonable and profligate woman, was in throwing open the windows of his little parlour, or spare room, and admitting visitors every day in the week, instead of once a year, as had been the custom hitherto from time immemorial in the family. Nay, she went still farther, and wilfully did dispense with the pulling off their shoes before they entered, as had also been the custom time out of mind. Tea parties accordingly multiplied, in consequence of this throwing down of the old Dutch barriers, and there was great company-keeping in the little tiled cottage.

But this was not the worst. In the days of the primitive simplicity of New-Amsterdam, it was the custom with those who inherited property, to be content with what they had. They neither learned a profession nor entered into trade, but passed their whole time as gentlemen should do, in smoking their pipes, fishing, and other gentlemanly recreations. They were satisfied with not wasting their property, or outrunning their income, and never dreamed of making themselves the slaves of a lucre they had neither the habits nor the inclination to enjoy. How they managed to live without speculating in something or other, I pretend not to say; but certain it is, they did live, and that to a good old age.

But our English madam, forsooth, was not satisfied with this, but must be turning a penny; she actually became smitten with the egregious madness of growing rich. She moreover denounced the custom of smoking and fishing, and insisted that the children should be brought up to do something. She furthermore made a formidable breach in the ancient and praiseworthy Dutch custom of having but one son, and did burthen Petrus Cornelis with a family of three children, one daughter and two sons. The former she brought up to dress and tea parties, inasmuch that it is affirmed the young madam did spend in one year upwards of twelve guilders, which is equivalent to nearly four dollars of our money, in finery and frippery. Of the sons she must needs make one of them a lawyer, and the other a doctor, in order, as she said, that they might do something for a living. It was in vain Petrus Cornelis maintained that neither himself or his ancestors had ever done anything for a living, except tending a windmill in the province of Guelderland, which was, as it were, a gentlemanly avocation; all wouldn't do; the two little unfortunates were compelled to enter upon the study of the liberal professions, though it was the opinion of the neighbours they were a couple of the greatest noodles in all New-York. The eldest, Petrus Cornelis the fifth, entered the office of a famous lawyer, where he drew pleas and declarations, or rather copied them, from morning till night, by means whereof he became exceedingly skillful in compositions, which nobody but himself could comprehend. He was counsel for the commonwealth in the trials on the negro plot, and regularly talked Judge Horsemanden to sleep every morning. He moreover made such long speeches to the jury, that I have heard my grandfather assert that he himself used to get so out of all patience, that in revenge he always made it a point to lean in favour of the opposite side. But for all this he prospered exceedingly; and in the course of a long and lucrative practice saved money enough to buy himself a new suit of black broadcloth, a new three-cornered cocked beaver hat, and to whitewash the little tiled cottage when he came into possession thereof.

Mynheer Ægidius, being a learned man, dropped his vulgar name when he became a physician, as was the custom with the scholars of that day. Having finished his studies with great eclat, he travelled, and sojourned at the university of Leyden, where he regularly walked the hospitals, that is to say, he walked every day three times round the outside of the walls. He came back in a great wig, and carried an ivory-headed cane in his hand wheresoever he went. He grew into great practice, upon an entire new system, to the great scandal of his ignorant rivals. When he visited a patient, instead of consulting his books he consulted his ivory-headed cane, as the priests of Dodona did the wooden block. Having first told the patient to put out his tongue, he caused the room to be made perfectly dark, and then made a great blow with his cane. If he hit the disease the patient was cured, if he hit the patient it was all over with him, and the disease was pronounced incurable. In one case the doctor got all the credit, in the other nature got all the blame. Being, however, one day called to a stout burgher, who was somewhat irascible withal, and who was assaulted with a violent tooth-ache, he gave him such a mighty blow with the ivory-headed cane, that he dislodged a whole row of his grinders; whereat the burgher was so incensed, that he seized him by the shoulders and waistband, and threw him out of the window, upon the pavement. Luckily he pitched upon his head, and no harm happened save that one of the paving stones was split into divers pieces, by coming in contact with Mynheer Ægidius's noddie. The great misfortune attendant upon this accident was the loss of his oracle, the ivory-headed cane, which being left behind in the chamber of the patient, was broken into a thousand pieces, and thrown into the fire. After this the doctor was obliged to practise in the ordinary way, which he did with good success, until one night he accidentally swallowed a dose intended for one of his patients, which unfortunately carried him off on a full gallop. He left his money to his sister, who thereupon held her head so high that nobody was good enough for her in New-York. She accordingly made a visit to Paris, where she married a half-starved chevalier of St. Louis, and came very near being presented at court.

Lawyer Petrus Cornelis the fifth, finding himself, on the death of his parents, sole heir to the little tiled cottage, and the lot of ground appertaining to it, which were both, according to the tax-gatherer's list, increasing every year in value, gradually launched out into various new-angled eccentricities. Rich as he was, he always found himself in want of money, and the richer the tax-gatherer made him, the more money he wanted. This puzzled him exceedingly, and before he could solve the mystery, he found himself under the necessity of relieving himself at the expense of posterity, agreeably to a practice just then coming into fashion. By this means he got plenty of money, and came to be reckoned a mighty rich and prosperous man, by all those not conversant with the register of mortgages.

He died, leaving to his only son, Petrus Cornelis the sixth, and last of the family, an estate and a mortgage. About this time the great and glorious invention of banks and paper money was first propounded in New-York, by an ingenious person, who some how or other could never get hold of the precious metals. They always slipped through his fingers. He therefore exercised his genius in the production of a substitute, which should be accessible to every body. The bank was set up close by the little tiled cottage, and in good time paper money became so plenty that property rose mightily in value, and Petrus Cornelis became a rich man—only that he always wanted money the more, the richer he grew. It puzzled him almost out of his wits to account for the phenomenon of so rich a man being so much in want of money. To solve the mystery he borrowed a sum of the bank to pay his taxes, and pay off the old mortgage, by which procedure he got out of the frying-pan into the fire. In process of time the bank wanted money, and Petrus had it not to pay. The bank had not the patience of his great ancestor the fisherman, of blessed memory; he was turned out of the little tiled cottage before he could turn himself round. This puzzled him ten times more than the phenomenon of the rich man wanting money. The miracle of a rich man being turned out of house and home was still more inexplicable; he never came to comprehend it, till it was too late. He died as poor as some of our rich men are at this moment; his name became extinct, for no reasonable woman will marry a poor man; and the LITTLE TILED COTTAGE was degraded into a grocery store, an object of abhorrence to the temperance society!—Sic transit gloria mundi!

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTERS FROM LONDON,

To the Editor of the New-York Mirror.

NUMBER SIX.

London, September 27.

I PERCEIVE that the account of the French revolution has created almost as much excitement in the United States as on this side of the Atlantic. The English journals are full of wise predictions on the subject, as well as the batch of American newspapers which you were kind enough to send me. I have read the fervid outpourings of the worthy editors in their several and successive leading articles, each one trying to excel his neighbour, until their sheets are one entire blaze of speculative eloquence! How the newspaper press throughout both countries has prophesied concerning the tumbling down of thrones, the setting up of republics, and the approaching political millenium when the poor man shall sit down with the rich, and the exclusiveness of "good society" be no more! The shock of this revolution will, no doubt, be severely felt in our "own green forest land;" not that it will materially affect its laws, institutions, commerce, or manufactures, but the additional expense in the article of oratory will be very heavy. Supposing that each of the members of congress, and each of the members of all the state legislatures, occupies on an average only six hours to deliver his views and sentiments on this interesting topic; how the sessions will be protracted, and what an amazing flow of language and innumerable number of tropes and figures will have to be paid for out of the pockets of the people; a member of congress charging six, and a state legislature-man three dollars per day for his eloquence. And should revolutions continue to have, what theatrical people term, "a run," which is not unlikely, until next summer—powers of speechifying! what a theme will there be for annually inspired men! What an inconceivable quantity of extraordinary metaphors and similes will be used up; and what a cataract of oratory poured forth, overflowing the public mind in every direction, and sweeping away plain intelligible language and common sense in its resistless course. Chrononhotonthologos and Bombastes Furioso will become tame by comparison; and should it happen to be a hot season—mercy upon us! As the day approaches I think I see the Dumplings of Communism, and other places of similar importance, swollen like a blown bladder with the vastness of his conceptions, until "His soul, too copious for its earthly fabric, Starts forth, spontaneous, in loud peals of speech!"

The new revolution in France is in truth a glorious event, and, notwithstanding existing differences and dissensions, will, it is to be hoped, ultimately prove as beneficial as glorious; while the revolution on a small scale in the duchy of Brunswick, and the serio-comic behaviour of that "most silly gentleman," the duke, show like a mock-heroic farce after a grand national drama. The revolution in Belgium has been productive of much bloodier consequences than was anticipated, and the cause certainly seems inadequate to the effect. There was at first no grinding oppression or substantial grievances, but merely a few differences about pecuniary matters, which would doubtless have been settled by amicable agreement, had not revolutions been the fashion: both parties, however, got into a most unintelligible passion, and a serious loss of life has been the consequence. Since the commencement of hostilities, the horrible brutalities of the Dutch soldiers, so different from what might have been expected from the phlegmatic lovers of sour krout, have, it is to be feared, rendered the breach irreparable. Meanwhile, the spirit of the age spreads eastward, and the hoarded vengeance of centuries of tyranny and misrule seems likely to burst upon the heads of the present occupants of the thrones of middle Europe, unless they have sense enough to make a virtue of necessity, and yield with a good grace to the demands of their subjects. The savage-spoilt child, Master Miguel, appears inclined to give up his play-things, the block and gibbet, and endeavours to curry favour with the army, by supping bad soup with his soldiery; whilst the bloody antic of Spain already feels his seat shaking under him to such a degree as to prevent his embroidering petticoats for the virgin, with his former ease and facility. The royal seamstress will doubtless be much perturbed, and promise fairly, in order to keep things quiet; but he has already proved himself to be such a notorious liar, that it is to be hoped, his subjects will insist upon some security more tangible than a promise for the privilege of wearing their heads upon their shoulders for the time to come. Prussia too, does not seem to be over and above quiet. Some Berlin tailors have taken the lead in an attempt to cut out a new constitution—may their pattern be good, and their measures correct. Even Austria—cold, apathetic Austria—is rather uneasy. Despotism has evidently received its death-blow. The monster may kick and struggle for a while, but every convulsive effort will leave him weaker than before.

"Then let us pray, that come it may
As come it will for a' that,
That sense and worth, o'er a' the earth
May bear the gree and a' that.
For a' that, and a' that,
It's cummyn yet for a' that,
When man to man the world o'er Shall brothers be for a' that."

And who knows but in the lapse of ages, Russia herself may be prepared for something approaching towards civilization and a free government.

But there are some persons so fond of revolutions that they think no good can be effected without them. They look upon them as the only efficient physic for a disordered state of the body politic, and are for administering the strong and nauseous dose on every trivial occasion. It is only quacks, however, who are partial to such ilk or cure remedies; the intelligent physician never resorts to violent and dangerous purgatives, when gentle aperient draughts, Seidlitz powders, or, in America, Congress water, would answer the purpose much better. Probably there are many people who, for want of correct information, speculate upon a revolution in England. There was never less likelihood of such an event; and perhaps at no one period, for these many years, has there been so small a degree of excitement afloat in this turbulent little island as at the present time. Business and wages have improved much in the manufacturing districts. In London there is no body of men out of employment, and no more poverty and wretchedness than what must always be engendered by idleness, profligacy, drunkenness, and individual misfortunes in a dense population. Indeed radicalism and blasphemy were never at such a low ebb, and the influence of Carlyle, Hunt, Cobbett, &c. has ceased for ever. Immense exertions have been made, and are making, for the spread of education in every direction; and the more the people of England know, the more they feel that they have much to lose and little to gain by a revolution. They cannot be more free or secure from any attempt at oppression than they are at present, and a revolution will neither pay off the national debt nor give a fresh impulse to commerce and manufactures. The only thing they appear to be united in opinion about is the overgrown wealth and enormous salaries of the clergy; and the duke of Wellington has only to bring forward a measure touching the reduction of the church establishment to make himself the most popular minister England ever had. Should such a measure be brought forward and defeated in the house of lords, then I would not like to answer for the consequences. The chance is that there would be a partial revolution, but it would not be a revolution against the government, but in support of two parts of the government, the king and commons, against a portion of the aristocracy. At all events, the church must succumb, and that speedily, for its staunch supporters, the old stock of the aristocracy, are falling fast away, and in the common course of nature cannot last long, while their sons and successors, either tinged with the spirit of the times, or from matter of policy, pay assiduous court to the people. The present king is extremely popular; which popularity, however, does not prevent his being libelled and caricatured in every possible manner. You will see vagabonds hawking about the streets shilling pamphlets, professing to contain an accurate life of his majesty, "including the whole of his love adventures with the bum-boat woman at Plymouth, Yankee Bet, Demerara Dolly," and other ladies of a similar station and complexion. King William seems to be a plain, blunt, frank, hearty fellow, excessively good-natured, without a spark of pride or ostentation about him, and sincerely desirous to make himself as familiar with and as much liked by the people as possible. As he adopted this line of conduct as soon as he ascended the throne, and long before any disturbances occurred on the continent, it is but fair to presume that he is sincere, and not playing a part from motives of policy. The newspaper press has by this time got through with its anecdotes of "royal benevolence," &c. and all the other little good actions that are eagerly sought after, and loudly trumpeted forth on a monarch's accession to the throne. Such actions may proceed from a good heart, but where is the great merit in a king or any one else giving away ten or twenty pounds in charity, when he makes no sacrifice, and deprives himself of no earthly comfort by so doing. But this, and another species of sycophancy, namely, describing minutely and eulogizing extravagantly every trivial word and action of men in power are fast falling into disrepute here, though, lack-a-day! they seem to be rapidly becoming the fashion with journalists in the United States, as witness the memorable descriptions of General Jackson's visit to Old Point Comfort, and the very minute and particular account of how he eat, drank, slept, walked, talked, and tied on his neckcloth, and in some other matters wherein they almost out-did their European brethren. Such conduct is pitiful, happen where it will, and cannot but lessen the power and dignity of the press. This species of folly was well ridiculed by the John Bull newspaper a few years ago, in a story told about his royal highness the duke of Gloucester, or as it used to call him for shortness, "silly Billy." I have forgotten the language, but the substance was as follows:—As his royal highness was walking in the park the other morning, with his hands behind his back and his mouth open, as is his highness's custom, there happened to come on a shower of rain, upon which his highness, with his usual promptness, turned round to his secretary Taylor, who was in attendance, and said, "Taylor, the rain comes into my mouth—what shall I do?" To this condescending interrogation Taylor replied, "Had not your highness better shut it?" Upon which his highness, with that energy and decision which characterize his minutest actions, immediately shut his mouth, and no more rain found admittance during the remainder of the walk! C.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

THE PRATTLE OF AN OLD FRIEND,

To the Editor of the New-York Mirror.

"I sit by the mossy fountain, on the top of the hill of winds. One tree is rustling above me. The deer descend from the hill. No hunter at a distance is seen; no whistling cowherd is nigh. Come, memory! come on the wings of the gale! Bring back the past, when mid-day is silent around."

WELCOME to my summer bower! When last I addressed my musings to you, the christmas fire shed its cheering warmth and artificial light around my snug room, whilst now and then a sudden blaze would play on Chirk's pictured castle, and give it to my fancy as I have seen it in all its grand reality through the broad red light of a fine sun-set, when the rich woods were empurpled and the bright translucent water meandered through the verdant park in the lustrous colours of the sky. This castle is one among the very few whose possessors have had the good fortune and good taste to preserve as a family residence, without modernizing away the grandeur and charm of antiquity, at the same time that they have introduced sufficient domestic conveniences to render it a delightful and social dwelling.

There are few places I ever visited in Great Britain that gave to my mind a wider range for contemplation. It is situated on the brow of a lofty hill, from which the eye may wander over the vast expanse of seventeen counties, plains, towns, glittering spires, and ruined towers, which are seen dotting the extended landscape. The massive quadrangular building, with its gray stone turrets, part ivy-clad, rises in sublimity, and a bright young ash growing from the creviced tower waves its light branches in the breeze like a silken banner, whilst the rooks, that time out of mind have fixed their lofty citidel in the tall elms, sing out their wild alarm from the battlements at the approach of strangers. All else is still, and the impressive calm speaks to the heart of days of other times. Often, as I have trodden the mazy windings of this gothic pile, and heard the heavy iron portal close with echoing roar along the vaulted stone passages, I have felt mysterious awe creep over me, and thought, so sounded the loud battle's din, when to this spot the second Henry led his proud English forces against old Cambria's sons, headed by the intrepid Owen Gwynedd, and found defeat and slaughter from their gallant arms. And sometimes as the rushing wind was heard in hollow moan from the spiral stairs that led to the dark dungeon's depth, I would start and think of the two murdered sons of Madoc ap Griffith, whom their guardians, John earl of Warren, and Roger Mortimer, sacrificed to their cruel avarice. I have followed, with noiseless step, the good old housekeeper through the many folding-doors opening to apartments, suite after suite in varied magnificence, until we reached the picture gallery, where the old lady drew herself up in stately pride, and commenced her historical account of the family portraits, belonging to each line from the earliest possessors of the castle, with as much apparent self-satisfaction, as if she had been coeval with the first corner-stone; and I have caught her harmless enthusiasm as I have at her recitals, gazed on features which in their turns had looked out on that lovely scene, glowing, as I then beheld it, in the brightness of a summer sun. Where are they now? enshrined in the dark tomb, and these poor effigies remain to smile in mimic garniture of splendour. These portraits were to her as pages of history, chronology, biography, and the arts; from infancy she had conned them, and their frames of glittering gold or silver-studded ebony, had attracted her baby eyes before the forms they contained were aught to her conception. In lisping accents she had learnt to point to the fair Rosamond, to Thomas à Becket with his mitred crown, and to shake her little head in just displeasure at Edward the first, who in cold blood massacred the Welsh bards; and the steel-clad Baron Mortimer, placed in a dark recess, was viewed askance as the usurper and fell murderer of the rightful heirs.

The fair descendants from line to line, are, many of them, beautifully painted by Sir Godfrey Kneller and Sir Peter Lely, whose richly lusted draperies remain unrivalled specimens of his art. The mother of Wales, (so called from being the parent of several heirs of the most distinguished families, the Tudors, Trevors, Owens and others) looks from a deep ebon frame, so primly demure, that she seems fitter to have been some lady abbess, to have kept holy vigils, rather than to have been six times a courtly bride; it is said, that in following her fifth lord to the grave a gallant knight proffered his hand and love, which she most courteously declined, with an assurance that she had given her promise to an earlier suitor, but that the next time he should be preferred. But most of all, my interest has been awakened when seated in a small room at the extremity of this long gallery, to which you enter by a sliding pannel, and from which you may descend to the chapel through a small door concealed by tapestry. Here it is said Charles the first found a temporary refuge from his pursuers: the bed on which he slept, with its crimson damask hangings, are still preserved, and many a glowing cheek in dimpled smiles press the pillow for playful boast, on which, perhaps, the bitter tears of an injured monarch have been shed. The charms of the historic page are never more forcibly felt than when we stand on classic ground, for then scenes of the past rise to our imaginations as realities of the present. Our feelings partake in the glory, the honours, the revelries, the joys and sufferings of those who have breathed the same atmosphere we breathe; who have, on the very spot we stand, planned battles, signed deeds of peace, drained the wassail bowl in good fellowship, sang in the gay carousal extemporaneous verse in praise of highly-gifted dames and chivalrous knights, or listened to the legends of the bards who, with dark eyes up-turned, their silvery locks parted on their bent brows, have swept their loud harps till the wide welkin rang with wild harmony.

The many hours I have passed in this castle have always been to me moments of deep interest, and I should have felt it like a profanation of mind to have entered into commonplace converse within the walls that have echoed to the voice of a Giraldus Cambrensis, whose philanthropy led him in the eleventh century to preach the gospel to the unenlightened Britons. He was afterwards bishop of St. Davids, and to his records we owe much of our knowledge of our British ancestry. I cannot help feeling a high veneration for a people who, to the present era, have maintained a national character wholly their own: there exists many thousand families in North Wales, that to this day have never mixed their blood with the stranger Saxons, and who have preserved their language, customs and dress, free from the innovations of their English neighbours. Many have tried to introduce the English language into the church service, but the attempt has been generally resisted; and when allowed for the convenience of the numerous English residents, it has been restricted to one lesson, and an English sermon once a month.

Many of the genuine Welsh hold rooted prejudices against their proud invaders, and will not allow English servants in their families, lest the children should learn the Saxon tongue. Pen coch, red head, is a term used in derision among the vulgar, as denoting the Saxon race. Dark hair, fine black eyes and ruddy complexion, a middle stature, and round forms, are characteristic of the North Welsh—whilst the South Welsh partake more of the Irish character and feature. The Welsh language resembles the Hebrew in many words, and there are some whole sentences, which in both sound alike.

Hebrew.	Welsh.	English.
Nadu.....	Nadu.....	They moan or lament.
Nafe.....	Nef.....	Joyful.
Bareh.....	Bara.....	Meat or victuals.
Denah.....	Dyna.....	This or that.
Gad.....	Cad.....	An army.
Hanes.....	Hanes.....	To signify or account.

It is believed that the Welsh language had its origin in the Hebrew. The letters which are now used in writing Welsh, are the same as those used in writing English; but the alphabet now called Saxon, was used in their writing some centuries previous to the Saxon invasion. Dr. Johnson says, "when the Saxons first came into Britain, in the fifth century, they appear to have been a people without learning, and very probably without an alphabet." From an expression of Cæsar in his description of the Druids, "Græcis literis utantur," (they used the Greek letters;) it should seem that the Britons used this alphabet in the remotest period.

Among the many ancient customs still preserved in Wales, is the harper attached to every family of note; and every town or hamlet in the principality has its bard, who welcomes the travellers to the inn with merry minstrelsy. It is often that children of the village who are born blind, or by casualty are deprived of sight, are trained to this office, and it insures to them an easy and an honest livelihood. The harper is a very important person at all wakes and fairs, at bridal and all merry makings.

The earliest Welsh harp had only one row of strings, and to change the key it was necessary to tune it accordingly. Next followed the harp with two rows of strings, by which the difficulty of playing flats and sharps was somewhat surmounted; the next improvement was the "triple harp" which was invented about the fourteenth century, and which is now the common harp of Wales. The three rows contain ninety-eight strings; the two outer rows are diatonics, and are tuned in unison; the middle row constitutes the sharps and flats, and it is curious to mark the rapid facility with which even the blind harper can touch the required string. The pedal harp is a modern invention; I believe it cannot claim more than half a century; the first was made in Brussels; and for many years in England this instrument was called the French harp. The first I ever heard thrilled my heart with pleasure, it was most skillfully touched by Madame Krumpoltz. True Cambrian minstrels would not allow that other harpers than theirs could wake the music of their ancient bards; and in truth, I so far enter into their feelings that I would as much prefer to listen to their simple melodies played on their native instruments, among their romantic mountains, as I would to hear the brilliant tones of a pedal harp in a drawing-room. So highly was the power of playing on the harp esteemed in Wales, that it was considered as an indispensable accomplishment for every gentleman; and Scotia's magic bard, as true to custom as he is to nature's laws through all his fascinating numbers, introduces his bard in the "Lay of the Last Minstrel," as one who had been honoured for his art.

"No more on prancing palfrey borne,
He carolled light as lark at morn;
No longer courted and caressed,
High placed in hall, a welcome guest,
He poured to lord and lady gay,
The unpremeditated lay."

In Rokeby's halls the minstrel is admitted to join the noble guests, and Rokeby's lovely heiress wakes on his harp sweet notes of sorrowing plaint. Old Allan, in the "Lady of the Lake," is an important personage; and in "Marmion," the lady Heron is made to charm the king and nobles by her art of minstrelsy.

My grandsire was a true born Briton; and although I never heard that he boasted his pedigree farther back than to Cadwaladr, the last king of the Britons, no doubt he, like many of his contemporaries, could have traced his family name, with half an hundred aps on the genealogical tree, to a much earlier period; however this may be, my lady grandmother was far more proud of the title which he had established for himself, than any he could have acquired from his line of ancestors, namely, that of a noble minded and independent gentleman of Wales, whose greatest ambition was to ensure the respect of his neighbours and the love of his family, and these substantial honours he bore with him to the grave. He was a strict observer of good old customs, was enthusiastically fond of music, and was esteemed one of the finest harp players of his day. He had a commanding figure and expressive features, and when seated at the instrument, which was of more than ordinary size, he looked like one of Ossian's bards "graceful at the harp," and like them would raise the song of love, or recount valorous deeds of war, "as the blue host of heroes rose on his soul." He was elected president of the Eisteddfod, a triennial meeting of the bards; and if I may judge by a translation of an original Welsh ode, sang to his harp at one of those meetings, he possessed the true powers of poetry: his subject was the taking of the Isle of Mona, now better known by the name of Anglesea, the destruction of the sacred groves and altars, and the sacrifice of the druids by Suetonius Paulinus, in the reign of Nero. Such odes were not sung to regular melody as in our modern ballads, where every verse, however differing in feeling and sentiment, is drawled out to the same ditty; but extemporary harmony flowed from the lyre, expressive of the words in wild and changing measure befitting the subject, somewhat resembling recitative, but more varied. I much regret that masters of the art of music do not at this day give to their auditors such effusions, warm from the head and heart, in lieu of the hack-nied songs which you hear thrummed on every piano, by every age and in every place, from the opera band to the grinding hand-organ in the streets. It might easily be done by musicians charging their memories with a few well selected poems. I have heard it attempted in private with excellent success, and once on Moll Morrydd with magical effect.

This mountain is in Denbighshire, and here the Eisteddfod was once held; on this spot a large party of ladies and gentlemen assembled at the suggestion of one, whose capacious and liberal mind loves to recall the glories of the past, for the edification and charm of the present. It was a lovely morning in July when the party moved merrily on by the windings of the romantic Dee, and ascended the mountain in various groups, some mounted on little Welsh ponies, whose sure-footed pace leaves the rider at full liberty to enjoy the enchanting prospect which every where surrounds him.

As we gained the summit of the mountain, music was heard on the breeze, now swelling in full chorus, and then gently fading into distant echoes. The deep soft sod gave no noise to the many trampling feet which pressed it, and when the music paused, the skylark's note was heard, "mid mottled clouds, now lost, now found," whilst every little flower upon its verdant bed rose up, as if in conscious pride that each lovely blossom had power to charm and claim the poet's verse. The cowslip, on its pale green stem, showed its bright golden cup filled with rich nectary, and it proudly seemed to say, "Behold in me the favourite blossom of the immortal Shakespeare!" and next peeped forth the mountain daisy like a bright star, to shed its lustre on the never-fading garland of Albin's favourite Burns; and then the modest hare-bell, with glistening dew drops trembling on its leaves, bade us remember the "little flower that loves the lea," and which, so long as love and poetry can charm the heart of man, will sparkle like a gem in the rich coronet with which fame has encircled the brows of Scott. The lesser celandine with burnished leaf, was seen amidst rich tufted grass near to the rippling water, that from the hidden spring ran like silvery thread adown the mountain side, and this humble floweret in the sweet freshness of nature blooms through Wordsworth's verse.

"The shamrock rose for Erin's bard,
Sparkling through
The limpid dew
Like emeralds through crystal."

Nature in profuse loveliness, shone through heaven's bright light along the lengthened vale, and as we stood upon the mountain's top-most height, and viewed the fleecy clouds rolling beneath us, it seemed a sacred fane and the spirits of departed bards floating around us.

It was at this moment, when my thoughts were enwrapped and every thing breathed the tone of inspiration, that the chords of the harp were swept by a skilful hand, and the following verse poured spontaneously from a heart that loves all nature's harmonies.

Sweet harp of Wales!
Forgive a border minstrel young,
That tunes thy strings all slack and sleeping,
And wakes thy fires to Saxon tongue,
Thy chords with feeble fingers sweeping.
Though thine old oak
Is bare and broke,
And sad scathed branches long have crown'd it,
Some few green sprays,
In summer days,
All glossy green, wave light around it.
Of these I'll pluck, and prank thee fair,
And golden mistletoe I'll bring thee,
With its bands to bind it there,
Though I to Saxon voice must sing thee.
And if short while
These garlands smile,
They'll better suit the songs I sing thee,
Sweet harp of Wales!

Sad harp of Wales!
Thy wild and mournful melodies,
Though hushed, alas! in silent slumbers,
Have gained the good and won the wise
To weep and worship at thy numbers,
By Llywarch, aged bard of yore,
Who wail'd his twenty sons and four;
And Taliesin, honour crown'd,
By Prince, in wat'ry cradle found;
And Hoel's lay, like May-day morn,
By nipping frost his blossoms torn;
By all the bards whose sorrowing swells
Have echoed down thy mountain dells.
How oft have they thy dirges swept
To hearts indignant glowing;
And eyes, like trickling rills, that wept
To hear thy sound of sorrow flowing,
Sad harp of Wales!

High harp of Wales!
By firm conflicting freedom strung,
How has thy spirit sped her!
Thy strains to panting patriots sung,
Have on to conquest led her.
Great bards of Cambria! your grand requiems loud,
Hymn'd in the mountain-torrents roar I hear;
See monuments in Snowdon's summits proud,
While setting sun-beams mark your stories there
Though down your souls on eagle wing,
Still neighbor'ring nations list with wonder
Those sounds that called a ruthless king
To cut thy glorious chords asunder,
High harp of Wales!

When the human mind contemplates the endless variety which nature and art present, the many wonders and beauties of each through all their divine mysteries, how can satiety, with torpid touch, deaden our sensibility? It is vice alone has the baneful power, a too eager pursuit of selfish pleasures mars the capability of enjoyment; but where virtue leads, increasing joy, new ecstasies, and invigorated mind attend our exploratory way. Those persons are the happiest who possess in themselves the greatest power of enjoyment; and yet how many there are who go through every stage of life, from the cradle to the grave, resting on others for support, for daily necessities, and for daily pleasures, listless and inactive, their passing existence is a blank, or at least resembles a scrap-book, whose borrowed trifles fill the page! How ably has Providence supplied to highly-gifted man an intellectual spring, where blossoms in succession rise and ripen into fruit, which by the wise and good are husbanded, and stored for the winter of old age, these treasures make the evening of life cheerful, and enable him when darkness closes his day, to go to rest in peace and wake to everlasting joys! Sculpture, painting, typography, how much of happiness we owe to thy powers! O god-like arts! that can perpetuate our enjoyments, can rescue from oblivion the past, and bid all that is good or great or glorious live on through ages. The sculptor gives to cold marble the animated form, and sees it leap to life in vigorous strength of Hercules, or move in beauty of Apollo, or from the tomb gives back to view a Milton, Shakspeare, Handel, and a Howard; poets, patriots, and heroes of the past are by this art embodied in our thoughts, and we gaze with rapturous delight upon the venerated forms which else were lost, or only seen in shadowy fancy. Painting adds to these valued images a living lustre, the eye sparkles under our gaze, the lip breathes eloquence, the dimpled cheek of beauty glows with the blush of love. Who can look upon the benign features of Washington, and mark his noble front, like the mind's throne, without feeling the spirit of bold enterprise and glory of philanthropy? But vain were these arts without the aid of letters. O golden keys, that open the gates of immortality! Painting and sculpture give the form, but it is through you we read the very soul of man, the thoughts of saints and sages; debarred thy blessing, what would have been the state of mortals? Dull insects of a day, indeed! past ages lost, the future unpromised, the present half enjoyed, and yet there but few who seem to be fully sensible of the great importance of this inestimable gift, the powers of living with the best, the greatest, the wisest through every age of man.

It is one of the chief frailties of human nature that we are prone to view with cold indifference or apathy, objects, however beautiful or interesting in themselves, if daily present; but when time or distance removes them from us, we regret their loss, dwell on their worth and charms with magnified zeal, and deplore their absence. This arises from our habit of contemplating the past and the future, forgetful of the present; a beautiful face, or a lovely prospect which we daily see ceases to excite our admiration, and I fear the blessings of life are too often disregarded or thanklessly received, because common to us. It were better philosophy to enjoy that which is present than to lose the happiness within our reach in sighing for that which is beyond it, or in longing after that which may never arrive. But if we make our desires and our wishes subservient to our reason and necessity, we may derive much enjoyment by retrospection and reflection. Thus can these little pictures round my cottage walls bring to me past days of happiness, and teach me to live them over and over again!

THINK OF ME.

BY EVERARD.

When the soft night-wind, on its hidden pinion,
Steals to the green earth from the azure sea—
When the moon saileth through her meek dominion,
Then, fair enchantress, think in dreams of me.

When the rich glories of the western heaven
Glowed o'er the waters and the emerald lea;
Then, while emotion to thy heart is given,
Then, rapt and spirit-kindled, think of me!

When the glad odours of the dewy morning
Rise from the blossoms of the summer tree;
While the gay east grows bright in day's returning,
Then, with unquench'd affection, think of me!

In the gay spring-time, when the skies above thee
Are full of sweetness and awake with glee;
When the young birds to countless raptures move thee,
Then, midst their carols, pause—to think of me.

When the sad autumn o'er the earth is throwing
The faded honours of the summer-tree,
When the choked streams with mournful wail are flowing,
Still let thy pensive spirit think of me!

LINES TO MY BROTHER.

BY MISS A. OF BRANDON, VT.

I think of thee when twilight gray
Steals softly down the vaulted sky,
And all the tints of parting day
Allure and charm the gazer's eye;
For then fond memory brings to me
The days of childhood's happy glee.
I think of thee when from afar,
As in some glittering coronet,
Proudly looks down yon polar star,
A diamond in heaven's azure set;
For ah! in other, happier days,
We loved on that lone star to gaze.
I think of thee when silent sleep
Has banished all unholy mirth,
And angels their kind vigils keep
O'er the beloved, the blest of earth:
Oh! then is breathed my prayer for thee,
That they may guard thy destiny.
I think of thee when rosy light
First dawns upon the eastern sky,
And all the glorious stars of night
Are giving place to coming day:
Ah! then with spirit meekly free
Is breathed my matin prayer for thee.

THE DRAMA.

Mr. C. KEAN commenced a short engagement at the Park theatre on Friday evening of last week, in his top character of Richard the third. Notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, he was greeted by a numerous and fashionable audience, who frequently gave unequivocal testimony of the actor's excellence; but, at the close of the piece, the applause was long, enthusiastic, and tremendous. Mrs. Sharpe sustained the part of the queen in an able manner, and merited the approbation which was awarded to her with no unsparing hand.

Mr. Thorne appeared for the third time on Saturday evening as Captain Macheath, in the Beggars' Opera, and he acted the part admirably, particularly the song of "How happy could I be with either." We however must add, that Mr. Thorne has no business to attempt tenor singing; for although his voice is one of great compass, (we do not say power,) yet from the circumstance that it is a baritone voice, the upper notes have not strength enough to give force to tenor songs. In this number we shall be unable to criticise his personation of Artaban, but we know the music lies well within his compass, and we expect that he will succeed. Mrs. Austin's most triumphant character is that of Mandane, no mean compliment to her either, for it has been long considered the test opera on the English boards. Mrs. Sharpe will appear in Artaxerxes. We have never yet had any very eminent vocalist in New-York to take charge of the beautiful music of the young prince. Mr. Jones, the Arbaces, is a sterling musician, with a fine voice and faultless intonation; but his intrinsic value, except to musicians, is much impaired by his awkward gait and faulty acting—we wish he would take a hint on the subject, for we respect his talents. Der Freischütz is announced for Thursday, of course we must reserve our remarks on that opera for another number. Mr. Thorne, we take upon ourselves to predict, will enact Caspar well, and the music will suit him. Jones will be very good in the music of Adolph, and the excellence of Linda, the part of the prima donna, as played by Mrs. Austin, and of Kilian, as played by Placide, is well known. Rose, whose difficult and charming music makes her a very important personage, is to be for the first time entrusted to Mrs. Blake, of whose performance we shall take an opportunity of speaking. For the incantation scene, surely Valmond has peopled the Park with devils enough.

On Monday Mr. Kean performed Hamlet in a manner even more to our liking than when we first saw him in the character. It is a chaste and beautiful piece of acting, and elicited repeated bursts of admiration from a crowded house. We deem it superfluous to enter into any comments on the minutiae of the part, having given a full analysis of it on a former occasion. Mr. Kean evidently gains upon the favour of the public at every new effort. Ophelia was successfully sustained by Mrs. Sharpe. We perceive that this lady is about proceeding to Philadelphia, where we cannot doubt that she will become as decided a favourite as she is at Boston and in this city, and as she must be wherever she goes. She has peculiar merits—great versatility combined with accurate judgment and the most delicate taste. We regret that her benefit is necessarily postponed until her return from the south. When it takes place, we feel confident the opportunity will be speedily seized by her numerous admirers of evincing their feelings towards an amiable, industrious, and accomplished actress. M.

LITERARY NOTICES.

THE POETICAL WORKS OF ROGERS, CAMPBELL, J. MONTGOMERY, LAMB, AND KIRKE WHITE. COMPLETE IN ONE VOLUME.—And a most beautiful octavo volume it is, and from the press of Carey and Lea, recommending itself not merely by the choice and standard matter of its contents, but by its fine typography, glossy paper, and a delightfully executed engraving, containing the heads of the five distinguished bards. We shall not pay so poor a compliment to the reader as to comment on the claims of the authors, whose compositions are identified with the English language, and are almost the first to be liaped by the school-boy. Every lover of poetry will avail himself of the opportunity now afforded him of possessing these invaluable productions. The book before us forms a companion to the similarly printed works of Scott, Byron, and Moore.

THE PEARL.—This is the title of an annual published by Thomas T. Ash, of Philadelphia. It is intended as a holiday present to the younger classes, and is handsomely printed, and embellished with several engravings. Among the contributors we notice the names of Willis G. Clark, L. H. Sigourney, E. Leslie, &c. There are some beautiful lines, "To a young Child," by the first of the above-named writers. The object of the editor is to inculcate lessons of virtue and morality in the minds of juvenile readers.

THE SANDFORDS, OR HOME SCENES.—We have read with pleasure the first volume of a work, just published by Mr. E. Bliss, under this name. It is from the pen of a lady of high rank. Her claims are not unknown to the readers of this journal, who will well recollect "The Uneducated Wife," which was her production.

JOURNAL OF THE HEART.—Another neat duodecimo from the Careys. It is nominally edited by the authoress of Flirtation. "This work," says the United States Gazette, "is written from the heart, and speaks to the heart. It speaks of religion as a principle of action, but erects no stakes nor collects no faggots; it talks of convents, but does not ridicule the abbess; it mentions nuns, but does not mark them down as fools. It is a pleasant book, and will afford pleasure to those who read it."

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

French celebration.—The event which we announced in our last number promises to be attended with even more pomp and display than we had anticipated. At the first meeting of the committee, held on Friday the twelfth instant, the venerable James Monroe presided. On taking the chair he offered some remarks which were deeply imbued with his characteristic love of liberty, and evinced the very lively interest which he, in common with his fellow-citizens assembled around him, felt in the glorious regeneration of the gallant people of France. He was listened to with profound attention, and when he finished his short but pithy address, he was loudly and enthusiastically cheered. Sub-committees of arrangement, selected from amongst our most respectable and public spirited citizens, were then appointed. All these have entered with cheerfulness and activity upon the grateful duties assigned to them, and the approaching twenty-fifth promises to be a day of glorious rejoicing and magnificent exhibition.

Mi pizzica, mi stimola.—We lately inserted an English version of this celebrated aria, written by Mr. Woodworth, and now present our readers with another, (from a more martial muse) as recently sung by Mrs. Austin, at the Park theatre. Bourne has just published it, and gives us permission to copy the words. The language and sentiments are very suitable to the blustering spirit of the music.

RECITATIVE.

How bright and joyous nature bloomed
Beneath a vernal sky,
Ere he who won my heart had doomed
That heart alone to sigh.
But love of fame inspired his breast,
And now in fields afar,
With crimson blade and towering crest,
He seeks the din of war.

AIR.

High o'er the field in martial pride
His stately banner waves,
Where heroes stem the battle tide,
Or sink in hallowed graves.
There, mid the rude and maddening clash
Of havoc's vengeful steel,
His falchion gleams, the lightning-flash
That leads the thunder-peal.
His deeds shall live in story,
He strikes in freedom's name,
For country, home, and glory,
Inspired by love and fame.
Rude was the shock! the squadrons close,
And freemen win the field!
On, victors, on! pursue your foes!
But spare them when they yield.
Believed from sterner duty,
The hero now may claim
The sweetest smiles of beauty,
With freedom, love, and fame.

THE WARNING.

BY THYRA.

CALL back, call back, each winged thought,
And fold it in thy silent heart!
The words with fancy's fervour fraught,
Oh! let them not to utterance start!
Each trace of feeling deep repress,
Be cold, and calm, and passionless.
Tame down the soaring thoughts that spring
In youth's enthusiastic heart;
Chain fancy's wild and wandering wing,
And to no ear thy dreams impart—
Let not thy deeper feelings speak
In bright'ning eye or flushing cheek.
Thy features—let them never be
A mirror, but a mask to hide
Love, scorn, hope, fear, or agony,
Each feeling of thy heart, while pride
Shall smile to meet the baffled eye
Which would the secret soul espy.
Smile—while thy heart is withering—
Be gay—when every hope has died—
Let mirth her veiling mantle fling
Each pang that wrings thy heart to bide;
Wear thou the look of happiness,
Though thousand ills around thee press.
Dream not the open brow of youth
Its frank and fearless mien to wear,
This is no world for trust and truth—
Hide in thy heart what passes there,
And pride and scorn shall reach thee not,
And thine will be an envied lot.

ORIGINAL MORAL TALES.

SIMON SMITH, OR THE SOUTH CORNER.

WHAT caution should be in direction! by want of it I knew a lady miss a husband—his true, upon my word—her name—
Smith—two words were missed and so she missed a husband.
It was her father's fault too—and yet a father never loved a daughter more; he enjoyed the world because he could look at her, and when he thought of rapturous praises he had heard, the old man smiled and his eye glistened. "She is indeed," he would exclaim, "equal to one's fairest imaginations; such a delightful glow upon her cheek, and the curls over her forehead are so gracefully grouped and located—there's such humour and animation about her too"—and he thought of her gay speeches, and he smiled; and then he smiled that he had smiled—"what vanity!" cried he.

Simon Smith was a merchant—he was absolutely compelled to go to New-Orleans; his daughter had just bid him goodbye; she could not force back her tears; her pretty form was vanishing out of the parlour door. "When the long last separation shall come," thought he, "who will protect thee, poor child, when thou hast no parents? Thy relatives are kind, but they have their own to protect. If I could but find one who would appreciate your worth, and treat you as your angel soul deserves. I wish you were married; though I should lose you, it is my duty: 'tis a strange place, but I will look out at New-Orleans."

He had never been there before; it would have charms to the inexperienced, but licentiousness has no beauty in the eyes of age; the indulgence of passion is attractive in description and excites the imagination of youth, but in reality is tarnished by unlooked-for circumstances. He determined he would look out at New-Orleans.

"My old friend, how are you?" cried a voice as he was passing one morning through the Rue de —.

"Who the deuce are you?" thought old Simon.

"It certainly is Simon Smith," said the speaker.

Mr. Smith shook him kindly by the hand; he ventured on no name, but looked ignorantly in his face.

"You have forgotten an old school-fellow."

His name was Ravelle. Mr. Smith remembered him. He was always a great talker, and always amusing his neighbours by speaking of his own affairs.

"Where have you been," said he, "these many years? I'm delighted to see you. I'm almost killed with labour; I've made a great deal since I saw you. At Havana I made fifteen thousand dollars, at Corthagena twenty, at Lima ten more, and here I am with loads of business. The — in New-York employ me; the — in Charleston, and the great house in Boston say no firm shall be employed but mine."

"The deuce they do," thought old Simon.

"But I forgot to introduce my son," continued old Ravelle. "Do dine with me to-morrow."

Mr. Smith promised; he dined frequently with old Ravelle.

"I should be glad to go with you, Mr. Smith," said young Ravelle, one day after dinner.

"There is nothing to prevent you, Ravelle."

Mr. Smith had been delighted with young Ravelle; his difference from his father was so singular—coming from the same quarter. Ravelle was but twenty-five. "Just a match for her," thought old Smith. "I'll try and persuade him to return with me." It was determined he should go. They went by the Mississippi.

"Drain of a world!" thought Ravelle, looking over the side of the steam-boat.

"Father of rivers!" said a lady.

"The family is large," said Ravelle.

"You have them of all sizes," answered the lady.

"It's very like the Raritan near Perth Amboy," said a bystander.

"Parca componere," thought Ravelle.

They were three weeks before they reached Philadelphia—the modern Athens—and it has such an affectionate name—it is a little paradise—but they say we may grow tired of paradise. Ravelle grew sick of the modern Athens; he begged Mr. Smith for heaven's sake to go—but this last was obliged to stay a week longer.

"I'm tired to death," said Ravelle; "I'll go on before you."

"You must go to my house the very day you arrive and see my family, and I will write immediately. 'Tis the corner house—a large three story building; ask for Mr. Smith, any body will tell you—a new house," said old Simon, as he shook young Ravelle's hand.

He heard the distant paddling of the wheels—it was too late to call. At this seasonable moment he remembered there was another Mr. Smith, who lived opposite, likewise in a corner house—a large three story—and the house was a new house too, and was continually mistaken for his; and this Smith had a pretty daughter too.

"If he should unluckily go to the north corner, he will see her first, and first impressions are so fatal; why didn't I tell him the south corner, or rather, why the deuce do people take the same names?" muttered he; "making constant blunders and difficulties in society: when proper names are improper names, then they are not proper names; the meaning of proper is peculiar and distinguishing. What kind of distinction, I should wish to know, does Smith give? you might as well call a man a two-legged animal. It's true she's not as pretty as Elizabeth, what matters it? He'll see her first—'good-by' he'll say to old Simon's daughter. Fool that I was—why didn't I specify south corner? it was but two words, and yet I could not say them; thus do I blunder for ever, and will, while I live, I suppose."

He looked back towards the steam-boat; she was making the best use of her paddles. As he saw the foam behind her stern, he muttered in a species of vexatious growl, "You're determined nothing shall catch you." He almost wished she would blow up, so that all went up except Ravelle. He walked sullenly away; he felt the pleasures of a reproaching conscience all that day; he was one of those poor wretches full of sin first and sorrow afterwards.

Ravelle arrived at New-York; he sat himself down alone in his room and looked at his watch—it was just eleven o'clock. "What in the name of heaven shall I do?" thought he. He walked to the window; the rain was one of those melancholy rains—it was enough to make a man throw himself off the Battery. He looked down on the polished pavement, and then as the drops fell in the water that had fallen, he watched the circles that appeared and vanished, and vanished and appeared in endless wearisome sameness. He gaped and breathed out a sound—it was a plaintive wail. There was a mass of black coals in the grate, and every now and then a cloud of choking smoke rose to the ceiling. "Pleasant," thought Ravelle in the misery of his soul. There were no curtains—exposed was all the gloom of the heavens—it was gloomy in and gloomy out. "Fool that I was, to leave my home," cried he. "These are the joys of travelling, to be afflicted with all the curses of fatigue one moment, and solitude the next." He rose and took a book and sat down to read—it was impossible. When the mind is distracted by real or imaginary ills, the remedies are loathsome which might often be its cure. "In heaven's name, what shall I do? I shall die here. Why did I leave the old man? Him at least I should have had, here I know nobody." There is a feeling of loneliness or abandonment when we first come among those who know us not; and Ravelle was young. He would not go to old Smith's—he would be among strangers, he would be tired to death there, and be obliged to talk and be civil; it was such a trouble to be civil and to talk when you would rather say nothing—but any thing better than this purgatory.

"The corner house, sir—a large new house."

"The old fellow has really a palace," thought he.

"Mr. Smith's?"

"Yes, sir," said the gentleman of colour.

"When you open the door, mention my name."

"Mr. Ravelle," cried the dark gentleman, smiling.

Two ladies sat near the fire. "How very pretty," thought he, as his eye for a moment fell on the younger.

"Sit down, sir," said the elder of the two.

"Mrs. Smith, I presume I have the honour to address?"

"Mrs. Smith," said the lady.

"She's beautiful," thought he. "I had the pleasure, madam, (looking at the old lady) of meeting Mr. Smith at New-Orleans—"

"I don't envy you the pleasure," thought the lady; "my husband has not left town these five years."

"And," continued Ravelle, "I had the pleasure of travelling with him from New-Orleans to Philadelphia. There is an attractive gravity—I never saw such a face," thought he.

"You have travelled with his ghost," thought the old lady. "I believe there is some mistake, sir."

"Mr. Smith informed me he had written."

"Smith is my husband's name, but it is probably Mr. Smith at the south corner; there are continual mistakes."

Ravelle was confused; he expressed his regret at having disturbed them.

"Heavens and earth! what a beautiful woman! Ye gods I must know her," cried he, as he left the house.

Ravelle went soliloquizing to the opposite corner. "An awkward blunder in old Simon not to mention the south corner; but it was worth an age of suffering to see her face; she must have been the old woman's daughter."

The true Miss Smith he next saw was pretty: had he seen her first, he might have sworn she was the most splendid specimen he had ever seen—but it was too late. When he found himself at the south corner in the drawing-room with the real Smiths, the image of the absent unknown was constantly before him. "They must know their neighbours," thought he. He told them his mistake.

"And there was a young lady there too," said he in a tone of indifference, (it is so horrible to have one's agitation observed.)

"Had she pretty teeth? And her hair prettily arranged?"

"Beautifully."

"And a pretty form?"

"Very pretty," answered Ravelle, as if he were speaking of a statue.

"It was Miss Smith, daughter of the old lady you saw, my particular friend and namesake." Just as our old friend Smith had predicted.

He was invited to take tea with the true Mrs. Smith.

"Miss Mary Smith"—it was the original of his visions again; there was too much boldness perhaps, but there was candour in Ravelle—"I was delighted with you when I saw you the other day."

She laughed. "That's very rude."

The gentleman jested, but ere long

"Mal bene sentiva che quanto li vedeva."

He liked to be near the lady in the morning, and in the afternoon, and after afternoon too. "If I am not always near," at length he cried, after he had known her two or three weeks,

"I never can be happy in this life. Come what, come may, I'll ask her the first golden opportunity. Suppose it prove a leaden one," thought he.

Old Simon, after some delay, arrived from Philadelphia. He saw Ravelle's devotion to the stranger: "Just as I dreaded," thought he; "if he had but seen Elizabeth first—if I had only said 'the south corner' fool that I was—thus have I ever missed my wishes in the world; and with such want of presence of mind in giving my instructions, for what important station am I fit in life? not one." Old Smith had a spasm of reproach—he had had them often before—he was getting used to them.

Ravelle liked her still better when he knew her better; every day he found out some new attractions—this always happens to a good production. At length he married her. Old Smith smiled and was sorry; his daughter was glad of her friend's good fortune; and though she afterwards married well, her father was always sorry, in his direction, he had forgotten the south corner.

THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

WHAT sounds are these, that from the eastern shore
Burst on the ear as time were now no more?
The loud Atlantic, from her foaming track,
Echoes the shout in tones of thunder back.
Earth stands aghast, while all her despots feel
Their thrones and temples to the centre reel.

Say, have the nations from their slumber woken,
And burst the bigot's chain—the tyrant's yoke?
Hath freedom's banner been again unfurled
By patriot hands above a prostrate world;
The lurid flames that mark'd the hideous past,
Been quench'd in blood, and vengeance roused at last?

'Tis even so—the peasant hath hurl'd down
His iron gauntlet 'gainst the monarch's crown.
His sword is bare—his scabbard thrown away,
Freedom his war-cry, and her foe his prey!
How changed since, slave-like, he had bowed him there,
His birth-right chains—his heritage despair.

Deep in the trench the armed burgher stands,
With flashing eye and gore-empurpled hands;
No burnish'd shield defends his patriot breast,
No sable plumes float proudly o'er his crest:
Fearless he stands amid the shock of death,
His loose locks shaken by the cannon's breath,
And hears in each reverberated roar,
"The sons of Gallia shall be slaves no more!"

When freedom's sword insulted nations draw,
And fierce revenge adds terror e'en to war;
When feelings, lash'd to madness, spurn control,
And mercy sleeps, and frenzy fires the soul;
Then the proud columns in their armed array
To naked breasts and peasant-hands give away:
From rank to rank the baffled leaders fly,
And urge their slaves to conquer or to die,
In vain—for deeply falls the freeman's sword,
By them more heeded than their leader's word;
One more impetuous charge—the route's complete,
And slavery's chains laid low at freedom's feet!

Now when the feeble tyrant of your land,
In shame and fear hath sought a foreign strand;
His gray head loaded with the curses wild
Of the lone widow and the orphan child—
Now when the upas-breath hath left your shore,
And carnage stalks along your streets no more—
To win your peace at home and friends abroad,
Hear mercy plead while justice holds the sword;
Let wisdom's voice your halls of council fill,
And bid sedition's factious tongue be still—
So shall loud discord in your cities cease,
And rights, blood-purchased, be enjoyed in peace.

MISCELLANY.

NOVEL WRITING.—ASKING AN OPINION.

CHRISTOPHER NORTH, who often entertains himself and his readers with his laughable imitations and burlesques, has lately supplied the following, as a hit at the tribe of modern romancers.

"Now that the servants are all gone, the table drawn towards the window, and every thing comfortable about us, let me hear the secret you spoke of before dinner."

"Why, really, my dear fellow, I have long wished for an opportunity to disburden myself to some kind and sensible friend, and I know none I can so readily confide in as yourself. You must know I have turned my attention, seriously, for the last two or three months to a certain point."

"Aha! Matrimony? Who is it, Billy? Who is this wonderful paragon who is going to become Mrs. Billy Tompkins?"

"Nonsense, man; what can you be talking of?"

"Stay, Billy; I'll describe your choice to you:—fair hair, almost approaching to love's proper hue, celestial rosy red; wideish mouth—there is nothing equal to the mouth for expression; crooked-nose; a delicate obliquity of vision; pointed chin; age, thirty-five; and the name of this Dulcinea is"—

"Mr. William Blackwood, 45 George's-street, Edinburgh; see, there's his address—I am just going to send off the letter. The fact is, my dear Simson, I have turned author; I have written a story or novel, or whatever you like to call it, and before sending it down to the north, I should like very much to have some rational and intelligent person's opinion on its merits."

"Thank you; you could not, I am sure, have applied to a more disinterested friend, or one who would be happier to give you any advice that may benefit your work. (Vain puppy! what can tempt such a silly fool as this to commence author?)"—Aside.

"I thought so, Simson; and, if you'll give no interruption, I shall be most happy to read you the first chapter or two."

"I interrupt you? It is a thing I never did in my life. Depend on my not making the slightest noise—(unless I should happen to snore.)"—Aside.

"Well then, here goes. It was on the evening of the fifteenth day of July, in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and twenty-eight"

"Why, that's just like the beginning of a law paper; but I beg pardon—mum."

"It was on the evening of the fifteenth day of July, in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and twenty-eight, that a stranger was seen to enter the stable-yard of the Angel inn, in the ancient town of Bury St. Edmunds. The stranger, from the juvenility of his appearance, was evidently young. His hat was set perpendicularly on the top of his head, while his legs were carelessly suspended one on each side of the animal which he bestrode. Buttons of a bright yellow metal, relieved the sombre shade of his dark brown coat; and, after dismounting from his horse, he eyed it affectionately for a considerable length of time, and having ordered the hostler to give it a feed of corn, he proceeded into the house. The room into which he was shown was a clean, well furnished apartment, about sixteen feet by twelve. The fire-place was exactly opposite the door, and above the mantel-piece was suspended a black silhouette of a very fat gentleman, with a Roman nose; while, on the mantel-piece itself, was laid an elegant glass case, containing a representation of the babes in the wood, in wax. A small round table was placed in the middle of the room, supported on one leg, which divided, about a foot from the ground, into three separate claws. Another table, surmounted by a large paper tea-tray, was stationed close to the wall; and five rush-bottomed chairs, ranged regularly round the room, completed the furniture of the apartment. The stranger, depositing his hat on the table that stood next him, sat down on one of the chairs we have previously mentioned, and seemed to sink into a deep reverie of not the most pleasing nature. 'Unhappy that I am!' he at last exclaimed, dashing his hand with energy upon his brow; 'whither can I turn? No where have I a friend; my uncle opposes my inclinations; Mrs. Johnson is severe and cruel to my Sophia; and she herself—wretch, wretch that I am, to have inflicted such woe on so gentle, so susceptible a heart!'"

"Stop now, Billy; does your hero exclaim all this in the small room you so circumstantially described, sitting alone by himself, without even the waiter to sympathize in his griefs?"

"To be sure he does. Waiter? nonsense; stop till you know who he is."

"Saying these words, he rested his head on his hand, and betrayed by the frequency of his sighs, the sorrow that oppressed his breast. 'Yet why,' he exclaimed, starting up, 'why give way to dejection? why surrender hope because friends prove unpropitious? So long as my Sophia continues true, never, never, never shall I despair.' He rung the small bell upon the table with great vehemence, and having ordered a beef-steak and pickles to be ready for him at ten o'clock, he rushed, with renewed confidence and spirit, into the open air. On coming out into the street, he found the scene considerably altered. The gray light of twilight had now faded into night, and the moon was sailing high in heaven, attended by her galaxy of stars. The tower of the ruined monastery, which imparts such an air of grace and dignity to the town of Bury St. Edmunds, was now no longer revealed to the eye by the mellowing rays of the declining sun, but rested in a deep shade, save where it was partially illuminated by the moon-beams, as they struggled through the foliage of the trees. Still indulging in melancholy thoughts, the stranger directed his steps towards the old bridge, and sighed at the remembrance of ruined magnificence as he passed the abbey wall. The wind by this time had risen, without his having perceived it. Dense masses of cloud had congregated in the sky, and occasionally obscured the moon for a moment, and then floated past her, with their dark edges tipped with her silver light, like a rich shawl of the darkest cashmere wool, fringed, as we sometimes may remark, with bright and glittering colours. He had now approached very near the water, when he thought he heard steps close to him, and waited impatiently for a transient glimpse of moonlight, to discover from whom the sounds proceeded. The steps seemed those of a heavy man, and occasionally he thought he detected the clank of spurs. He placed himself as much as possible beneath the shelter of the abbey wall, and with considerable excitement waited for the gratification of his curiosity. A thin haze now passed over the moon, and revealed the figure on the opposite side of the water, but whether a male or female, the light did not yet enable him to discover. Suddenly, however, he heard a violent splash in the river, and instinctively rushed forward. 'For heaven's sake, stop,' he exclaimed, 'whoever you are, for I solemnly assure you, you have fallen into the water!' 'Yare, yare, hold in your bellowing tackle,' replied the object thus addressed, 'do you think I don't know water from land, especially when it's running into my boots?' 'The channel, perchance, is deep; take care of your steps, for if it takes you over the head, and you cannot swim, you will very probably be drowned.'

"The traveller, however, made no answer to this, and the deepest silence succeeded to the previous disturbance in the water. 'Is it possible,' thought the stranger, 'can the individual be already drowned? At least let me try to save him, if, indeed, it be not already too late.' Urged on by these generous feelings, he rushed into the stream; but, greatly to his surprise, he found that he arrived at the other side, without having waded nearly up to his knee; and what added to his astonishment was, that the person whom he had addressed was no where to be seen. He perambulated every part of the street, but could not anywhere find the object of his search; and what increased his disappointment was, that he began to have a strange idea of having somewhere or other heard the traveller's voice before. Bewildered, and in a state of considerable suspense, he was now warned by his appetite, and also by a fit of coughing, which he considered was probably brought on by having wet his feet in his humane endeavours, that it was time for him to pursue his way back to the inn. He had not proceeded far, when he felt a heavy hand laid on his shoulder, and a voice muttered in his ear, 'Kites are abroad—beware.' He turned round to the speaker, and saw only a closely muffled figure, but could not distinguish any features. 'Kites?' he said—'Thank heaven, I care nothing for any kites; they can do no harm to me.' 'The wolf attacks not the shepherd, yet he guards against it for the sake of his flock. Know you of no timid dove whom the kite may wound? Listen.' He applied his lips close to the stranger's ear, and whispered some words, which had a surprising effect. 'To-night, say you?' said the stranger. 'Ay, to-night,' he replied; 'ere the gray dawn, you shall see me again. Farewell!' So saying, the mysterious figure disappeared into one of the smaller streets, and left the stranger to pursue his walk alone. His mind was now in a complete chaos. The information which his visitant had given him was of the most perplexing nature. Sometimes he was half inclined to doubt its truth; at others, he determined to forego his beef-steak and pickles, and proceed instantly to ascertain whether it was true or false. Amidst these conflicting feelings he arrived at his room. 'Supper's quite ready, sir,' said the waiter; 'what do you please to drink, sir?' 'Is your ale mild?' 'Yea, very good indeed, sir.' 'Then bring me a quart of ale.' 'Directly, sir. A note for you, sir.' 'A note for me! where? when? how did it come?' 'A sailor brought it a few minutes ago—Steak's quite hot, sir.'

"The stranger seized the note with avidity. It had no address, and was written in such a miserable hand as to render it difficult to make out its meaning. He at last, however, deciphered it, and found it to contain these words: 'If you be he as comes from Bungay; and cares for S. M., you will not fail to be in St. Mary's church-yard at half past eleven to-night. Yours, Tom Tyger.' 'To night, in St. Mary's church-yard,' he muttered, inaudibly. 'The plot thickens round me on every side; first, the stranger who disappeared in so marvellous a manner near the bridge; then the person who addressed me on my way hither, and who seemed to know what I had believed hidden from every human being, except one; and now this letter, pointing so manifestly to my dear Sophia! In fact, I know not what to think.' In this state of uncertainty, he paid his respects to the viands before him, and had nearly succeeded in demolishing every particle of the solids, when the door opened, and a gentleman walked into the room. 'Servant, sir,' said the intruder; 'hopes I don't incommode you; but finding as the house be chokeful, takes the liberty to walk in here.' 'Sir,' said our hero, swallowing the last morsel with a gulp, 'I certainly hoped to be secure from interruption.' 'Don't mention it, I beg, my dear sir,' replied the new comer, taking off his great-coat, and throwing himself on a chair; 'don't say a word of it—I knew—indeed, I told the waiter, I was sure you would be delighted to have a companion. Is the beer good, sir?' As he said these words, he laid hold of the pewter vessel containing the whole of our hero's quart, and nodding familiarly, drained it to the very bottom. 'Sir,' said our hero, in a passion, 'what do you mean by that?' 'By what, my good friend; what makes you so angry?' 'Angry? who the deuce can submit to be intruded on by a fellow who flops himself down without ceremony at another gentleman's table, and drinks up every drop of his beer?' 'Fellow?' replied the other: 'I'd have you for to know, sir, I'm no fellow of your'n. Confound you and your beer too—can't you order another quart? If it's too much for you, I shall be very happy to help you to finish it—so ring the bell, and order in a supply.' 'Who are you, sir?' roared our hero, in a prodigious rage—'who are you, sir, who order me to ring bells, and send for more beer, which you would infallibly pour into your own throat? Sir, I won't stand it, and if you don't take care, I'll throw you neck and heels out of this window into the street.' 'Now, listen,' said the other, very composedly: 'in the first place, this window opens on the stable yard, and not on the street. In the next place, look at my shoulders, and then at your own. In the third place, sit quietly down in your seat, for even wet feet, I see, can scarcely cure your courage.' 'How do you know my feet are wet, sir?' said our hero, still irate; 'are you the person who—' 'Ha—ha—ha! so your curiosity's raised at last! Come, come, let us have in some more beer; we shall be good friends by and by.' 'Sir, you are one of the most extraordinary impudent men I ever saw.' 'You may say that, with your own ugly mouth.' 'Ugly mouth! what the deuce—' 'There now, you're in a rage again—always flying your kites—they'll bring you on your back some day.' These words were said with the most provoking calmness, and an emphasis was laid on the word kites, which strongly arrested our hero's attention. Resolved to gratify his curiosity, he sat down, and said, with as much softness as he could assume—'Sir, your conduct is undoubtedly very strange; you came in when I had just finished my beef-steak—' 'Gadso,' interrupted the intruder, 'and I've kept you all this time from your cheese! Here, waiter, waiter! bring this gentleman's cheese—and, waiter, bring in a couple of plates—and, waiter, do you hear, fill up the gentleman's pot with the same sort of beer, for I feel myself uncommonly thirsty again.' Our hero checked himself as much as possible while his forced guest gave his orders, and resumed, 'You have made yourself quite at home in my apartment; you have persisted in forcing yourself into conversation with me, and in the course of it you have twice made allusions to affairs which happened to me this night. Now, tell me who you are, and what possible interest you can take in me and my concerns.' 'Now,' said the other, 'you speak like a man. I have certainly made myself at home in your apartment, and enjoyed a very pleasant conversation with you, although it was rather noisy on your part. Who I am can be nothing to you; and as to being interested in you and your concerns, you and your concerns may go to the d—l, for I don't care a brass farthing for none on ye—I'll thank you for a piece of that there cheese.'

"As he said this, he seized the cheese, and helped himself in no sparing manner, drawing near to him at the same time the replenished beer jug. Our hero sat eyeing him in a state of boiling impatience, wondering to what pitch of familiarity his strange companion would proceed. In perfect silence, meantime, that worthy gentleman continued his labours; and, after having satisfied himself on the Glo'ster, [cheese] he again, and with the same absorbing effects, applied the liquid to his lips. 'Hah!' he said, drawing in his breath as he placed the now empty receptacle on the table, 'how very refreshing it is! Don't you find yourself greatly invigorated with the beer, sir?' 'Sir, I never met with such treatment! Sir, you're a robber, an uncivil fellow, a cheat! I declare, on the word of a thirsty man, I have not tasted a drop of beer to-night—thanks to your eternally seizing possession of the jug. What you mean by it, I don't know; but you or I must leave this room immediately.' 'Sorry you're going, indeed sir,' said the gentleman thus addressed; 'couldn't you stay a few minutes longer? Well, if you must go, it can't be helped'

I suppose. Don't forget your bill for the supper, and two quarts of beer.' 'Villain! rascal!' cried our hero, seizing his heavy handled whip. 'Oho! is that your kindness to your supper companion? Here's summat to match it,' replied the other, presenting a pistol which he pulled from his side pocket. 'But I see what you wish. I'll give you a helping hand into St. Mary's church-yard, before your time too. Ah! touched ye there—I see. What! won't you give one side with your carrion thumper?' 'You utterly amaze me,' replied our hero, resuming his seat. 'How do you come to know that I wish to go to St. Mary's church-yard? Pray, tell me one thing—is your name Thomas Tyger?' 'No sir, my name is no such thing. I know the difference, I assure you, 'tween a dog's name and a man's, though I can't say I see much difference 'tween a Bungay man and a fool.' 'Your knowledge is amazing. You are a perfect riddle to me; a wonder, a rebus, a conundrum, an enigma!' 'Come—keep a civil tongue in your head, and call no names. I'm no more an enigma nor you are, nor no other trade you mention, but a plain horse-dealer at your service, with as pretty a bit of blood in the stable as ever eyes saw. She'll carry your weight to Bungay to-night 'tween twelve and three easy.' 'Have you indeed such an animal?' 'Ay, that I have. Be that long-tailed bay pony yours, with the star on's face?' 'Yes.' 'Well, let's see if we can't make a swap on't. She'll walk ye grand, trot amazin'; and as for her gallop, la! love ye! ye never saw nothin' like it.'

"As our hero had no great confidence in the speed of his own horse, and knew that he should probably require to go a great distance in as short a time as possible, he felt strongly inclined to accede to the worthy horse-dealer's proposal of an exchange. For this purpose, after a little preliminary conversation, they adjourned into the stable to settle the terms of the treaty. There we shall leave them for a while, and now proceed to give the reader some new information, and introduce him to some other personages in the following chapter.

"Bravo, bravo, Billy, upon my word! Why, Tompkinson will soon be as great a name as Scott. You draw characters in the most spirited manner. Your conversations are as natural as if they were reported by Gurney; and, in short, I think you will one day become a very great man."

"Nay, now, Simson, do you really think it good, or are you only bamming me?"

"Bamming you! Impossible. But without troubling you to read any more, can you not just give me a slight idea of the issue of the story? Who is the stranger, for instance, who meets with all these adventures in Bury St. Edmund's?"

"Why, he's the hero of the book—a Bungay man, in love with Sophia Malton, who is an heiress. Her mother, of course, objects to the marriage, and manœuvres to bestow her on Sir Gregory Grumps, who is rich, and old, and ridiculous. The horse-dealer acts a prominent part in the story. The horse he exchanges with Fitz-Reginald Montresor (that's the hero, you know) turns out to be stolen. At the end of the first volume, Fitz-Reginald is tried for the theft; the evidence is unaccountably strong against him, and at last he is condemned to death, and left for execution. The heroine, meantime, uses all her influence to save him; escapes from her mother's house and makes a pilgrimage on foot to intercede with Lord Tenterden, but without effect. She faints in the streets, and is brought before Sir Richard Birnie."

"But do you give real names?"

"Oh, no. I call Lord Tenterden, Lord Denderten; and Sir Richard Birnie, I call Sir Thundering Pompus. She is ordered to the treadmill as a vagrant, when, luckily, just when she is on her way to the house of correction, she is rescued by Sir Gregory Grumps. By him she is taken to a distant relation of her own, living in Grosvenor Square, which enables me to introduce a good deal of high life. Almack's, Vauxhall, the opera, and the Surry theatre; and this takes us to the end of the second volume. The third volume begins with a letter from Fitz-Reginald, still in prison, but with his punishment changed to transportation for life. In it he bids Sophia farewell, and releases her from her engagements, and he proceeds in due course of time to the settlements at New South Wales. There, however, he luckily recognises an old and intimate friend in the attorney-general, by whose interest his situation is made comparatively easy. The horse-dealer, in the meantime, goes on in his course of wickedness, and Sophia begins, however reluctantly, to comply with her family's wishes, in accepting Sir Gregory; but, just on the eve of acceding to their solicitations, a note is mysteriously put into her hands, offering, on payment of a considerable sum, to prove the innocence of her lover. This of course distracts her from her design; and she promises all that her secret informer desires. In this business she employs an attorney, who, contrary to the general practice among us novel writers, is honest. He tracks out the author; discovers the horse-dealer to be the thief, and false witness on Fitz-Reginald's trial; the villain at last confesses, and is executed; Sir Gregory is discarded; three or four cousins of Fitz-Reginald's die, and enable him to step into his distant relations' titles and estates; and Sophia's mother can now have no objection to such a distinguished son-in-law as Lord Bungay: the good are rewarded, the bad are punished; and the third volume concludes with an affecting parting between the hero, now fully restored to his character, and his friend the attorney-general in New South Wales, leaving his happiness, on his arrival in England, to the reader's imagination."

"Capital! and very original too. But there are a few things I should like to ask you. In the chapter you read me, you mention a Mrs. Jobson; and, in the rest of the story, you always talk of Sophia's mother; now—"

"Why, they are one and the same thing; but in novels bad mothers are always married to second husbands, in order that the daughter may have a rational excuse for hating her step-father; for that, you know, is always allowed, without any breach of filial piety."

"Then the hero—you'll excuse me, you know, if I take the liberty of a friend—the hero—doesn't he strike you to be a bit of a softish Johnny Rawish sort of a fellow? rather milk-and-watery? eh?"

"Oh, I don't know; I think he's just like other people's heroes; he's handsome, you know, and very like a gentleman; and I don't know what more any man has a right to expect."

"The horse-dealer, too, strikes me to be a little too clever; to act too many characters; to be, in short, made too much of."

"Now, Simson, I think you're getting a little captious. Just look at other people's villains; mine is not a bit cleverer than any novel blackguard you'll point out. And as to acting too many characters, why look at Rob Roy, or Fenella, or Ganleaze, or—"

"Now, my dear Tompkinson, that is too bad. Why, you whipper-snapper, do you compare your ridiculous, unnatural abortion of a thief and horse-dealer to any of Sir Walter's glorious imaginations? I never thought you so egregiously absurd before."

"O you didn't, didn't ye? We shall see about being absurd. Mr. Blackwood will show you whether I'm absurd or not."

"Why, do you think Mr. Blackwood, or any man in his senses, will give you three farthings for such a rigmorole of nonsense?"

"We shall see, Mr. Simson; we shall see, sir. I wish you good night. Our friendship is over, sir; our friendship is over. The sooner you can pay me that trifle I lent you the better. Good night, sir."

So! there goes a fool! He'll get cool upon it in the morning; if not, I have lost a very good-natured, easy, silly, kind, accommodating sort of friend. What tempted the blockhead to ask my opinion upon his book? If it should be accepted, published, puffed, there will be no bearing the puppy's vanity. Billy Tompkinson the author of a popular novel! The author of Waverley ought to be pricked half dead with sharp-pointed quills, and ducked, pro bono publico, in printer's ink. But if Billy gets paid for this, gets a swinging douceur on a second edition, and wallows in wealth from the exercise of his pen? well, what then? Egad, I'll write a popular novel myself—that's all.

A TURKISH SONG.

Thou wretch, of sordid mould,
Who poises love with gold,
And hugs the yellow store,
Till passion's reign is o'er,
Can never hope to prove
The sweets of mutual love.
But O, the generous youth,
Inspired by love and truth,
Who deems no price too high,
That wins affection's sigh,
'Tis he alone can move
A maiden's heart to love.
A maiden's heart is cold
Till touch'd with dart of gold,
All feathered from the dove,
And barb'd by infant love.
Its polished point must be
The weapon of the bee,
Adorn'd and hid from view,
By gems of honey-dew;
It then so charms the eye
We deem no danger nigh,
Till deep within the heart
Is felt the stinging smart.

A FRAGMENT.

BY ISIDORA.

He flies! his foes are hard behind,
 Their vengeful shouts are on the wind;
 Is it a coward's act to fly—
 Or shall he face their front, and die!
 Wild thoughts are rushing through his mind,
 His headlong speed outstrips the wind!
 Could that good steed still bear him on,
 The sheltering cot might yet be won.
 Already through the night's thick haze
 He sees its burnish'd casements blaze!
 What sudden thought has check'd his speed?
 No spur impels the lagging steed.
 Even could he gain yon welcome roof,
 Could that fierce band be kept aloof?
 There, there, his wonted tread to hear,
 His fair bride bends her listening ear;
 Her blue eye on the wicket turn'd—
 And long her beacon lamp has burn'd.
 Oft has she sent her glances bright
 Through the deep shroud that veils the night,
 And oft his welcome step to hear
 Shook back the ringlets from her ear,
 Like threads of gold imperl'd, wet with the sudden tear.

One moment through his whirling brain
 These thoughts have rushed, and now again
 Hope yields to deep and stern despair.
 What! shall he guide the foemen there!
 To his own hearth—within her sight,
 Yon flower of beauty, pure and bright,
 With blood and conflict to defile
 The roof made sacred by her smile;
 To combat, struggle, and o'ercome
 Her idol in his own blest home!
 Shall her heart wither at the sight
 Of carnage and unequal fight!
 Shall her ears drink his dying groan?
 No! if he falls he falls alone,
 Unseen by her—his fate perchance unknown!

He turns—their shouts of triumph rise,
 As, urged by maddening thought, he flies
 Through yon deep forest's tangled shade,
 Hopeless of flight, or ruth, or aid.
 Life, peril, hate, are all forgot,
 All lost in one absorbing thought—
 To lead yon ruffian band afar
 From that low casement's beacon star!
 Exulting in his headlong speed,
 Still urging on his panting steed,
 Till horse and rider, both o'ercome,
 Have halted to await the doom,
 Which, borne upon the midnight wind,
 Peals in those madd'ning shouts behind;
 When lo! uprising fierce and bright,
 As their red blades flash o'er his sight
 A watch-fire bursts upon the gloom of night.

Once more he turns, and strives to fly—
 'Tis won! a band of brothers nigh,
 Roused by those shouts from brief repose,
 Are circling round his vengeful foes:
 The cry of death is on the blast—
 The ruffian leader shouts his last!
 O'ercome by numbers and by right,
 Their swords have failed them in the fight.
 He conquers now who lately fled—
 A charmed spell was o'er his head:
 Thine, holy love, the victory;
 Thy impulse sway'd his soul, and he Shall ne'er unaided fall who worships thee.

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTERS FROM LONDON,

To the Editor of the New-York Mirror.

NUMBER SEVEN.

London, October 6.

THE crude and indigestible notions concerning England and English affairs afloat in the United States, are more to be regretted than wondered at, when it is considered that, notwithstanding the number of slipshod journals that have been published by people who have galloped through the country, few sound substantial works from the pens of well-informed and unbiassed Americans who have resided for some time here, have as yet made their appearance on your side of the water. The degree of ignorance prevailing in this country, respecting America, to be sure is ten, ay, fifty times as great, and questions are asked by respectable people that are perfectly astounding; to wit, whether Boston belongs to the British—whether New-York is situated on the St. Lawrence?—in what part of the United States is Quebec, where General Wolfe was killed? &c. &c.; but then they acknowledge their ignorance, and merely ask silly questions. Now Americans, in discoursing of England, are exceedingly dogmatical. They think they know exactly the state of affairs here, and how all things are done and transacted, and indeed will scarcely allow an Englishman to give an opinion respecting his own country, setting him down, if he differ from their views, as either ignorant, partial, or prejudiced. The misfortune is, that Americans glean most of their information respecting England from English newspapers and party periodicals, or at least from such portions of them as are extracted into their own. Now nothing can be more fallacious and incorrect than the information so obtained, unless the reader is perfectly familiar with the state of parties, and the character and motives of the several papers, so that he knows just what to believe and what to disbelieve, and the requisite allowance to be made for the different colourings given to the same statement; for though many of the English newspapers enjoy a deservedly high reputation, and will not descend to low abuse, or be guilty of direct falsehood, yet with a great portion both are habitual, and the very best of them, from party motives, will soften and throw into the shade whatever makes against their own side of the question, and colour and exaggerate what is in their favour. If an Englishman attempt to explain this to an American, he replies, "Oh, I know nothing about that—here is what your own papers say—if I am not to believe them, what am I to believe?" There appears at first to be some reason in the question; but, supposing a London merchant were to go into the New-England coffee-house here among a few sharp-witted, intelligent Yankees, and proceed to give the very flattering portraits of eminent Americans—Jefferson, DeWitt Clinton, General Jackson, Henry Clay, or Martin Van Buren, as drawn by the portion of the press opposed to them during the heat of political contest, and say unto them, "So, these monsters, these villains, murderers, knaves, fools, place-hunters, and sycophants, are what you call your great men in America, and place at the head of your government—a pretty government, truly!" the Yankees would laugh at him, and tell him, right enough, that he knew nothing about the matter; but he might, with equal justice, retort, "I only say what your own papers say—if I am not to believe them, what am I to believe?" I think this a fair parallel case, more especially as the lower class of American journals are in the regular habit of extracting whatever paragraphs or statements tend to lower foreign nations in the eyes of their readers, thus flattering the self-love of the multitude by the comparison immediately drawn between their own condition and that of the people of those countries.

The actual state of England is, I think very much misunderstood in the United States. Doubtless there is frequently great distress in the manufacturing districts, the consequence—perhaps the natural consequence—of such large bodies of men depending entirely on one source for their subsistence; and that there is something radically wrong in parts of her agricultural system is sufficiently evinced by the state of the poor-laws in certain districts; but for all this, the distress is only very partial. As a celebrated writer lately said, in speaking of the condition of the nation, "Though one wave may have receded, the tide is still coming steadily in." Of this all must be sensible who have passed through the large towns in England. The rapid extension of those towns in every direction—the various schemes on foot for adding to the facilities of communication between them—the plans for roads, canals, tunnels, bridges, railways, all over the country—the excavation of new docks, and rearing of immense warehouses in maritime ports—indeed, the untiring spirit of industry and enterprise every where manifested, backed by exhaustless capital, denote any thing rather than decrepitude or decline, and are, in fact, the very antipodes of the dull stagnation of gradual decay. Many in America will hope that this picture is correct—perhaps some that it is not. Every friend of freedom and mankind will rejoice if it be true—every lover of literature, science, and the arts—indeed all the enlightened and generous-spirited among you will be glad to know that England is likely, for centuries to come, to maintain her rank among the nations; and it is only the timid, the revengeful, the meanly jealous, and such as are incapable of truly appreciating the rising greatness of their own country, who desire to exalt her by the depreciation of others, that will be sorry such is the case.

As for that incomprehensible bugbear, the national debt, perhaps I cannot do better than send you an extract from the Edinburgh Review respecting it and other matters. It may be remarked in passing, that the Edinburgh generally looks at the gloomy side of affairs along with its party, the Whigs, and makes the most of every thing:

"If we were to prophesy that in the year 1930, a population of fifty millions, better clad, fed, and lodged than the English of our time, will cover these islands—that Sussex and Huntingdonshire will be wealthier than the wealthiest parts of the west-riding of Yorkshire are now—that cultivation, rich as that of a flower-garden, will be carried up to the very tops of Ben Nevis and Helvellyn—that machines, constructed on principles yet undiscovered, will be in every house—that there will be no highways but rail-roads, no travelling but by steam—that our debt, vast as it seems to us, will appear to our great grandchildren a trifling incumbrance that might easily be paid off in a year or two—many people would think us insane. We prophesy nothing, but this we say—if any person had told the parliament, which met in perplexity and terror after the crash of 1790, that in 1830 the wealth of England would surpass all their wildest dreams—that the annual revenue would equal the principal of that debt which they considered as an intolerable burden—that for one man of ten thousand pounds then living there would be five men of five thousand pounds—that London would be twice as large and twice as populous, and that nevertheless mortality would have diminished to one half what it then was—that the post-office would bring more into the exchequer than the excise and customs had brought in together under Charles the second—that stage-coaches would run from London to York in twenty-four hours—that men would sail without wind, and begin to ride without horses—our ancestors would have given as much credit to the prediction as they gave to Gulliver's Travels. Yet the prediction would have been true; and they would have perceived that it was not altogether absurd, if they had considered that the country was then raising every year a sum that would have purchased the fee-simple of the revenue of the plantagenets—ten times what supported the government of Elizabeth—three times what, in the time of Oliver Cromwell, had been considered intolerably oppressive. To almost all men the state of things under which they live seems to be the necessary state of things. We have heard it said that five per cent. is the natural interest of money, that twelve is the natural number of a jury, that forty shillings is the natural qualification of a county voter. Hence it is, that though, in every age, every body knows that up to his own time progressive improvement has been taking place, nobody seems to reckon on any improvement during the next generation. We cannot absolutely prove that those are in error who tell us that society has reached a turning point—that we have seen our best days; but so said all who came before us, and with just as much apparent reason. "A million a year will beggar us," said the patriots of 1640. "Two millions a year will grind the country to powder," was the cry in 1660. "Six millions a year and a debt of fifty millions!" exclaimed Swift—"the high allies have been the ruin of us." "A hundred and forty millions of debt!" said Junius—"well may we say that we owe Lord Chatham more than we will ever pay, if we owe him such a load as this." "Two hundred and forty millions of debt!" cried the statesmen of 1783 in chorus—"what abilities or what economy on the part of a minister can save a country so burdened!"

John Bull is, in truth, a very curious animal, and has the happiest knack in the world at magnifying evils, and making mountains out of mole-hills. He is "enamoured of calamity," and never feels himself more comfortable than when he is complaining of being ruined and miserable. He eats his dinner, drinks his wine or porter, smokes his pipe, and then joins in the chorus of "Let us all be unhappy together!" If a revolution, similar to what has taken place in Paris, had come to pass in London, and been attended with similar results, instead of rejoicing, flattering, and complimenting each other, like the light-hearted Frenchmen—extolling their own exertions to the skies, and calling themselves the most heroic and magnanimous nation on the face of the earth—the John Bulls, long before this, would have been lamenting their late dreadful misfortunes, and the awful consequences thereof. And if they had had to form themselves into a National Guard, instead of marching on their way, as proud as peacocks, like the gay Parisians, with music playing, colours flying, and hats and handkerchiefs waving—the Bulls would have been trudging along with their muskets, grumbling and swearing as they went, and lamenting the blessed predicament they were placed in of having to neglect their business half the week and go a soldiering. John wants some striking national visitation to bring him to his senses. Some how or other, however, he has lost his faith in radicalism, and though Hunt and Cobbett, and the rest of them continue to tell him, with unabated zeal, of his sorrows and his sufferings, his debts and his difficulties, he no longer listens to the interesting detail with the zest he did formerly. Facts speak for themselves. There was an election for coroner in London the other day, at which not less than fifty or sixty thousand people were present. To this assembly Hunt announced his intention of calling a grand meeting of the working classes together on Kennington common, for the double purpose of complimenting the French, and complaining to the king of their own grievances. The common was selected, I presume, in order to have plenty of room; but lo! instead of seventy or eighty thousand people, little more than a twentieth part of that number listened to Mr. H.'s elegant and sensible declamations. Notwithstanding the groans and hisses with which this person is frequently greeted at public meetings, he still finds that his harangues sell him a sufficiently extra number of bottles of blacking to make it an object for him to thrust himself in the way, and his patriotism will doubtless last as long as he finds it a means of vending "Hunt's matchless."

FAME.

BY WILLIAM PITT PALMER.

"So strong the zeal to immortalize himself
Beats in the breast of man, that e'en a few
Few transient years, won from th' abysses abhor'd
Of blank oblivion, seem a glorious prize,
And even to a clown."—Cooper.

MAN was born for action, and is fitted with motives and propensities accordingly. There is a restlessness in his nature, which neither weariness, the decrepitude of age, nor even the attainment of the desired object, can entirely subdue. The physical power may slumber, but the mind remains sleepless and vigilant, and scorning the clog and burden of its mortal accompaniment, it goes forth, an unchained existence, to revel amidst scenes of ideal glory which the waking eye has never witnessed. It is the property of matter to be passive and inert; of spirit, to be free and exursive. Mind alone is the perpetual motion for which the visionary has sought diligently, but without success. And what is the great main-spring of its activity? Is it the unmixed desire for independence—the longing after added and superadded treasures, or the search for present rather than prospective happiness that operates as a continued excitement upon the soul, that it cannot throw off for a season the cares and business of life? These are comparatively but minor springs in the machine. But the hope of distinction, of gaining a hold in the remembrance of mankind, the untiring and unyielding grasp for place and power as conducive to fame,—these are the impulse and fascination to which man is subservient. There is something degrading in the thought, that the measure of his earthly existence is but a span; something abasing in the prospect of living nameless and unnoted through that transitory duration; something revolting to his proud dignity in the idea of being a blank in society, displaying no distinctive peculiarity of mind or muscle, which shall set him apart from the common herd. But still more humiliating is the thought, that presently he shall lie down in the mute grave; that perchance his fellows will take no note of his departure; that he shall leave no beacon for the gaze of posterity; that the gloom of forgetfulness shall gather speedily and heavily over his name, shrouding every memorial of his being in the very bosom of friendship; and that ere long even those whose heart's blood welled from his own, shall forget the path to his sepulchre, and the weed that grows rankly above it, and the moss which buries up the record of its possessor. Besides, in spite of the glorious assurances of revelation, at times these come to all the doubts of another existence, and the appalling fears of annihilation; and then the abhorrence of oblivion and the anxiety for fame, are reciprocally augmented. Therefore man mocks at the very elements, at the rougher and more fearful passions of kindred adventurers, whilst contending for celebrity. Hope points to the high places of renown around which genius has concentrated the effulgence of all ages, and his imagination is dazzled by the alluring radiance. He looks to the relentless past, in whose deep shadow lie wrapped the memories of earth's countless undistinguished millions; and he girds himself for higher and sterner effort. Ambition cries onward! and the siren-notes of pleasure fall charmless upon his ear. Onward and still upward! is the cry; and the importunities of nature, the tears of slighted love, the chidings of injured friendship, and the sepulchral warning of conscience herself, cannot stay him in his career. Fame is the El Dorado of human wishes. For this they have laughed at jeopardies of every form. For this they have bowed their way through a parent's or brother's bosom to a throne, treading recklessly upon the deposed dead, and leaving behind them the footprints of kindred blood, as they ascended the dizzying eminence. For this they have rushed to the battle-field, or mounted the forlorn breach, or entered the arena to grapple with the savage monster of the desert, or swept proudly to the lists, to break lance and shield beneath the applauding gaze of assembled beauty and chivalry. For this too, the student trims his lamp and toils on, solacing his midnight labours with the charms of eloquence and song, developing new principles, wresting from nature the secrets of her operations, striking out bold inventions that more than realize the wildest visions of antiquity, and giving order, and boundaries, and names to the starry and mysterious revolutions that circle around him. Yet how few have been successful in their aim? How few have gained that doubtful good, the aliquid immensum infinitumque for which they struggled—a name which shall live and be hallowed through all futurity? And how many have faltered in the race, or turned back in despair and withered from the earth, leaving behind them not the least memorial or manifestation that they have been?

It is difficult to combine the pursuit of fame with the strict performance of all personal and relative duties. Men of severe morality have condemned it altogether, as being at variance with that spirit of humility, to which christianity has promised a blessed inheritance. Before we utterly discard it, however, we should remember that the effort for whatsoever is honourable and of good report, is not only not forbidden, but enjoined as an obligation. Moreover, in our arbitrament of the point, we should distinguish between the narrow-minded, grovelling ambition that centres in self, and the liberal aim for distinction, which, while it seeks the glory and prosperity of the individual, regards that of the community also. The one was the ambition of Charles X., the other the ambition of La Fayette. The former sought exaltation by degrading those whom nature had made his equals; the other, by raising to his own proud elevation as an enlightened freeman, the debased and down-trodden of every land. And the name of the haughty Bourbon shall be forgotten, or live but as a by-word of contempt; while that of the citizen philanthropist shall go down with the march of liberal principles, to the remotest future. The oppressed shall whisper it in their dreams of emancipation: the redeemed from bondage shall pronounce it with hallowed enthusiasm at their jubilees; and to those who go out to do battle for freedom and human rights, it shall be as a pillar of fire to animate and to guide.

The desire of fame is common to every modification of humanity. No one, however high or low, however independent, or apathetic, or reckless of the world's opinion, is wholly unmoved by this active stimulant. In the bitterness of disappointed pride, the misanthrope may spurn the ties of society, and turn away to the unvisited wilds of nature, making their solitude his "dwelling-place"—still his ear shall at times thirst for the remembered music of applause to which all, however abject, have listened, and his spirit shall be stirred by the wish that his name may live, if not "entwined with his land's language," at least with the memories of some faithful heart. No matter how thoroughly convicted of the instability of fame, no matter how cloyed with the vanity of human honours, or weary of this sublunary existence and blessed with the animating certainty of a better,—there is not that man living who has not, at one time or other, yielded up his thoughts to visions of renown. Even so did the magnanimous Milton, when, though blind, procried and in poverty, he proposed to himself, with the exalted consciousness of powers adequate to the task, and a prophetic anticipation of immortality, "to celebrate in glorious and lofty hymns the throne and equipage of God's almightiness, and what he works, and what he suffers to be wrought with high providence in his church; to sing victorious agonies of martyrs and saints, the deeds and triumphs of just and pious nations, doing valiantly through faith against the enemies of Christ; to deplore the general relapses of kingdoms and states from justice and God's true worship; lastly, whatsoever in religion is holy and sublime, in virtue amiable or grave, whatsoever hath passion or admiration in all the changes of that which is called fortune from without, or the wily subtleties and reflexes of man's thoughts from within; all these things with a solid and treatable smoothness to paint out and describe." Such was the magnificent theme and such the lofty undertaking upon which Milton embarked his hopes of immortal renown—a theme shadowing forth time and eternity, heaven and hell, and all forms of spiritual and material existence, and the attributes of all intelligences, whether limited and clay-bound as in man, or infinite and all-perfect as in God—a theme apparently beyond the scope of mortal daring, and one fitted to employ the harp and challenge the sublimest powers and revelations of the most gifted seraph. Yet he shrunk not from the self-allotted task,—

"though fall'n on evil days,
On evil days though fall'n, and evil tongues;
In darkness, and with dangers compass'd round"— for the desire of celebrity which sprung up with his youth, unsubdued by the multiplied vicissitudes of a perilous life was mighty to solace and encourage during the friendlessness and despondency of age. Therefore he girded himself for the effort, not with a rash enthusiasm, but with a "sober certainty" of success; and while the records of science, and the beauty and grandeur of the outward creation, were veiled forever from his sight, his intellectual vision expatiated amidst a paradise of glorious memories, conceptions, and imaginations rich with the promise of immortality. What cared he for the utter obscuration of this "visible diurnal sphere," while clearly upon his unclouded spirit arose the effulgence of an ever-during renown! What cared he for the neglect, the contumely, the scorn and scoffs and persecutions of inveterate malice, while in anticipation he listened to the swelling plaudits of enlightened millions, whose admiration was to deepen to the end of time!

The desire of fame is as permanent as it is universal. Other passions are more under the control of contingencies, wasting away or varying as our destinies are unfolded. Hope loses itself in fruition, anger in revenge, and love changes with absence or the realization of its idol's imperfection—but the longing of ambition remains steadfast. It is the sleeplessness of the mind for which there is no opiate—the feverish thirst of the soul, which, like that morbid and quenchless one of the body, continues unappeased after the most liberal draught. It was this that wrung tears from the youthful conqueror, when amid crowns, and laurels, and high praises of his lofty triumphs, he sighed that there were no other worlds from which to take bonds of immortality. Unsatisfied with the title of great in prowess and heroic achievements, he purposed to obtain distinction in another sphere; and died in the endeavour to gain the paltry glory of the chief of bacchanals. In our own times a mightier than he of Macedon has manifested the same weakness, or rather the despotism of that passion to which success brings no satiety, when after returning triumphant from a hundred battles, whose victories gave to him a supremacy unparalleled and almost absolute, he sought, with a childish infatuation, to add to his multiplied honours the empty title of king! This eagerness for celebrity, like the miser's for gold, increases with every new acquisition; nor can poverty, or disappointment, or age, though powerful to control other emotions, either weaken or subdue it. The same aspirations for distinction which glowed in the anticipations of youth, and invigorated the energies of manhood, finds us not during the infirmities of declining years; but go on with us to the last, to be swallowed up only in the deepening shadows and stupefaction of death itself.

Numerous and diversified also are the opportunities for acquiring fame, and the ten thousand avenues to her temple, though thronged with votaries, are open to all; inasmuch as each is furnished with peculiar endowments which give to him a specific individuality. There is no pursuit so contemptible that ambition shall altogether overlook it; no art or calling however mean, and no combination of circumstances however insignificant, from which men have not gained a comparative notoriety—circumscribed and unenviable perhaps, but still it was that for which they panted. To the school-boy poet the corner of a country newspaper offers as ample and inviting a theatre for the attainment of the coveted applause, as the pages of the Edinburgh Review, or the carte blanche of a novel or history to the magnificent powers of Sir Walter Scott; and if "ignorance be bliss," the limited and evanescent celebrity of the former affords as much personal gratification, as the far-reaching and enduring renown of the latter. The same is true of all the games and competitions in which human pride and human capabilities can be enlisted, from the village wrestling-ring, to the battle-field where the liberties of a nation are at stake. To the simple rustic the one presents as stirring an opportunity for the display of his rude accomplishments, as does the other to the heroic champion of freedom; and though their respective glories shall differ as twilight from midnoon, it is not improbable that to both the joys of triumph are equal. I look upon this appointment of things, therefore, as one of the wisest provisions of divine wisdom. In the moral constitution of a world like this, it was necessary that every form of character should be developed, each bearing a common resemblance, yet in itself distinct and peculiar. Thus intellectual varieties must be as numerous as the almost infinite series of individuals from the first to the last human being; and their measure of fame must vary accordingly. All therefore could not be Homers or Shakespeares, Newtons or Washingtons, Luthers or St. Pauls; yet all, though less honoured by the favouritism of genius, have felt, in a greater or less degree, the cravings of that common appetite whose food is admiration. To gratify this, the resources of nature are multifold and various. While to some she has given the eagle's wing to spurn the earth and mount upwards as by ethereal paths, to the summit of fame; to others of humbler endowments, she has opened innumerable by-ways by which to ascend to their appointed height. Thus is every one, in whatever sphere he is placed, enabled to acquire a corresponding notoriety; be it in the turning of a pin or the upheaving of a pyramid, in the grouping of puppets or the marshaling of armies.

A charming moralist has observed that we are not accountable for possessing passions, but for our conduct under them. When, therefore, yielding to the influence of ambition, we should be firm and circumspect. For myself I am persuaded that an honourable pursuit of fame is lawful, so long as it does not interfere with the rights of others; for the Creator, not undesignedly,

*Os homini sublime dedit, cœlumque tueri
Jussit, et erectos ad sidera tollere vultus.*

And lest from its communion with earthly things the mind should become grovelling and debased, he fills it with lofty aspirations for renown, which speak eloquently of a nobler nature and state of existence. No matter, then, how high we fix our aim—the higher, indeed, the better—if in contending for the prize we manifest the ingenuousness and humility of magnanimous virtue.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

From the New-England Review.

REFLECTIONS OF A BELLE.

I'm weary of the crowded hall—I'm weary of the mirth
Which never lifts itself above the grosser things of earth—
I'm weary of the flatterer's tone—its music is no more,
And eye and lip may answer not its meaning as before.
I'm weary of the heartless throng—of being deemed as one
Whose spirit kindles only in the blaze of fashion's sun.

I speak in very bitterness, for I have deeply felt
The mockery of the hollow shrine at which my spirit knelt—
Mine is the requiem of years in reckless folly passed,
The wail above departed hopes on a frail venture cast;
The vain regret that steals above the wreck of squander'd hours,
Like the sighing of the autumn wind, above the faded flowers.

Oh! it is worse than mockery to list the flatterer's tone—
To lend a ready ear to thoughts the cheek must blush to own,
To hear the red lip whisper'd of, and the flowing curl and eye
Made constant themes of eulogy, extravagant and high;
And the charm of person worshipped, in a homage offer'd not
To the perfect charm of virtue and the majesty of thought.

Away—I will not fetter thus the spirit God hath given,
Nor stoop the pinion back to earth that beareth up to heaven;
I will not bow a tameless heart to fashion's iron rule,
Nor welcome with a smile alike the gifted and the fool—
No—let the throng pass coldly on—a treasured few may find
The charm of person doubly dear beneath the light of mind!

LADY LONDONDERRY'S BALL.

The marchioness of Londonderry has been giving a grand ball at Mount Stewart, his lordship's seat in Ireland. A description of this ball, written by a lady, is published in the Belfast News Letter. We extract a part of it.

Every chaise, car, and horse, for twenty miles round was engaged a fortnight ago for the "Ball at Mount Stewart!" and by five o'clock on Friday evening, the whole town of Belfast was one scene of life and motion.

By half past seven the congregated stream of equipages began to pour and roll from the town over the long bridge. By the time you passed Newtonards, the sight was beautiful; before, on the point of land which stretches into the lake, a blaze of light like fifty beacons, reddened the sky and illuminated the lake on the opposite bank. Behind, the rise of the hill gave to the view an interminable line of carriage lamps; night and the distance seeming to connect them, like a chain of comets; as you advanced you found the gates, the avenues, and even the remote paths blazing with illumination, and every window resplendent with internal light, while the music of the fine military band issuing from the hall where they played, inspired a sort of bounding animation. The great hall and the fine staircase had been converted into a lovely arbour, the contents of the hot-house and green-house contributing their joint aid to render it alike fragrant and beautiful. Entering the smaller room, which serves as an ante-room to two of great magnitude, into which it opens on either side, there stood Lady Londonderry to receive her guests. She was resplendent with jewels, which actually cast halos of variegated light about, like a succession of rainbows; not only her graceful head and beautifully formed bust and arms were enshrined in jewelry, but the front of the dress and the Persian sleeves, the girdle and stomacher, seemed formed by flexible masses of diamonds, (a very small part, it is said, of her many sets.) She stood an empress, and the surrounding groups of elegant females of rank, looked like her ladies in waiting. Lady Antrim was very brilliant in jewels, which her form is calculated to display to advantage, but she last night was a mere satellite, nearly lost in the blaze of her fair daughter's lustre. Carriage after carriage now deposited its burden, the noble hostess standing to receive party after party, till it might be fairly said her toil made grandeur a painful pre-eminence. By eleven, the three apartments open for reception rooms, were nearly filled. The ball commenced with the Marquis of Donegal and the Marchioness of Londonderry in a contre-dance; this was followed by quadrilles, and double and single sets of waltzing. Between twelve and one several officers, in brilliant uniforms, arrived, and added considerably to the gay appearance of the groups. Between one and two supper was announced. It was laid in the large dining-room, which, I am told, (and can readily believe) is the finest room in any private house in the province, also in a large room on the same floor, and on the corridor above the grand staircase, affording ample accommodation to at least four hundred and fifty persons to sit down to a splendid supper, where every luxury, in and out of season, was to be seen in profuse and elegant variety. After supper, waltzing and quadrilling were resumed, and kept up merrily till past four, when jocund day peeping in at the windows, reminded the company that it was time to retire. As to the external likeness, both of Lady Londonderry and Lady Belfast, so often placed in a sort of juxtaposition in the English papers, as being each the fashionable leader of the circle, I have already said Lady Londonderry looked like an empress, not merely from the splendour of her diamonds, which are unique, but from her air and carriage, she looks born to be a queen. Suppose we draw her as a Juno, reposing on her throne; the pure delicacy of her lily skin unsoftened by the slightest tinge of rouge, her finely chiseled features looking the most perfect tranquillity, but of a character to show they could be animated by sufficient cause to the most powerful expression. She seems to be nearly trampling on the cestus which Venus has given her, looking too proud to accept of admiration in any form but that of reverence and devotion; and putting away the conceited peacock, we will give her the snow-white bird of Leda, whose gliding motion and stately air make it her appropriate emblem. Lady Belfast is an extremely pretty woman. She is more lively and graceful than dignified; she looks with expression, and speaks with emphasis and intonation. They say a French woman speaks to her fingers' ends—Lady Belfast seems to make her very fan speak: she seems to be the medium between the too great glare and vivacity of the dauntless French woman, and the frigid coldness of the high-bred English lady; she might be chosen as a specimen of the highest order of well-bred Irish ladies; Lady Londonderry might be sent vice-regent to represent all the female majesty of every queen since the conquest.

MARRIAGE A LA MODE.

She loved him—just as modern ladies love;
Admired his figure on a rainy day,
And suffered him to reach her fallen glove;
She liked him present; if he stayed away
She did not miss him. "Men were meant to rove,"
Was still her theme! "To honour and obey,"
She had no thought of; but she looked on marriage
As something requisite to keep a carriage!
And he liked her—as much as creatures can
Who live at balls, and vegetate by night;
Not useless, since they serve to hold a fan;
Whose heads are heavy, while their heels are light;
Who, wanting other titles, are called—man!
Yet ladies liked him, he was so polite;
'Twas strange how favour from mamma he won;
And yet not strange—he was an eldest son.
He met her first at some prodigious rout,
Where all the world was voting it a bore;
She was a beauty, having just come out—
That is, she had rehearsed her part before,
And now performed it with great skill, no doubt.
She knew her points, and that the dress she wore
Set off her figure; thanks to prints and pins,
Padding conceals a multitude of sins!
Ball followed ball; they often danced together,
And though they said but little to each other,
Talking of novels, music, and the weather,
And such ball themes, he called upon her mother—
Who heard him make proposals in "high feather,"
And introduced him to her son, his brother
That was to be—and all were quite elate;
For he'd a title and a good estate!
The fair betrothed then sought thy street, Long Acre,
To choose the shape and colour of her carriage;
I know not why, but somehow a coach-maker
Appears to me, in my loose view of marriage,

A kind of matrimonial undertaker;
By this I've no intention to disparage
That blessed state, which many a damsel enters
Not knowing why—our mothers are such mentors.
The day was fixed, the dejeune was spread,
While bride's-maids simpered in their Brussels lace;
The bride shed tears at first, then bowed her head,
And thought how great a change would soon take place,
Though none might read her thoughts upon her face.
Indeed her feelings were not quite intelligible;
One thing she felt—her husband was quite "eligible!"
The marriage-service soon was blundered o'er;
Congratulations round the room were pealing;
The travelling-chariot waited at the door—
But first the bride must do a "bit of feeling;"
And so she gently sank upon the floor,
In a position such as players deal in:
A graceful attitude for loveliness,
And so contrived as not to spoil her dress!
At length they started, he and his fair prize—
A prize!—she proved a blank. Sad, stern reality
Makes happiest things seem hideous: they grew wise—
He cured of love, and she of her morality.
So throwing off the troublesome disguise,
She ran away—like other folks of quality;
Leaving her lord (she left him not a jewel)
A drive to Doctor's Commons—and a duel!

MEMOIR OF MASTER BURKE, THE IRISH ROSCIUS.

This is the most extraordinary instance of precocious genius that has appeared in Europe during the present century. At seven years of age he was introduced to the late king of England, George the Fourth, at the Pavilion at Brighton, who expressed in warm terms his admiration of his musical powers. The London critics pronounce themselves at a loss which to admire most, his histrionic or musical talents.

"O, 'tis a parlous boy."
"I spare my praises towards him,
Knowing him is enough."

Joseph Burke is descended from one of the most respectable families in the county of Galway, in Ireland; his father being nephew to Sir John Blake, and consequently first cousin to Valentine Blake, who represented the above county for some years. Mr. Burke is also, as we are informed, first or second cousin to Sir John Burke, whose family once possessed considerable estates in the county of Galway; but by adhering to the cause of Charles, they suffered in common with those who, having pledged the oath of allegiance to that monarch, refused to abandon his fortunes. The descendants, therefore, of the families who had been plundered of their possessions by Cromwell, were obliged to trust to their talents for the means of subsistence, which they employed, of course, in various ways.

Master Burke made his debut, when only five years old, on the Dublin stage, in the year 1824, in the characters of Tom Thumb and Lingo.

His success was so complete as to prognosticate to his grateful friends the certainty of future fame. He shortly after appeared at the English Opera house and the Haymarket. At the latter theatre he met with considerable applause in the characters of Dr. O'Toole, Lingo, &c.: he then quitted the metropolis and took the general provincial tour, where the versatility of his genius gave not only unqualified satisfaction to the general admirers of the drama, but obtained the encomiums of those whose powers were of matured excellence. Among others may be noticed the venerable O'Keefe, who, as a tribute to his talents, presented him (in the year 1836, at Chichester) with a pair of silver buckles, which he himself wore when a candidate for public favour; he also gave him a lock of his hair, and requested that on his death it would be worn in a ring by him. We must now notice the theatre which may be termed the key-stone of his fame—for by the excellent management of Mr. Elliston, opportunities have been offered of exhibiting Master Burke's talents in every varied hue. His first appearance at the Surrey was in 1837; his principal character this season was in "The March of Intellect," which drew many crowded houses: since that period he has performed numerous parts in tragedy, comedy, opera, burlesque, and farce.

We have now to speak of Master Burke's professional attainments. On viewing him in the combined light of actor and musician, we certainly think we are warranted to declare that he is the most astonishing instance of precocious talents it ever befell the biographer's lot to record: for though there are many extraordinary examples handed down to us of early genius being evinced in either of the above sciences, yet we believe they have never been so admirably united in one so young till now.

Although Master Burke is only in his twelfth year, he possesses as fine a power of observation and as correct an idea of genuine humour as any actor we ever saw. His attitudes, too, are astonishing, varied, easy, and graceful; while his by-play, self-possession, and attention to the business of the scene, even in the most difficult characters, are no less curious than gratifying to witness.

Though his tragedy is by no means devoid of merit, we think that the bent of his genius is decidedly comic; there is a playful gaiety in his manner, and an archness and vivacity in his looks, all admirably adapted to the service of Thalia. Indeed, in some of his favourite performances, his acting was so easy, so utterly void of art, that the stage seemed his proper home, and the happiest imitation of the varieties of human life a part of his own nature. There is one character in particular which we will notice, for it induced us to make the above remark. It is in a farce called "At Home for the Holidays," where Master Burke had to represent a young lad returned from school, who is allowed the absolute mastership of the family for one entire day. The glee he displayed when he compelled his old tutor to learn the lessons with which he had been teased during the past month, was delightful; and his audacious ease, high good humour, when he ordered the servants about, was extremely ludicrous.

Of his performance of Richard and Shylock we can only observe, that he spoke the dialogue with great correctness, evidently appearing to feel the sentiments he uttered, and displayed, in some of the impassioned scenes, that true energy which is as removed from the boisterous rant of certain actors we could mention, as the cool courage of a Henry differs from the braggadocio of a Pistol. We cannot better close this memoir than by the following extract from Mr. Stafford's very interesting History of Music. "Master Burke is, at the age of twelve years, one of the finest violinists in the kingdom. The ease, the feeling, the brilliancy and fineness of his tone, and the scientific acquirements of this mere child, are allowed, by all who have heard him, to be most surprising."

"Old Heads on Young Shoulders," is a one-act piece, compiled by Mr. Moncreiff, in which Master Burke performs the part of a faithful servant, who is left in the care of a young lady (his master's intended,) whom a party of ruffians have attempted to carry off. Master B. by assuming the disguises of a gardener, valet, cook, and a veteran seaman, contrives to intimidate the above ruffians into the belief that the house is full of company, until his master really arrives with his friends. Master Burke supported his characters very cleverly, and certainly by his acting, in a measure, contrived to dispel the author's absurdity of a child frightening a band of robbers.

In this piece Master Burke appears to give instructions to the orchestra towards the composition of an overture, after the plan of De Bagnis' well known buffo scena. He also accompanied Miss Somerville on the violin, in two duets; his efforts were rewarded by repeated bursts of applause.

The following is from the London Atlas.—"This talented boy took his farewell of a London audience, at the Surrey theatre, on Tuesday evening, which was absolutely crowded in every part to repeat the farewell to him. He sustained the character of Richard, as it appears in the three last acts of the play; that of Tristram Fickle in the Weathercock; of Shotto in Old Heads on Young Shoulders, and Jerry in a Day after the Fair. This evening's task, therefore, included the assumption of no less than eighteen different characters. He uttered from memory, at least three thousand lines, and dressed no fewer than twenty times. Setting talents out of the question, what an undertaking for a boy of twelve years of age! He played a difficult overture on the violin, an accompaniment on the violoncello, and a prelude on the piano-forte in a manner which stamped him as a musician of no ordinary attainment. To conclude, he spoke such an address as a boy might speak—no straining after effect, but with the pathos and simplicity of a child, taking leave of his home and his friends. He was much affected, and his feelings appeared to be shared by the audience."

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

On Thursday of last week, we had Der Freischutz got up with some care; the devilry was perfectly done, and the chorusses went smoothly. Mr. Thorne, as Caspar, acted with ease, but not with force. Neither his singing nor acting are equal to Horn in this character, with the exception of the incantation scene, and there we must do him the justice to say, he made a new feature by repeating the spell on the lower notes of his voice, which had a fine and remarkable effect—indeed, when Mr. Thorne abandons the tenor and assumes the bass, he always makes the most impression. Mr. Jones was the Adolph of the evening. He sang with taste, excellent intonation, and proved himself a musician of no mean grade: his performance was decidedly superior to that of Mr. Pearman; but alas, he was vilely dressed; his culottes or unmentionables, were evidently the offspring of some tailor, by no means a first-rate artist, and he wore a little black hat, that might have served for a Jeremy Diddler. Mr. Jones, in truth, has such a Dominie Sampson like insouciance, touching his garments, that we recommend the manager, in future, to have him dressed by some careful personage, who understands the value of personal appearance! What a man might be made, by dividing the persons and qualities of Messrs. Jones and Richings! the former would gain every thing by obtaining the person and taste of the latter in dress, the latter would carry all before him by obtaining the use of the former's head and throat. We expected to have seen Richings in Zamiel, making the most splendid red fiend possible, but it appears he sticks to the blue gentleman in Valmond. However, Mr. Blakely was most efficient in the part, and left us nothing to regret; his disappearance through a trap was such an expeditious event, that a number of sagacious persons commenced loud applause at the feat during Adolph's beautiful scena, a proof of the high cultivation of musical taste at which we are arrived. Mrs. Austin acted and looked Linda perfectly; the splendid scena gives every opportunity of hearing to advantage the soft and liquid tones of her voice. If we point out any peculiarity in her mode of executing Weber's music, it is an absence of embellishment, and a close adherence to the author, manifesting a proper deference to the originality of idea which pervades his works. Mrs. Blake as Rose, we have promised to criticize; and although we were not prepared to expect her to equal her predecessor, Mrs. Sharpe, yet it is but justice to state that she was equally correct, and her voice blends better in concerted music. The duet with Linda, and the trio with Adolph and Linda, are proofs of this fact. In short, we look upon Mrs. Blake's personation of Rose as an addition to her dramatic laurels.

Mr. Kean's benefit, on Friday night, attracted a numerous and fashionable house. To speak briefly of his performance of Sir Edward Mortimer, he has all the fire, passion, and points in the acting of his father, without his maturity; and those persons who endeavour to forestall public opinion to his prejudice are unable to withstand the daily impression he is making on a discerning public. Mr. Thorne appeared in the character of Wilford, and acted with feeling and propriety. Mrs. Austin, as Barbara, brought music to the aid of the drama in its most pleasing form. The Caliph of Bagdad afterwards ushered to our presence Richings towering in all the pride of figure—a magnificent representation of Haroun Alraschid, the man of many wives. This part Richings appears to hold by dint of appearance and acting, in opposition to the benefit the music of the piece would undoubtedly sustain by placing therein Mr. Jones or Mr. Thorne. We are not prepared to dispute the justice of this arrangement; on the contrary, we rather incline to applaud it, because, in the first place, nine out of ten of the audience imagine that a good-looking actor who endeavours to sing, really succeeds in the attempt, whereas the finest vocalist will pass unheeded who happens to be a wooden, heavy personage on the stage—an Italian or Frenchman excepted, whose strange gestures and stranger language, will ensure him not only a hearing, but applause at all times.

MASTER BURKE.—This rare specimen of precocious talent made his appearance at the Park theatre on Monday last, the twenty-second instant. The characters chosen were Young Norval, in the tragedy of Douglas, and Dr. O'Toole, in the Irish Tutor. As a tragedian Master Burke manifests powers of no ordinary nature. We have not to criticize the mere school-boy, parroted in his lesson, but we have to report upon the extraordinary phenomenon of a child, scarcely twelve years of age, giving due weight and force to the passions and feelings of an adult; of course, in this arduous attempt the child has many adventitious circumstances to aid, and some to deteriorate him in his exertions. The audience are predisposed to make allowances for extreme youth when it assumes the attributes of manhood; and on the opposite side, a child opposed to grown people, and assuming to itself the actions of manhood, the passions of love, revenge, &c. by which manhood is actuated, has much to do in preventing the affair from being altogether ridiculous. It is mere justice and matter of fact to assert, that Master Burke completely carried his audience with him. His readings were so just, his actions so appropriate, that the feeling of wonder, at first excited, soon ripened into admiration; the only drawback upon his delivery of the English language in full force is the brogue, of which he can never for one moment divest himself. The curtain descended with the plaudits of the whole house, given with an enthusiasm we have seldom witnessed.

Master Burke next appeared on the stage, violin in hand, as leader of the band, in the overture of Guy Mannering. This beautifully selected morceau consists of Scotch melodies, worked up by the master hand of Bishop; but we are bound, as faithful historians, to add, that until this evening it has been buried in obscurity, and has been seldom honoured by the plaudits of an American audience! Master Burke plays on the violin remarkably well for a child of twelve years of age, but he by no means stands singular in this respect. We have heard a Master Blagrove, and various youthful members of the royal academies, both in London and Paris, infinitely superior to him in tone, taste, and execution. The leading of the band is likewise a mere "nomini umbra." The gentleman who is the instructor of Master Burke actually led the band, and Master B. merely played a first violin part, with a solo, the latter of which included the Scotch air "Donald," which he executed with good plain taste, but indifferent tone; both tone and taste, nevertheless, do honour to the extreme youth of the professor. The gestures of the child, as meant to represent the direction of the time to the band, would be better omitted, as was apparent on the encore of the overture, on which occasion he went through the same manual operation with his bow, at the precise bar on which he made the same demonstration on its first performance, although it must have been evident to the most casual observer, that no such signal of government was necessary at the time. These remarks we make to guard our readers from that which is the offspring of trick and not genuine talent. We now have to speak of the farce, and we do so with full and unfeigned admiration—the native richness of the Irish brogue, the dry wit and intelligence which sparkled throughout the performance, the admirable adaptation of action and feature to the part, altogether form a concentration of excellence which we have never beheld possessed by one so young, and seldom by actors of the first-rate talent and of the highest renown. We conclude, by advising every body to see Master Burke. E.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

The Cincinnati Chronicle.—We have just had occasion to glance over a file of this journal, in one of which we find ourselves soundly taken to task for the alleged crime of plagiarism. The instance in which we are accused of having sinned, is the copying of an article, entitled "Romance in Early Life," and crediting it to the Somerset Whig instead of the Cincinnati Chronicle. The error is so obvious on the face of it, that we are astonished at the language of the complainant. He certainly does not understand the definition of the term plagiarism in his present application. We can assure him that none are more jealous of editorial rights, none more willing and anxious to respect them, and, unfortunately, none more liable to maltreatment than ourselves. The Somerset Whig is alone to blame on the present occasion. We took the article as we found it in that paper, and had no knowledge that it originated elsewhere.

Miss Fanny Kemble.—This young lady is soon to appear at Covent-garden, in an entirely original character, that of a royal Jewish maiden. The title of the piece is the "Jew of Arragon, or the Hebrew Queen," and is from the pen of Thomas Wade, author of "Woman's Love." Miss Kemble and her father netted by their theatrical tour in the provinces, during the summer months, between five and six thousand pounds sterling.

Madame Malibran Garcia.—This distinguished vocalist recently appeared before a Manchester audience in English opera. The two first acts of the "Marriage of Figaro" were selected, in which, of course, she played the part of Susanna.

A light hat.—The hatters of London are manufacturing for queen Adelaide a riding-hat, the weight of which is not to exceed four ounces.

Another arrangement of the Marseilles Hymn.—This popular composition, which animated the brave citizens of Paris on the twenty-seventh, twenty-eighth, and twenty-ninth days of July last, arranged in a brilliant manner for the piano-forte, and dedicated to her illustrious father by Mademoiselle Eugénie Lafayette, has just been published by E. Riley.

Splendid Dinner.—The most extensive dinner ever given, was that by Lord Romney to the Kent volunteers, when reviewed by George III. at his lordship's seat near Maidstone. The tables were seven and a half miles long!

A BEAUTIFUL INDIAN AIR, FROM MOORE'S NATIONAL MELODIES.

Melancholy.

All that's bright must fade, The bright-est still the fleet-est; All that's sweet was made But to be lost when sweet-est: Stars that shine and fall, The flow'r that droops in spring-ing; These, a-las! are types of all To which our hearts are cling-ing. All that's bright must fade, The bright-est still the fleet-est; All that's sweet was made But to be lost when sweet-est.

SECOND VERSE.

Who would seek to prize
Delights that end in aching?
Who would trust to ties
That ev'ry hour are breaking?
Better far to be
In utter darkness lying,
Than be blest with light, and see
That light for ever flying!
All that's bright, &c.

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

A CHAPTER ON POETRY AND PAINTING.

BY JAMES B. SHEYS.

POETRY and painting have been pronounced sister arts, and it has been common to contend that they both sketch pictures—and so they do—but with a broad distinction. This opinion, however, has been current and uncontradicted so long, that, like many others, it has ceased to be considered as hypothetical, merely because age has given it the guise of truth.

We deny the alleged affinity in its full extent. That much of even mechanical preparation and process enters into the compositions of painting is manifest; they are pictures upon canvass or wood, embodied forth and completed by the use of artificial colours; and however perfect in their representation of the realities of nature, they appeal most directly to a single sense—the sense of sight. Poetry, on the contrary, ranging through real and imaginary worlds, claiming dominion over animate and inanimate things, depends alone upon her pure original spirit for that supremacy which, in all ages, she has exercised over all the senses, all the feelings, and all the faculties of man. By using the mysterious power of language, the elements of which are but emanations from human sensibilities, expressing the hopes, the resolves, and the affections of the heart; by calling to her aid memory and the passions, poetry sketches her pictures; and, departing in no wise from the common current of human feelings, her groupings are nature's own incidents, rendered more influential by being endowed with harmonious speech. The fading, yet gorgeous foliage of autumn, speaks, by the aid of song, a moral lesson to the reflecting mind. It reminds us that vigour and health are but fleeting blessings, and that man is doomed to lose the freshness of his youth, and go down to "dusty death" a subject for decay, even as the withered leaf which, rustling, falls at his feet;—yet, as interspersed among the seared woods in autumn, the humble but beautiful evergreen stands robed in brighter verdure, while the foliage of the lordly oak is piled at its root, so may virtue, often unnoticed among the show and glitter of the summer multitude, be discovered amid the gloom of adversity, unchanged when all else is changed, charitably screening the fallen honours of her foes.

The poet, unlike the painter, when traversing some scene fraught with new and inspiring beauty, can dispense with all tools of trade. He needs no pencil fashioned by the hands of the artizan to enable him to convey to his home a likeness of earth's attractive loveliness. With a taste, ever present and active, he selects the outlines of the scene; he calls up his similes and his analogies; they are arranged by a mental process, felt but indescribable; returning homeward, the very subject is in itself an inspiration, and, when impressed upon paper, it becomes what triumphantly vindicates at once its variance from and superiority over its mis-called sister art—a speaking picture.

Poetry, unlike painting, is not confined to mere delineation; its frame is less perishable; its utility at least equal. It consecrates the beauties of language, gives perpetuity to the glory of heroism, and immortality to the goodness of virtue. But there may be, and doubtless are, some very worthy people who deny the utility of this delightful pursuit. It may, perhaps, be asked with that impressive importance of manner which some mere "business men" so well know how to assume, "to what useful purpose does the arranging of words into what is denominated, by crack-brained minstrels, pleasant harmony, tend?" And ere we have time to reply, the question will probably be answered by the interrogator himself—a habit, by the way, very prevalent among some people calling themselves well-bred. Then come the loud and pompous conclusions of the self-sufficient: "No man can be an intelligent merchant or a profound lawyer who devotes any portion of his time to the composition or reading of poetry." And then to note their exclamations! "Time idly spent!" "Ignorance of business!" "Poverty and lunacy!" "No money to be made by writing books!" There is some truth, however, in the last of their assertions.

We admit that the historian holds a commanding rank among the benefactors of the human race, that the claim of the pure moral philosopher to eminence may not be safely disputed, and that the votary of general literature, when his motive has been the discovery and enforcement of truth, has left in his works an enduring monument of his usefulness. In the early and succeeding ages of the world, the writers of honest prose have been serviceable in preserving a record of deeds to be decried or commended; the more concise, calm, and minute detail of prosaic composition has perhaps better served the purposes of dignified history and grave moral instruction; but there is something more than all this necessary to fortify the mind, to enlarge the bounds of its reflections, to awaken its energies, and to direct its exertions towards noble and exalted actions. History does not alone contain this inspiring ingredient. No! when the youth of a country would seek amid the literature of the past for the highest examples of patriotism, for improving details of filial and fraternal affection, for touching descriptions of fire-side peace and home-born purity, for all the meritorious deeds best described, it is among the captivating strains of the poet that their search will find its largest reward. This fact alone proves the utility of verse, and of what importance it is to all the great purposes of education; for however the mere business plodders of earth may hang their wreaths of honour around the wisest of their craft, however tenaciously they may insist upon ranking the desire of accumulating money among the sublimer virtues, yet is the poet more truly a part of the national glory than is that merchant who allows his anxious care and toil to absorb his faculties, and who admits no intruder from the academic grove to invade his domicile.

ORIGINAL MORAL TALES.

LAST DAYS OF A PIRATE.

IN the Caribbean sea, and not far from the estuary of the river San Juan, are situated a number of small keys, generally denominated the "Cora Islands." They are inhabited by a mixed race of English, Spanish, Indian, and Negro; and which have from the earliest settlement of the West India islands, been the resort of buccaniers, pirates, traders, and fishermen. Lying at a sufficient distance from the main land to be exempted from the continual storms and rains for which that coast is noted—open to the trade winds, which by day meliorate the heats of a tropical climate, and by night waft from the ocean an ample supply of moisture for the production and preservation of uninterrupted and fadeless vegetation, they appear to him whose eyes have long been unblinded by a view of the green and smiling land, as little specimens of paradise scattered on the sea.

Thrown by fortune on one of these secluded isles, and after partaking largely of the cheerful but unostentatious hospitality of the inhabitants, I wandered forth along the avenues of orange and lime trees, whose clustering flowers loaded the air with perfume, while the moonbeams glancing through the interstices of the foliage, were brightly reflected from the pendant drops which hung like diamonds from the leafy spray.

I was now treading the ground oft trodden by the fierce freebooters of by-gone days; here they rested from their murderous toils; threw aside the blood-stained brand, and for a time indulged the gentler passions of their natures. Often, perhaps, have these woods echoed with the wild song of mirth, the bacchanalian revel, or the softer whisperings of love—for even the remorseless pirate loves, and fiercely too. Reflections like these brought in their train the fancied forms of Lolonois, Brasileno, Bat, Morgan, and other rovers of renown, whose deeds of desperate daring still live in a thousand legendary tales. But my reverie was interrupted by a sound of distant music softly and sweetly stealing along the winding alleys of shrubbery, and losing itself amid the murmurings of the waves as they broke on the rocky shore. Curious to know from whom the strain proceeded, I followed it, and suddenly found myself in front of a small, low hut, built of reeds and thatched with branches of the palm; the windward side was entirely open to the breeze, and from within a small glass lamp, filled with the oil of cocoa nuts, shed a faint and fitful light. In front of the hut, reclining in a hammock which was suspended between two orange-trees, I observed a man apparently listening to the song of a female who sat beside him and seemed endeavouring to soothe him to slumber as she gently swung the hammock to and fro. His face was pale, his sunken eyes were closed and partially covered with a profusion of auburn hair, which fell in ringlets over his brow, on which the burning sun had left its swarthy impress. As I approached he raised his head and motioned his attendant to cease her song, while with a voice feeble, but somewhat stern, he bade me welcome; and the lovely songster, who was a beautiful creole girl, with the form of a sylph and the step of a fawn, brought me a seat which she proffered and retired within the hut. Some trifling conversation ensued, during which his manner made an impression on my mind which time has failed to erase. His person was small and lightly formed, and though now feeble and emaciated, still betrayed the remains of elegance and activity: his large blue eye, sunken and lustreless, darted from object to object with a restlessness that denoted a heart but ill at ease, as the fierce energies of his nature seemed struggling with the languor of disease. Interested by his appearance, I made some inquiries respecting his disorder.

"The physicians," replied he, "think it a pulmonary affection, and for ought I know it may be so, but the root of the matter is here," (laying his hand upon his heart) "far beyond the reach of medicine."

"Perhaps a change of climate—"

"No, no?" interrupted he; "climates and countries are alike to me; my glass is nearly run, and it matters little how or when I die—so I but die."

These words were spoken with a certain premonition of manner which precluded farther conversation, and I took my leave, resolved, however, soon to repeat my visit, for I had become too deeply interested in his fate to rest satisfied without obtaining a farther knowledge of his character. Accordingly I renewed my visits from day to day, until they became frequent; and by many little nameless attentions, I at last won upon his confidence, and he appeared to take pleasure in my society, and even expressed himself uneasy at my absence. In the meanwhile his health continued rapidly to decline, and he was evidently just on the verge of mortal existence. I had often in the course of my conversations with him endeavoured to draw his attention to the consolations of religion; but the most indirect allusion to religion or immortality would cloud his brow with a frown which told me they could minister no comfort, peace, or hope to him. At the close of an afternoon which we had passed together, as he lay gently swinging in his hammock, he fixed his eyes on the sun, just then dipping beneath the western wave, and remarked,

"See what a glorious sight is there! The time has been when I could look on such a scene with emotions of the most elevated pleasure; now my heart sickens at the sight—it reminds me of my fast approaching doom. Yon sun has run its course in brightness, and it sets in splendour—my career has been one of darkness, and soon must set in gloom—"

"But the sun will rise again," I observed.

"Yes," he replied; "and you mean to say I too shall arise—ha! ha! Arise to what?" and he laughed, not loud, but such a laugh! Oh, its infernal gibber still rattles in my ears! 'twas such a laugh as the refinement of torture might extort from a wretch agonizing on the rack: it was the wild expression of the horrors of hell already seizing on the soul.

"Do you not believe it?" said I; "surely you are not an atheist?"

"No, no! no more an atheist than yon grazing brute who believes or disbelieves neither creeds nor doctrines. Would I were an atheist!"

"Nay, say not so—sickness has disordered your mind. Can you not pray? Have you never prayed?"

"Did I never pray? Oh, yes! I remember, but 'tis like a dream, when kneeling on my mother's lap she taught me to lift my infant orisons to heaven; and she would pray with me too, and for me; and in after years, when thrown adrift on the wide world, when all who loved or was beloved by me were slumbering in their graves, even then the memory of those prayers would shed a sacred influence over my soul; and I hoped, but ah! how vainly hoped, that still a mother's prayer would draw heaven's blessing on my head. Long years have fled since aught like supplication to God or man has passed these lips. It is true I worshipped, but it was at a most unholy shrine—the deity whom I adored asked blood, and blood I gave him. Yes, a whole hecatomb of human lives this hand has immolated on the altar of revenge."

"Oh, horrible!" I exclaimed: "surely you rave, you mean not what you say."

"Nay, nay! 'tis sober truth. But listen—I have not many hours to live; I will employ them in sketching for you a brief outline of a wicked, hapless, hopeless life. For twenty years you are the only human being who has crossed my path from whom I have received, without a bribe, one cheering word or kindly look, save this poor girl, and she—but enough of that—you will not betray me! Justice indeed claims much at this ensanguined hand of mine, but death will help me cheat her of her due. I was born in Wales: at the age of fifteen years I lost parents, friends, and fortune. Thrown on my own resources, I came to the West Indies, and succeeded after a time in obtaining the situation of overseer to Gonzales, the governor of St. Ann. He was a proud and haughty Spaniard, whom I disliked, for I had not yet learned to hate, and I should soon have left his service but for a being whom he called his daughter; the fairest—but what matters it how fair she was! I loved her—loved her with all the pure affections of my soul, and she loved me. Well! five years passed away. At length I gained her consent to leave the island and unite her destinies with mine, for the stern Spaniard would as soon have bestowed his daughter on a slave as on me. I obtained a boat and the assistance of a negro to accompany me to the main, when the black villain betrayed me, and I was and on the point of embarking we found ourselves surrounded by soldiers and slaves, who, by the governor's order, stripped me to the skin—yes, there before the gaze of hundreds, and worse, before her for whom only I cared to live, I was stripped and flogged—publicly flogged by a negro! Oh, how my heart was crushed! My spirit was broken, but not subdued. There, kneeling on the sand, the blood streaming from my lacerated shoulders, I swore never to rest satisfied until I had washed out the foul disgrace in the hearts' blood of a hundred Spaniards. I have performed my oath. Twenty long years have sped away since that accursed hour, and the vengeful flame then kindled in my soul has ever burned with fierce intensity, while each new victim served as fuel to the raging fire, and nought but the chill damps of death can quench its blaze. The governor sent me to Chagres as a prisoner, and to obtain my liberty, or rather my release from a filthy dungeon, I entered into the military service of the Spaniards. The revolution which had broken out in Caraccas, had now become general along the main; the patriots were every where in arms, and I soon found means to join them, but not without first sheathing my knife in the hearts of my colonel and two sentinels. Here my hatred to the Spaniards soon rendered me conspicuous, and obtained for me the command of a small party, with which I prosecuted a guerrilla warfare in the interior; but was finally taken, manacled, and marched barefoot and wounded across the isthmus to Panama, with scarcely a rag to protect me from the scorching sun: it was almost insupportable. I complained of my head, and the merciless villains gave me a paper cap; and lest the wind should blow it from off my head, they fastened it to my scalp with boiling pitch. But the desire of revenge supported me beneath all their tortures. I again escaped, and at length found myself at the siege of Cartagena, in the command of a gun-boat. Here I signaled myself by many a deed of blood, and after the capture of the place obtained a captain's commission, and the command of a fine brig. I was ordered to convey several of the Spanish nobility with their property to the island of Curaçoa, and accordingly set sail, but steered my course directly for St. Ann. On the passage I called my crew together; informed them we had on board upwards of two millions of dollars belonging to the Spaniards, who were our natural enemies, and inquired if they were disposed to let so fine a prize ship thus easily through their fingers? They caught greedily at the glittering bait, and with one voice exclaimed, 'Set the Spaniards adrift! Land them on some desert island!' Having thus obtained their consent to an act which equally implicated all, I resolved upon my future course, and took my measures accordingly. That night, while the passengers were asleep in their berths, I dispatched them successively with my own hand, and lanced them through the cabin windows—they told half a score towards the fulfilment of my oath. We arrived at St. Ann, and anchored off the island at night. I immediately landed with a boat's crew of chosen ruffians, and proceeded undiscovered to the house of Gonzales. On the way we met his son, a lad of some sixteen years, whom I compelled to conduct me to his father's bedside, where I found him buried in the arms of sleep. There he lay, the object of my soul's most bitter hatred! Did I strike him then? did I send him slumbering into eternity? No, no! I aroused him—he saw me stand smiling over him, with my dagger at his throat, and his craven soul almost burst with terror from his glaring eyes. Oh! what a delicious moment was that to me! He spoke no word, but gagged and bound, I had him speedily on board, whilst my crew sacked and set fire to the town, the hateful scene of my early degradation. Yet was there one bitter pang to be endured—but 'twas only for a moment. Ere I left the island, the daughter of Gonzales came—she whom I loved so well; on her knees she besought me 'spare, oh! spare my father! you loved me once—' 'Ay! but I love no longer—Revenge has absorbed my soul, there is no room for love—away!' I saw her no more. As for the governor, I had him whipped until he implored me in mercy to plunge my dagger in his heart: no such mercy for him—the average Spaniard, while he had aught of sense or feeling left, and then we gave him to the sharks. Why do you shrink as if in horror? Think I was an iota more than enraged? He was but one of the damned hundred, and at the end of the day I was outlived by the government, and commenced a cruise upon my own account. The few remaining hours of my life would not suffice to tell a tithe of my adventures, perils, and escapes. Three times I have been a prisoner; but stratagem or gold were ever potent to loosen bolts or bars. Once I was tried for my life at N. O.—, but the glittering of the shining ore dimmed the eyesight of my judges, and they could discover no spot of blood upon my hands. Five years I roved the terror of these seas; but now, what all the art and power of man have failed to do, the never-ceasing tumults of a guilty mind has done—cut short my mad career. Long since I felt the hand of death upon me; and like the wounded tiger that seeks some gloomy den wherein to die, hither I came without associate or friend but this my little creole nurse. Chance has made us acquainted. I have confided to you the outlines of my history; it will serve as a tale to while away a tedious hour, and make your hearers stare. And now, grant me one favour when I am dead, living I ask none;—bury me in the sea full twenty fathoms deep. I have done. Give me some drink—my mouth is parched—my brain is in a whirl! Ha! that pang, death is here, I feel it about my heart. Well, why should I live? and yet to die with such a load of guilt—hush—hush! speak not to me, I know what you would say—but 'tis all in vain. What's death to me? I have bearded him a thousand times—why do I shrink so now? A heavy mist comes gathering over my sight. Who are these? Off, off! why do you let them come so close?— With a desperate effort he raised himself upon his couch, seized with a convulsive grasp my hand; gazed on me for a moment with a terrified and ghastly glare, and then fell back exhausted on his pillow. His distorted features gradually relaxed; the wild expression of his eye slowly assumed a placid look, and something like a smile played about his lips—the pirate was no more.

BIOGRAPHY.

Original Sketches of Eminent Women.

XANTIPPE.

Ova lady readers will, no doubt, smile when they see the name of Xantippe at the head of an article which professes to treat of eminent women. The wife of Socrates is not indeed eminent for any merit of her own; she shines merely in the light of her husband's fame; but she is remarkable for her obstinate perseverance in maintaining what she considered "the inalienable rights" of woman. Her name has been made to designate—and we maintain most unjustly—a distinct class among her sex. We do not believe that scolds, like poets, are born; but, like orators, are made by circumstances; and if in former days special laws were enacted against scolds, it was because men were the tyrants of women. These laws have fallen into disrepute; because, perhaps, the ducking-stool was not found the stool of repentance; because tyranny is out of fashion, and men are becoming more enlightened and more rational; and women are rapidly rising to that rank among intelligent beings to which their gentle virtues, their refined sensibilities, and the delicate structure of their minds entitle them. We place the name of Xantippe on our pages, not indeed to apologise for the asperities of her temper—for them there is no apology—but to show that there is no foundation in truth for most of the scandalous stories so industriously circulated concerning her by the enemies of the Socratic school—stories which have affected the character of woman in general, and given rise to a classification which we consider a base libel upon the sex.

Little or nothing is known of the birth, family, or education of Xantippe; her character, however, has been drawn by many a writer, and there is sufficient reason to believe that the pencil of calumny has been too busily engaged in furnishing her picture. If we were disposed to speculate, we might conjecture that her person was attractive; because Socrates was a great admirer of a finely proportioned form, and of a beautiful face, which he regarded as the index of a mind possessed, or at least susceptible, of great moral beauty. If he chose his wife upon this principle, he must have sought for a fair form and a lovely face, and Xantippe's charms must have been of no ordinary kind; but, alas! for erring human reason, he found his sweet companion a sad exception to his general rule, and if he still continued to believe in his own theory, he must have considered it at least very dangerous in practice. Unfortunately for our conjecture, however, both our premises and our conclusions may be false; for Socrates may have formed his theory after having had some experience in the matrimonial state. But let us proceed to facts. His partiality for beautiful forms is easily accounted for. His father was a statuary, and brought his son up to his own profession. Socrates supported himself some time by his chisel, and must have been daily in the habit of studying the most perfect models of the human form; while he would be naturally inclined to admire that most which presented the fairest proportions; and when beneath his chisel he beheld

"The mortal and the marble still at strife,
And timidly expanding into life,"

his habits of thought would naturally lead him to meditate upon the connection between mind and matter; upon the influence which the body exerts over the mind, and the modifications which the one may receive from the other. A form well proportioned might in this way easily be imagined to be animated by a well adjusted mind, or governed by a well regulated disposition. Socrates, however, disregarded speculations like these when he proceeded to the matter of fact business of selecting a wife; and if he was not particularly fortunate in his choice, we have no right to accuse him of a want of discernment; for no man was better acquainted with human nature than he. "He was eminently qualified," says Xenophon, "to penetrate into men's characters." He was in fact a practical philosopher: visiting the busy haunts of men, as well as their places of retirement, he was heard in the streets and public squares, in the mart and in the temple, exposing the errors and chastising the vices of his countrymen; and, conversing with the great and lowly, with the rich and poor, he exhorted them to the practice of virtue as the only basis of happiness. While he laboured to improve the public and private morals, we are told he neglected no means of correcting the faults of his own character, which he admitted were numerous. To this end he united himself to the intractable Xantippe, or at least he turned her perverseness to some account; for, says he to one of his friends, "in accustoming myself to bear patiently the ill humour of Xantippe at home, I acquire habits of moderation, and learn to treat, when abroad, the infirmities of all men with indulgence." It would seem he sought the hand of Xantippe as a sort of moral philosopher's stone, that he might convert the dross of his own nature into pure gold—an experiment which few men would have the courage to make. That she was a woman of a perverse disposition and violent temper, we have seen that Socrates himself admitted; but that she was guilty of such gross violations of decorum as the writers of later times have, without any authority, asserted, we cannot believe. There is no probability in the story that she was capable of such unwomanlike conduct as to trample under foot a cake presented by the accomplished and elegant Alcibiades; that in the open street she tore the cloak from the shoulders of her husband; or that in a fit of passion she overturned the table at the sight of Euthydemus, whom Socrates had invited to supper without notifying her of his coming. Now the true version of this story is simply this, that when Xantippe expressed some dissatisfaction at being unprovided for visitors, Socrates desired her to give herself no concern; for if his guests were wise men, they would be contented with his simple fare; if otherwise, he did not value their friendship. "Whilst others," said he, "live to eat, wise men eat to live."

Another scandalous story, re-echoed unfortunately by christian writers, is told without authority. They say that Myrto shared with Xantippe the affections and home of Socrates to whom she was married; that these two Grecian matrons, seized simultaneously with a fit of jealousy, came from words to blows in the presence of the astounded husband; that when "Greek met Greek" Socrates, with stern impartiality, remained an impassive spectator of "the tug of war;" that his immoderate peals of laughter testified how much he enjoyed the scene; but that the combatants, offended by his unseasonable mirth, suddenly turned their allied arms against the innocent cause of their pugilistic sports, and engraved, in no ambiguous characters, the story of their wrongs upon the philosopher's face, which looked after the operation like a black-letter manuscript. But we do not credit these vile tales, and we regret that the impartial biographer is compelled to repeat in order to refute them. If there had been any truth in this story, the detractors of Socrates would have circulated it with malicious industry; and Aristophanes would have seized with avidity a scene so full of comic interest, and would have transferred it to his comedy of the Clouds, intended exclusively to overwhelm Socrates with ridicule. But as it is mentioned neither by the dramatist nor by contemporary writers, we are warranted in believing nothing of the kind ever occurred. Besides, Myrto does not appear to have been at any period the wife of Socrates. She was the daughter of Aristides, the just, and upon the death of her father was left in indigent circumstances. Socrates, moved by her poverty, and respecting the daughter of so virtuous a citizen, offered her the protection of his humble roof and the hospitalities of his frugal table; and if she accepted both, we can only infer that the house of Socrates was an asylum granted to the daughter of Aristides.

While all the censurable parts of Xantippe's conduct are carefully exposed, the laudable traits of her character are entirely overlooked. It is evident that with the little attention Socrates paid to his domestic interests, the mother of his children must have possessed an uncommon degree of industry, economy, activity, and prudence in the management of her household, or his moderate fortune would not have been sufficient for the education of his children and the support of his family. In fact, according to his disciple Xenophon, Socrates himself allows her many domestic virtues, and bore testimony to her unceasing maternal cares, and to the tender solicitude which, under all circumstances, she manifested for her children. Many occurrences creditable to her heart are related by her husband's disciples, tending to show that the daily example of moderation and kindness set her by Socrates, was not without its beneficial influence. When Socrates was condemned to death, Xantippe was inconsolable. Plato has described the excess of her grief; and we are told that the disciples of Socrates, who went to his prison early in the morning that they might have an opportunity of conversing with their master throughout the last day of his life, found him sitting by him with a child in her arms. As soon as Xantippe saw them, she burst into tears and exclaimed, "O Socrates, this is the last time your friends will ever speak to you, or you to them." Socrates, that the tranquillity of his last moments might not be disturbed, desired that she might be conducted home. She left him with the most frantic expressions of grief. The following passage in a letter, sometimes ascribed to Xenophon, shows that her grief was not a passing cloud, but threatened to overshadow the remainder of her days. "Cease, excellent Xantippe, cease to weep; what will it profit you to cherish a hopeless sorrow? Endeavour to preserve yourself for your children—be of good cheer, and avail yourself of all the advantages which as the widow of Socrates you possess. Apollonius and Dion applaud you for having declined the gifts which have been tendered to you, and they admire your noble reply, that you consider the wife of Socrates sufficiently rich. As long as I and your other friends have the ability to aid you, you shall want nothing." This extract clearly shows that the friends of Socrates, who knew his widow best, esteemed her much; and it shows too, that her grief was not a solitary spark of feeling, struck by a sudden blow from a flinty heart; but that it was a constant and consuming sorrow. Moreover, the grief of Xantippe, and the fear expressed by her friends that she would sink beneath the pressure of her saddened spirits, evince the sincerity of her attachment and her just sense of the excellence of the husband whom she had lost. If it be urged that so distressing a scene as the death of Socrates would move the most insensible heart, and that the poignancy of Xantippe's grief, at such a moment, was no proof that she estimated at its just value the man to whom she was united, we reply that (according to an anecdote preserved by Elien) she took pleasure in doing justice to the virtues which she had daily witnessed for so many years. "Xantippe," says this exact and learned writer, "asserted, that through all the revolutions in Athens during the life time of Socrates, she had never perceived the slightest change in his countenance which was always expressive of tranquillity, content, and benevolence. 'He went out and returned home,' said she, 'always calm, always serene, superior to every fear, and judging men and things invariably with equity and moderation.'"

A woman who could speak so mournfully of the fate of her husband; who could bewail his death so long and so bitterly; who could appreciate his virtues and paint them so feelingly; could not herself have been destitute of virtue and feeling; and she who was a prudent wife and a tender mother, though she did not always control her temper, deserved at least charity for her faults and credit for the good qualities which she really possessed D. Lord Ellenborough lately visited the Zoological garden, and attracted almost as much notice as the bears; his fair divorcée was also there; and "they met!"

"But, oh! 'twas anguish to her heart
To see his alter'd eye;
To see him smile on all beside,
Yet coldly pass her by."

We are no admirers of fellows who "take the law into their own hands." Eng. paper.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

MASTER BURKE continues to attract full and fashionable houses. On Wednesday the twenty-fourth ultimo he appeared in the character of Sir Abel Handy, in Morton's comedy of Speed the Plough, and his personation of the eccentric old gentleman was rich and pointed in the extreme. We do not presume to assert that any child can give the force and identity to such a character as would attend its representation by Barnes or Kilner, and a repetition of the extraordinary powers of this wonderful boy must cease to interest, in attempts of this description, when divested of novelty; nevertheless, we take upon ourselves to say, that Master Burke has never had his equal as an instance of talented precocity. In a piece called Whirligig Hall, more adapted to show him to advantage, he manifested great comic abilities, and excited loud shouts of laughter. The overture to Tancredi followed, and here we beg leave to remark on the bill, which asserted that "Rossini's celebrated overture to Tancredi would be led by Master Burke." The fact was widely different. The overture to Tancredi has been merely taken as a subject by some musician, and mutilated after a most barbarous manner, for the use of Master Burke. Whoever the gentleman be, he has amused himself by making thereof a concerto; not, indeed, by adding variations or different passages, but by silencing futes, hautboys, clarionets, &c. and giving their best passages to the first violin, consequently Master Burke has the principal part throughout, and all the instruments are subordinate. Now let us not for one moment be understood to throw the least censure on Master Burke's violin playing, for it is excellent; but we must object to the mode of calling public attention to his performance, as leading Rossini's celebrated overture to Tancredi. The truth is, that Monsieur Vamboise, his music-master, (who we suspect has arranged Rossini's subject,) actually leads the band, and Master Burke plays a concerto. We think it but justice to Messrs. Segura, De Luce, W. Taylor, and other adults, who have the credit of understanding their profession, to state this, because we have heard it remarked that Master Burke, in leading these overtures, assumes a much more prominent stand than these gentlemen; he must always do so, unless they are permitted by their patrons to convert the overtures of great masters into violin obligato movements, at which the whole of the profession and amateurs of music would be amazingly shocked; unless Master Burke plays the original music, as they say. A most respectable contemporary journal likewise states, that Master Burke's leading the difficult overtures of Rossini, is marvellous. The marvel, we believe, is solved in the above explanation.

On Friday Master Burke appeared as Richard the Third—of course, a most difficult and dangerous undertaking for one of his tender age. All we shall say on the subject is, that we cannot conceive any boy exceeding him in such a character. Miss Clara Fisher is the only young person who has made the attempt in our remembrance, and we look upon little Burke as a better tragedian than the young lady. The Irish Tutor followed, and the house, crammed to suffocation by the holiday people, (the orchestra-bins filled with ladies and the stage covered with gentlemen,) literally shrieked with laughter at his acting. We do not ever remember to have witnessed so powerful an excitement of risibility. The overture to the Caravan was announced as about to be led by Master Burke. This piece is by the celebrated Grétry, and the slow movement is a graceful cantabile for the hautboy—so we find it in the score—but the same mutilation has taken place, and it has been adapted as a solo for the violin, accordingly the wind instruments are silenced. It may look more imposing in a theatre bill to announce Master Burke as leading a band, but it would be more consistent with truth and good taste to produce him as a concerto player; for it is evident to all musicians that the band is not led by him, nor the music of celebrated authors given in its original form. Nor does Master Burke appear sensible of any mistake which occurs during his performance; on the other hand, Monsieur Vamboise, in the leader's chair, shows just the same marks of impatient recognition of an error as Mr. De Luce does on ordinary occasions.

Mrs. Austin and Mr. Thorne have proceeded to Philadelphia, to produce operas on an extensive scale at the theatre in Arch-street. Several of the leading choristers of the Park theatre have been engaged to assist, by Messrs. Maywood, Archer, and Walton, the enterprising managers; and the Philadelphians, who are admirers of music, will be regaled with those pieces which are so admirably performed on our boards, several of which are novelties to them; Boildieu's Caliph of Bagdad in particular.

ODE,

FOR THE CELEBRATION IN HONOUR OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

By Prosper M. Wamors.

A voice on every wave,
A sound o'er every sea!
The war-note of the brave,
The anthem of 'he free!
From steep to steep it rings,
Through Europe's many climes—
A knell to despot kings,
A sentence on their crimes;
From every giant hill, companion of the cloud,
The startled echo leaps to give it back aloud.
Where'er a wind is rushing—
Where'er a stream is gushing,
The swelling sounds are heard,
Of man to freeman calling,
Of broken fetters falling;
And, like the carol of an uncaged bird,
The bursting shout of freedom's battle-word!
Spirit of freedom! from thy home,
Beneath our western skies,
We gave thee forth the shackled earth to roam,
That red oppression's heart might quail,
And shuddering tyranny grow pale
Before the lightning of thine eyes!
Thy course hath been a glorious one—
For nations now are basking in thy light,
That, ere the trial deed was done,
Were grovellers in being's night;
Upstarting from their sleep,
They grasp the dooming brand,
And, vengeance-nerved, the spoilers sweep
From off the trampled land;
They give thee vent to death—contempt can punish more;
But frowningly and stern, they wave them from the shore.

From the north's frozen regions,
Ice-fettered in gloom—
Where slavery's legions
Are wailing their doom;
From Italy's clime,
The brightest of earth,
Where man lives in crime,
Polluted from birth;
From Spain's death-like trance,
And from Portugal's blight,
We turn to thee, France,
And we turn with delight.
Where the eyes of our fathers were turned,
To the land of the warm-hearted Gaul,
When dimly the flame on their altar-stones burned,
And their hopes were as dark as the pall;
To the land of the noble in soul,
The mighty in spirit and name,
Where vengeance hath listened to reason's control,
And the doom of the tyrant was shame!
Oh! deeper and darker that doom, than if blood
Had been poured o'er regenerate France like a flood!

Joy to thee, France! in thy pride,
The world shall rejoice at thy deed;
Long may the hearts that the despot defied
Ennobled the land they have freed.
Away with the flag of the Bourbon—away!
Oh! never again let it wave,
Where glory hath marshalled her chosen array!
To earth, with the flag of the slave!
Down, down with the banner of shame,
And trample its folds in the dust;
Away with the race that have blighted its fame,
Where the fetters of tyranny rust;
Come from the gloom of thy cloud,
Come with thy splendour of yore,
Thou pennon of glory! each Gaul shall be proud
As he welcomes his own tri-color!

And Thou, the ruler of the storm,
Whose hand put back the wave,
When anarchy upheaved his awful form—
Whose voice went forth to save;
Thou, whom we proudly call our own,
The warrior of the free,
Among earth's mighty ones thou stand'st alone
The delegate of liberty!
Kingsdoms nor crowns—the patriot warrior's name
Thy nobler recompense shall be—
No brighter record gilds the page of fame!

Spirit of freedom! on—
Oh, pause not in thy flight
Till every clime is won
To worship in thy light;
Speed on thy glorious way,
And wake the sleeping lands—
Millions are watching for thy ray,
And lift to thee their hands;
Still onward, be thy cry—
Thy banner on the blast—
And like a tempest as thou rushest by,
Despots shall shrink aghast;
On, till thy name is known
Throughout the peopled earth,
On, till thou reign'st alone,
Man's heritage by birth;
On, till from every vale, and where the mountains rise,
The beacon lights of liberty shall kindle to the skies!

LITERARY NOTICES.

FAMILY LIBRARY, NO. XI.—Demonology and Witchcraft.—Another gem from the inexhaustible mine! one more piece of master-work from the never-idle factory! or in plain English, another volume from the fruitful brain, and restless fingers of Sir Walter Scott! This book was published about ten days ago, and who has not already peeped into its pages? What man with any pretensions to the name of reader, has not applied the ivory, (or if perchance that useful implement were not at hand,) his remorseless fore-finger to the undivided leaves, and devoured with eager eyes the long desired contents? At this late day, (late for a work from him) it is almost a farce to write a notice of the Demonology, for the odds are, that every body who reads us, has read or at least begun to read it, and if the latter be the case, we can scarcely hope to receive our usual share of attention until the prior claims of him whom we would honour, are fully satisfied. But custom is an insatiable task-master, and we beseech our readers to understand and to believe that it is only for its sake that this, perhaps superfluous article is written.

It is probably unnecessary to say, that we have read these ten letters; or that we consider our time as having been very profitably employed. In them we have found the result of a wonderfully extensive course of reading and of much reflection upon one subject, and this result is a profound and philosophic and satisfactory elucidation of a great mystery, illustrated by numerous striking and amusing anecdotes. We may almost say that no one of the innumerable modes in which human superstition has exhibited itself, is passed over without comment or example; the wild notions of all ages and of every people, are here exposed and accounted for; and in the greater number of instances, the theory is perfect and convincing; in all, it is remarkably ingenious. But how could it be otherwise? the hand of a wizard has been laid upon the arcana of necromancy; it is the voice of a mighty conjuror that exposes the secrets of the supernatural fraternity. The mantle of his namesake, Michael Scott, that "wight of power," has fallen upon him, with the wisdom of another Scott (Reginald) who was deeply skilled in all unearthly lore; with such aids Sir Walter could not but write wisely of witches and wizards and spirits, "gray and white with all their trumpery."

TALES OF TRAVELS WEST OF THE MISSISSIPPI.—Mr. Solomon Bell, late keeper of the Traveller's library, Boston, has just issued a neat and pretty octodecimo, containing a lively and entertaining account of the different expeditions which have, at different times, been undertaken to explore the vast, interesting, and little known regions of our western country. From a slight glance over its diversified contents we are convinced that it will prove a useful manual for youth. Numerous cuts adorn it, which, of course, render it more attractive.

THE BETROTHED OF WYOMING.—A second edition of this historical tale has just appeared. Its universal popularity has undoubtedly produced this result, which must be peculiarly grateful to the author.

JOURNAL OF HEALTH.—The great demand for this useful and practical periodical has induced the publishers to issue a second edition of the first volume, in a very handsome form.

THE SANDFORDS, OR HOME SCENES.—The second volume of this novel has been published. It fully equals in interest the first, and will not suffer by comparison with any of the author's previous efforts.

NEW-YORK MEDICAL JOURNAL.—The first number of this periodical journal has just appeared. It is edited by doctors Peixotto, Gravea, and Rhinelander, and will be continued quarterly. Each number contains two hundred and fifty pages.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

PAINTED WINDOW.—The following is a descriptive sketch of the painted window just fixed in the oriel of the hall at King's College, Cambridge:—The window, consisting of twenty-seven openings, besides the tracery lights, contains in the centre division, a full-length portrait of the founder, Henry sixth, crowned, and holding a sceptre in his right hand, with the sacred volume, emblematic of his pious character, in the left. In the compartment above are the arms of Henry, supported by two heraldic antelopes, and surmounted by a large crown. In the openings, right and left of the founder, are the arms of King's and Eton. In the centre opening on the left side of the oriel, are the ancient arms of Basset; and in the centre of the right, are the present arms of the Dunstable family. It having been found necessary, generally, to retain the original metal work of the window corresponding with that in the other windows throughout the hall, the numerous divisions of the same have been filled with appropriate ornaments and heraldic devices appertaining to the founder, and harmonising, in design and effect, with the other parts of the window. The upper squares of the respective openings contain crowns, and the royal initials, in ancient Gothic characters; beneath are the Lancastrian rose, the fleur-de-lis, and the ostrich feathers in saltire; the badges of Henry and his consort. The tracery lights contain Gothic foliage, alternately painted on ruby and blue, bordered with gold-beaded ornament, and terminating with rich yellow flowers in the points. The entire window contains nearly three hundred feet of glass, and consists of above five thousand pieces, of various colours, all painted upon, and finished in the best manner, although from the height of the window, a great part of the finishing can only be properly seen by the assistance of a glass. The window is the gift of Lord de Dunstable.

SONNET—SPENSER.

BY W. G. CLARK.

HEARD of pure thought! about whose daily ways
The light of gorgeous fancies lingering played,
Prompting the pictures of thy golden lays
Where fairy scenes each flowing verse pervade;
Whose birth, within thy soul enjoyment made,
When from thy harp was poured the gifted song
Of knight and minstrel, nymph and fountain-maid—
Offsprings of air and light, a glorious throng,
Like clouds that in the sunset float along:
These are the trophies that survive thy breath!
Amid thy numbers lives thy spirit-fire—
Fresh o'er thine ashes blooms the laurel-wreath—
Still soars the music of thy sounding lyre,
Triumphant over change, and time, and death!

NUMBER SIX.

St. Petersburg, 1830.

EVEN to an American, who is accustomed to see beautiful villages and opulent towns annually rising from a dense forest, and in a space of time scarce less than from youth to manhood, become the great emporiums of trade, the seat of the arts, and abounding in the elegancies as well as luxuries of the present high degree of civilized life, it may be a matter of surprise that so magnificent a city as this could rise up from a frigid marsh, and among an almost barbarous people, in the incredible short space of little more than a century. It is true that as early as 1703, Peter, having possessed himself of the fortress of Nienchatz, and being struck with the advantages of the place for the establishment of the Baltic commerce, and as a point to make head against the Swedish incursions, fortified the present site of the fortress, and erected a few wooden tenements on the banks of the Neva. But it was not till he had gained the battle of Pultawa that he earnestly set about the formation of the imperial capital. It was then, and before leaving the bloody field, he wrote his admiral, Apraxin, the following characteristic note—"This is the day that, by the grace of God, I have really laid the corner-stone for the foundation of St. Petersburg." Still there was much left to be done before he could uninterruptedly proceed in the great work—Livonia must be conquered, and the Swedish flotilla driven back. These matters at length accomplished, thousands of peasants were drafted from the interior for the public works, followed up by an ukase, enjoining the principal families of the empire to come forward and build, in proportion to their revenues; and, what was of more importance to the growth of the city, reside in their houses when finished. What Peter willed must be done at all hazards; and it has been the glory of those who have come after him to fill up the designs of the great original founder, till St. Petersburg has become the pride and ornament of this vast empire.

My last gave you a general view of the city; I now enclose you a map of it with the environs, and as I find leisure, will sally out and visit those points more particularly deserving the attention of the stranger; so commencing from the place at which I first landed, you will find the establishment of Mr. Baird, an enterprising Scotchman, who, obtaining the exclusive privilege of navigating the Russian waters for a term of years, was the first to introduce steam-boats into this northern region. His works are complete for the construction and repair of his boats, and in addition he has erected a forging steam saw-mill, on an extensive scale. His right, however, is now expired; and strange to say, notwithstanding the slow speed of their boats, starting only once a day from either place, and receiving and landing their passengers at this inconvenient distance from the city, no opposition is even thought of. This no doubt arises in a measure from the vexatious police arrangements, the numerous forms to go through, and the many little douceurs that would be expected by government officers to secure their good will, and prevent their clogging the establishment of a new line with a thousand obstacles. As an example of the way in which they order things in this country, in passing to and from Cronstadt, no matter whether you go down for one day and are to return the next, and whether on business or pleasure, every man, woman, and child is obliged to produce a passport or billet of residence, and have the same examined and inscribed in the office established for that purpose. You then pay for your passage, receive a tin medal, which you hand to the guard stationed at the gangway, and are thus permitted to pass on board. It not unfrequently happens that the crowd is so great, and the hour arriving for the departure of the boat, that it sets off, leaving individuals behind, because, forsooth, there was not sufficient time for the scribe to record the passports. I could never fathom the utility of such stupid and vexatious regulations in a time of profound peace, and will venture to say, if they were annulled, there would be four passengers where there is now one, the distance be performed in half the time, and at half the present price of passage, and the Russian government rather benefited than endangered thereby.

Passing along the road to the city you will see on the right numerous patches, enclosed for the production of such vegetables as can be raised in this high latitude; and in the pure creeks of the Neva troops of boys bathing their limbs, each one with a cross of wood or bone suspended from the neck, and which they constantly wear as a symbol of their religion, and as a talisman against the ills of life. But the most attractive object to me was the primitive appearance of the Russian fishermen, sweeping with their wide nets the deep waters of the river. They wore neither caps nor shoes, and their breasts were shaded with their long beards. As I watched them, all intent on their occupation, my imagination was transported back to the days of our blessed Saviour, when, walking by the sea of Galilee, he called to fishermen of similar appearance, whose minds were equally untutored, and said, "Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men." Yet these ideas soon vanish on entering the city, and passing up the English key, a street that fronts the Neva, and takes its name from the many English merchants who reside upon it, and form, with their elegant mansions, nearly the whole line to the Isaac square. It is in this square that a large proportion of the longer streets debouche; indeed that part of the city on this side of the Neva may be considered a wide semicircle, of which the Admiralty is the point, and the streets the radii; running in most instances perfectly straight into the open country, and is connected with the quarter of Vasil-Ostrof by a bridge over an arm of the river, of full one-third of a mile in length. It being the most public quarter, and the greatest thoroughfare of the city, uncommon pains have been taken to beautify and adorn it. Fronting the bridge, and opposite the senate-house, the equestrian statue of Peter the Great is raised in bold relief, challenging the admiration of the world. The material of which it is composed is bronze, and the proportions colossal. Its pedestal is a solid granite rock, transported from a marsh nine miles in the vicinity, and weighs upwards of three millions of pounds. On this a huge serpent is writhing beneath the tread of the noble steed who has reared in the air, seemingly for the purpose of leaping a wide distance to the ground. The imperial rider is habited in a Roman toga, that flows gracefully from the shoulders, and his right hand is held out, as if protectingly over the city. It is altogether the noblest monument of the kind in existence, and was made at a single cast by the celebrated French sculptor, Falconet. The design and placing is taken from a feat that is currently reported to have been done by the bold monarch it represents.

In one of his excursions he wished for a more extensive view of the adjacent country, and seeing no more eligible place for the purpose than a narrow ledge of rocks, he spurred his horse to the top, and having taken his observations, he found it impossible to wheel and retreat. Not in the least disconcerted, he unhesitatingly reared, and leaped from the principal height to the ground, at the imminent risk of breaking the necks of both horse and rider.

The monument is surrounded by a narrow grass-plot, enclosed by an iron railing, and bears in golden letters, engraved upon the granite, this simple inscription, in Russian and Latin:

PETRO PRIMO
CATHERINE SEGUNDO
MDCCCLXXXII.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

ADVENTURES OF A RANGER.

WE do not know that we can fill a few pages more profitably than by relating an adventure of our neighbour and friend, Mr. Higgins, as we have heard it from his own mouth. He resides within a few miles of Vandalia, and receives a pension from the United States for his services. The following statement may be relied upon, as Mr. Higgins is a man of strict veracity; his companions have corroborated his narrative, and his wounds afford ample proof of his courage and sufferings.

Tom Higgins, as he is usually called, is a native of Kentucky, and is one of the best examples extant of the genuine backwoodsman. During the last war, at the age of nineteen, he enlisted in the Rangers, a corps of mounted men, raised expressly for the protection of the western frontiers. On the thirtieth of August, 1814, he was one of a party of twelve men, under the command of Lieutenant Journey, who were posted at Hill's station, a small stockade, about eight miles south of the present village of Greenville, and something more than twenty miles from Vandalia. These towns were not then in existence, and the surrounding country was one vast wilderness. During the day last mentioned, "Indian signs" were seen about half a mile from the station, and at night the savages were discovered prowling near the fort, but no alarm was given. On the following morning early, Mr. Journey moved out with his party in pursuit of the Indians. Passing round the fence of a corn-field, adjoining the fort, they struck across the prairie, and had not proceeded more than a quarter of a mile, when, in crossing a small ridge, which was covered with a hazle thicket, and in full view of the station, they fell into an ambuscade of the Indians, who rose suddenly around them, to the number of seventy or eighty, and fired. Four of the party were killed, among whom was Lieutenant Journey; one other fell, badly wounded, and the rest fled, except Higgins.

It was an uncommonly sultry morning; the day was just dawning; a heavy dew had fallen the preceding night; the air was still and humid, and the smoke from the guns hung in a heavy cloud over the spot. Under the cover of this cloud, Higgins's surviving companions had escaped, supposing that all that were left were dead, or that at all events it would be rashness to attempt to rescue them from so overwhelming a force. Higgins's horse had been shot through the neck, and fell to his knees and rose again several times. Believing the animal to be mortally wounded he dismounted, but finding that the wound had not greatly disabled him, he continued to hold the bridle; for, as he now felt confident of being able to make good his retreat, he determined to fire off his gun before he retired. He looked round for a tree. There was but one, a small elm, and he made for this, intending to shoot from behind it; but at this moment the cloud of smoke rose partially from before him, disclosing to his view a number of Indians, none of whom discovered him. One of them stood within a few paces, loading his gun, and at him Higgins took a deliberate aim and fired, and the Indian fell. Mr. Higgins, still concealed by the smoke, re-loaded his gun, mounted, and turned to fly, when a low voice near him hailed him with, "Tom, you won't leave me?"

On looking round, he discovered the speaker to be one of his companions, named Burgess, who was lying wounded on the ground, and he replied instantly,

"No, I'll not leave you; come along, and I'll take care of you."

"I can't come," replied Burgess, "my leg is smashed all to pieces."

Higgins sprang from his saddle, and picking up his comrade, whose ankle-bone was broken, in his arms, he proceeded to lift him on his horse, telling him to fly, and that he would make his own way on foot, but the horse taking fright at this instant, darted off, leaving Higgins, with his wounded friend, on foot. Still the cool bravery of the former was sufficient for every emergency, and setting Burgess down gently, he told him, "Now, my good fellow, you must hop off on your three legs, while I stay between you and the Indians, and keep them off;" instructing him, at the same time, to get into the highest grass, and crawl as close to the ground as possible. Burgess followed his advice, and escaped unnoticed. History does not relate a more disinterested act of heroism than this of Higgins, who, having in his hands the certain means of escape from such imminent peril, voluntarily gave them up, by offering his horse to a wounded comrade; and who, when that generous intention was defeated, and his own retreat was still practicable, remained, at the hazard of his life, to protect his crippled friend.

The cloud of smoke, which had partially opened before him, as he faced the enemy, still lay thick behind him, and as he plunged through this, he left it, together with the ridge and the hazle-thicket, between him and the main body of the Indians, and was retiring unobserved by them. Under these circumstances, it is probable that if he had retreated in a direct line towards the station, he might easily have effected his escape; but Burgess was slowly crawling away in that direction, and the gallant Higgins, who coolly surveyed the whole ground, foresaw that if he pursued the same track, and should be discovered, his friend would be endangered. He therefore took the heroic resolution of diverging from the true course so far, as that any of the enemy who should follow him, would not fall in with Burgess. With this intention, he moved stealthily along through the smoke and bushes, intending when he emerged, to retreat at full speed. But as he left the thicket he beheld a large Indian near him, and two others on the other side, in the direction of the fort. Tom coolly surveyed his foes, and began to chalk out his track; for, although in the confidence of his own activity and courage, he felt undismayed at such odds, yet he found it necessary to act the general. Having an enemy on each flank, he determined to separate them, and fight them singly. Making for a ravine, which was not far off, he bounded away; but soon found that one of his limbs failed him, having received a ball in the first fire which, until now, he had scarcely noticed. The largest Indian was following him closely. Higgins several times turned round to fire, but the Indian would halt, and dance about to prevent him from taking aim; and Tom knew that he could not afford to fire at random. The other two were now closing on him, and he found that unless he could dispose of the first one, he must be overpowered. He therefore halted, resolved to receive a fire; and the Indian, at a few paces distant, raised his rifle. Higgins watched his adversary's eye, and just as he thought his finger pressed the trigger, suddenly threw his side to him. It is probable that this motion saved his life, for the ball entered his thigh which would have pierced his body. Tom fell, but rose again and ran, and the largest Indian, certain of his prey, loaded again, and then with the two others pursued. They soon came near. Higgins had again fallen, and as he rose they all three fired, and he received all their balls. He now fell and rose several times, and the Indians throwing away their guns, advanced on him with spears and knives. They frequently charged upon him, but upon his presenting his gun at one or the other they fell back. At last the largest one, thinking, probably, from Tom's reserving his fire so long that his gun was empty, charged boldly up to him; and Higgins, with a steady aim, shot him dead.

With four bullets in his body, with an empty gun, two Indians before him, and a whole tribe but a few rods off, almost any other man would have despaired. But Tom Higgins had no such notion. The Indian whom he had slain was the most dangerous of the three, and he felt little fear of the others. He had been near enough to see their eyes, and he knew human nature sufficiently to discover that he was their superior in courage; he therefore faced them, and began to load his rifle. They raised a whoop, and rushed on him.

"They kept their distance as long as my rifle was loaded," said he, "but now, when they knew it was empty, they were better soldiers."

A fierce and bloody conflict ensued. The Indians, rushing upon Tom, stabbed him in many places; but it happened, fortunately, that the shafts of their spears were thin poles, rigged hastily for this occasion, which bent whenever the point struck a rib, or encountered the opposition of one of Higgins's tough muscles. From this cause, and the continual exertion of his hand and rifle in warding off their thrusts, the wounds thus made were not deep, but his whole front was covered with gashes, of which the scars yet remain, in honourable proof of his valour. At last one of them threw his tomahawk; the edge sunk deep in Higgins's cheek, passed through his ear, which it severed, laid bare the skull to the back of his head, and stretched him on the plain. The Indians rushed on; but Tom instantly recovered his self-possession, and kept them off with his feet and hands, until he succeeded in grasping one of their spears, which, as the Indian attempted to pull it from him, aided him to rise; and clubbing his rifle, he rushed upon the nearest of his foes, and dashed his brains out; in doing which, he broke the stock to pieces, retaining only the barrel in his hand.

The other Indian, however warily he had fought before, now came manfully into battle. It is probable that he felt his character as a warrior at stake. To have fled from a man desperately wounded and almost disarmed, or to have suffered his victim to escape, would have tarnished his manhood. Uttering a terrific yell, he rushed on, attempting to stab the exhausted ranger, while the latter, warding off the spear with one hand, brandished his rifle-barrel in the other. The Indian, unwounded, was now by far the most powerful man; but the moral courage of our hero prevailed, and the savage, unable to bear the fierce glance of his untamed eye, began to retreat slowly towards the place where he had dropped his rifle. Tom knew that if the Indian recovered possession of his gun his own case was hopeless; and throwing away his rifle-barrel, he drew his hunting-knife, and rushed in upon him. A desperate strife ensued, and several deep gashes were inflicted; but the Indian succeeded in casting Higgins from him, and ran to the spot where he had thrown down his gun, while Tom searched for the gun of the other Indian. Thus the two, bleeding and out of breath, were both searching for arms to renew the conflict.

By this time the smoke which lay between the combatants and the main body of the Indians had passed away, and a number of the latter having passed the hazle-thicket were in full view. It seemed, therefore, as if nothing could save our heroic ranger; but relief was at hand. The little garrison at the station, six or seven in number, had witnessed the whole of this remarkable combat. There was among them an heroic woman, a Mrs. Pursley, who, when she saw Higgins nobly contending singly with the foe, urged the men to go to his rescue. The rangers at first considered the attempt hopeless, as the Indians outnumbered them, ten to one. But Mrs. Pursley, declaring that so fine a fellow as Tom should not be lost for want of help, snatched a rifle out of her husband's hand, and jumping on a horse, sallied out. The men, who would not be outdone by a woman, followed, full gallop, towards the place of combat. A scene of intense interest ensued. The Indians at the thicket had just discovered Tom, and were rushing down towards him with savage yells—his friends were spurring their horses to reach him first. Higgins, exhausted with the loss of blood, had fallen and fainted—while his adversary, too intent on his prey to observe anything else, was looking for a rifle. The rangers reached the battle-ground first. Mrs. Pursley, who knew Tom's spirit, thought he had thrown himself down in despair for the loss of his gun, and tendered him the one she carried; but Tom was past shooting. His friends lifted him up, threw him across a horse before one of the party, and turned to retreat just as the Indians came up. They made good their retreat, and the Indians retired.

We repeat this adventure just as it was related to us, and have not the smallest doubt that it is literally correct; or as nearly so as Mr. Higgins's opportunities for observation would admit; for as he very properly observes, he was "in a desperate bad fix just about that time, and it was a powerful bad chance for a man to take notice of what was going on around him."

After being carried into the fort, he remained insensible for some days, and his life was preserved with difficulty by his friends, who extracted all the bullets but two, which remained in his thigh; one of which gave him a great deal of pain for several years, although the flesh was healed. At length he heard that a physician had settled within a day's ride of him, whom he went to see. The physician was willing to extract the ball, but asked the moderate sum of fifty dollars for the operation. This Tom flatly refused to give, as it was more than half a year's pension. As he rode home he turned the matter in his mind, and determined upon a cheaper plan. When he reached his house, he requested his wife to hand him a razor. The exercise of his riding had so chafed the part, that the ball, which usually was not discoverable to the touch, could be felt. With the assistance of his help-mate, he very deliberately laid open his thigh, until the edge of the razor touched the bullet, and inserting his two thumbs into the gash, "fired it out," as he assured us, "without costing a cent." The other ball remains in his limb yet, but gives no trouble, except when he uses violent exercise. He is now one of the most successful hunters in the country, and it still takes the best kind of a man to handle him. Illinois Monthly Magazine.

A CONSEQUENTIAL TRAVELLER.

One day, no matter when, a stranger was seen riding slowly through the streets of a flourishing town in Tennessee. He was a well dressed good looking young man, mounted upon what in this country would be called "the best kind of a nag." His appearance, altogether, was respectable enough; it was even, as respects exteriors, a touch above what is common, and he would have passed along unnoticed, had it not been for one thing, which excited universal attention. Although the streets were crowded with people, and the fronts of the stores adorned with fine goods, and such fancy articles as usually attract the eye, the stranger's gaze was fixed on vacancy; he turned his head neither to the right nor the left—he moved not lip nor eye-lid, but rode forward, as if apparently unconscious, as well of his own existence, as of the presence of his fellow-creatures.

It was court-week, and an unusual concourse of people was collected. Here was the judge with a long train of lawyers. The candidates for office were here, distributing smiles and kindnesses, and practising all those popular arts which are so well understood in every republican country. Here was the farmer, clad in his neatest homespun, and mounted on his best horse. Here was the hunter with his rifle. Here, in short, were the people, collected, some for pleasure, and some for business, exhibiting that excitement of feeling which crowds always produce, with a good humour which is only found in countries where all are free and equal. The public square exhibited a scene which would have been amusing to one unaccustomed to such displays of character. At one spot were two neighbours driving a bargain. Unlike the people of other countries, who transact such business in private, they were surrounded by a host of people, who, all occasionally threw in their comments. A stranger, judging from the sly jokes, the loud bantering, and the vociferous laughter which passed round the circle, would not have supposed that any serious business was in hand; a resident only would infer that before this little circle parted a horse would be swapped, a crop of tobacco sold, or a tract of land conveyed. Not far off was a set of politicians, settling the affairs of the nation. But the most amusing individuals, were some two or three, who were cavorting. Now, if any lady or gentleman is so ignorant of the American language as not to know what cavorting is, and if Webster's celebrated quarto does not furnish the definition, it is necessary that we explain, that it expresses the conduct of an individual who fancies himself the smartest and best man in the world.

On the present occasion, a fellow might be seen dressed in a hunting frock, with a rifle on his shoulder, mounted, half tipsy, upon a spirited horse, and dashing through the crowd. Now he would force his spurs into his horse's sides, and put him at full speed, or rein him up until he reared on his hinder feet; and now he would command him to stop, and the obedient animal would stand and tremble. All the time he was ranting and roaring in praise of himself, his horse, and the United States of America. He boasted that he was born in the woods, rocked in a sugar trough, and nursed by a buffalo; that he could tote a steam-boat, and outrun a streak of lightning; that his wife was as handsome as a pet fawn, and his children real roasters. He bestowed similar encomiums on his horse, and finally avowed himself to be a friend to the United States of America—and then he commenced again, and went over the same round, flourishing his rifle all the time, and exerting his lungs to their utmost. Although he often declared that he could whip any man in the round world, except Colonel C., that he fit under at New-Orleans, nobody accepted the challenge, or took offence, the whole being considered as a matter of course, and as the natural effect of stimulant potations upon an illiterate man of ardent temperament, who, when duly sober, was an honest, quiet, and inoffensive citizen.

While the people were amused at the vagaries of this wild hunter, engaged in conversation, the sun had gone down, and it was nearly dark when the moving automaton, described in the commencement of this story, rode solemnly into the town. It is customary in this country for persons who meet, although unacquainted, to salute each other, and this courtesy is especially practised towards strangers; and although the new comer, on this occasion, would not have been expected to address each individual in a crowded street, yet, when those who were nearest nodded or spoke, as they civilly opened the way, they were surprised to see the horse-man's gaze fixed on vacancy, and his body remaining as erect as if tied to a stake.

"That man's asleep," said one.

"He's as blind as a bat," said another.

"I reckon he's sort o' dead," exclaimed a third.

"He rides an elegant nag," remarked a fourth; and all were surprised that a man, who was apparently so good a judge of a horse, had not wit enough to see where he was going, or to know who were around him.

In the meanwhile our traveller moved proudly on, until he reached the best inn; a fine brick building, presenting every indication of neatness, comfort, and even luxury. As he rode up, two well fed, athletic negroes, with visages like polished ebony, and teeth as white as snow, rushed forth, and while one seized his bridle, the other held his stirrup as he dismounted. Still the automaton relaxed not a muscle; but, drawing up his body, moved majestically towards the house. At the door he was met by the landlord, a portly, well-dressed man, with a fine open countenance, who had been honoured by his fellow citizens with several civil appointments, and had even commanded some of them in the field in times of peril. He touched his hat as he welcomed the stranger, and invited him into his house with an air of dignity and hospitality. A servant took his surcoat, and several gentlemen, who were seated round the fire, rushed back their chairs, to make way for the stranger. But all these things moved not the automaton; the glazed eye and compressed lip were still fixed, and the chin remained in the cushion of an immense cravat. After a momentary pause, the gentlemen in the room resumed their conversation, the landlord applied himself to the business of his house, and the silent traveller was consigned to the oblivion which he seemed to covet; and excited no more attention except from an honest backwoodsman, who strolled in to take a peep, and after gazing at him for a quarter of an hour, suddenly clapped his hands, and exclaimed to his companions,

"It moves, Bill! if it ain't alive I'll agree to go a-foot as long as I live."

By this time candles were lighted, and the silent gentleman seemed to grow weary of silence. He now rose, and strutted across the apartment with a very important stride. He was a young man of about two and twenty; of ordinary height, and less than ordinary thickness. His person seemed to be compressed with corsets, and his head was supported by the ears upon a semicircle of stiffened linen, which occupied the place of shirt collar; and all his habiliments announced him to the eyes of the curious as a genuine specimen of that singular genus, the dandy. After taking several turns through the apartment, he drew forth his gold repeater, and opening his mouth for the first time, exclaimed in a peremptory tone,

"Landlord! I want supper!"

"You shall have it, sir," said the landlord, with a bow, and winking at the same time at the other guests; "we had supped when you arrived, but will not detain you many minutes."

In a short time supper was announced, and the stranger was shown into a back room, handsomely furnished, where a neat, elderly matron presided at the head of a table, spread with tea, coffee, bread, cakes, beef, pork, bacon, venison, fowls, and all that profusion of eatables with which western ladies delight to entertain their guests. Near her sat a young lady, modestly attired, in the bloom of youth and beauty, whose easy manners and engaging appearance, might have warmed any heart not callous to the charms of native elegance. Now, indeed, our dandy opened both mouth and eyes to some purpose. Scarcely deigning to return the salutation of his hostess, he commenced the work of havoc—fish, flesh, and fowl vanished from before him; his eye roved from dish to dish, and then wandered off to the young lady; now he gazed at a broiled chicken, and now at the fair niece of the landlord—but which he liked best, I am unable to say—the chicken seemed to go off very well, but on the subject of the damsel, he never opened his mouth.

Returning again to the sitting apartment he found the same set of gentlemen whom he had left there, still engaged in conversation. They were the judge, the lawyers, and other intelligent men of the country, who were not a little amazed at the airs of our dandy. Again they opened their circle to receive him; but his eyes, his mouth, and his heart if he had one, were closed against every thing but the contemplation of his own important self. After drawing his boots, picking his teeth, and puffing a cigar, he again opened his mouth, with,

"Landlord! I want to go to bed!"

"Whenever you please, sir."

"I want a room to myself, sir!"

"I do not know how that will be," replied the landlord; "my house is full, and I shall be compelled to put you in the room with some of these gentlemen."

"I can't go it!" replied the dandy, strutting up and down; "never slept in a room with any body in my life, sir! and never will! must have a room, sir!"

The landlord now laughed outright at the airs of the coxcomb, and then said, very good humouredly,

"Well, well, I'll go and talk with my wife, and see what we can do."

"My dear," said the landlord, as he entered the supper-room, "here's a man who says he must have a room to himself."

"What, that greedy little man in corsets?"

"The same."

"Set him up with a room!" exclaimed the landlady.

"He is a trifling fellow," said the landlord; "but if we can accommodate the poor little man, we had better do so."

The lady professed her readiness to discharge the rites of hospitality, but declared that there was not a vacant apartment in the house.

"Give him my room, aunt," said the pretty niece, "I will sleep with the children, or any where you please."

The young lady was a visitor, and a great favourite; and the elder lady was altogether opposed to putting her to any discomfort, particularly on account of such a rude man. But the niece carried her point, and arrangements were made accordingly.

In a few minutes the silent man was conducted by the landlord to a very handsomely furnished apartment in the back part of the house. Every thing here was of the best and neatest kind. A suit of curtains hung round the bed, the counterpane was white as snow, and the bed-linen was fresh and fragrant. The dandy walked round the room, examining every thing with the air of a man who fancied his life in danger from some contagious disease or venomous reptile. He then threw open the bed-clothes, and after inspecting them, exclaimed,

"I can't sleep in that bed!"

"Why not, sir?" inquired the astonished landlord.

"It's not clean! I can't sleep in it!" repeated the dandy, strutting up and down, with the most amusing air of self-importance, "I wouldn't sleep there for a thousand dollars!"

"Take care what you say," said the landlord, "you are not aware that I keep the best house in all this country, and that my wife is famed for the cleanliness of her house and beds!"

"Can't help it," replied the dandy, very deliberately surveying himself in a mirror; "very sorry, sir—awkward business, to be sure—but to be plain with you, I won't sleep in a dirty bed to please any man."

"You won't, won't you?"

"No, sir, I will not."

"Then I shall make you!" said the landlord, and seizing the astonished dandy by the back of the neck, he led him to the bed, and forced his face down upon it; "look at it," continued the enraged Tennessean, "examine it—do you call that bed dirty, you puppy!" Then going to the door, he called to a servant to bring him a horsewhip, and informed the terrified gentleman, that unless he went to bed instantly, he should order his negro to horsewhip him. In vain the mortified youngster promised to do all that was required of him; the landlord would trust nothing to his word, but remained until his guest was snugly nestled under the snow-white counterpane.

It was nearly breakfast-time when the crest-fallen stranger made his appearance in the morning. To his surprise his steed, who had evidently fared as well as himself, stood ready saddled at the door.

"Pray sir," said he to his host, in a very humble tone, and in a manner which showed him at a loss how to begin the conversation, "pray sir, at what hour do you breakfast?"

"We breakfast at eight," was the reply, "but the question is one in which you can have little interest, for you must seek a meal elsewhere."

"Surely, my dear sir, you would not treat a gentleman with such indignity!"

"March!" said the landlord.

"My bill!"

"You owe me nothing; I should think myself degraded by receiving your money."

In another moment the self-important mortal, who the evening before had ridden through the town with such a consciousness of his own dignity was galloping away, degraded, vexed, and humbled. As he passed along, the same backwoodsman who had gone to ascertain the fact of his vitality on his first arrival, met him, and pulling off his hat, said very civilly,

"Stranger, your girth is under your horse!"

The dandy reined up his steed, jumped off, and found that his girth was indeed under his horse—where it ought to be.

"Do you mean to insult me?" exclaimed he, turning fiercely upon the backwoodsman; but the latter, instead of replying, coolly remarked to his companions,

"If it ain't alive, I'll agree to be shot!" and walked on.

"Who is that young man?" inquired the judge of the circuit court, as the stranger rode off.

"He is a Philadelphia dun," replied the landlord.

"I am no wiser than before," said his honour.

"Have you lived in our country so long, and not know this race of men? Sir, they are the collectors sent out by eastern merchants to collect their debts. Although they come from different cities, they all go under one general denomination; some of them are fine young men, but too many are like yonder chap."

"But how do you know this to be one of them?"

"Oh, bless you, I know them well. I read the history of that youth in his motions before he was in my house five minutes. One year ago he could bow and smile, like a French dancing master, skip over a counter, and play as many tricks as a pet monkey. He is just out of his apprenticeship, promoted to the dignity of a dun, and mounted on a fine horse, and you know the old proverb, 'Set a beggar on horseback—'"

"I understand the whole matter," replied the judge, and very gravely walked into the house, while the younger members of the bar were roaring with laughter at this odd adventure of the Philadelphia dun.

All sects are different, because they come from men; morality is every where the same, because it comes from God.

THE ORPHAN.

It was a December night. The ground was covered with snow; the north wind blew violently, and whistled as it passed among the willows that shaded the tombs of the cemetery of Passy. George, the watchman of the churchyard, was finishing his nightly rounds, attended by his faithful dog Dragon. At that moment the moon cast her pale beams on that portion of the burial ground appropriated to the poor; the watchman thought he perceived a shadow creeping along the ground; he gave Dragon the accustomed signal, and in an instant the animal with a bark sprang towards the object; his master followed him, and soon found him caressing a young child, who, extended on the ground, was endeavouring to dig the earth up with his hands. It was Paul—left an orphan but two days before, and the favourite of Dragon among all the children of the village; for every morning Paul divided his breakfast with him. "What are you doing there, my boy?" said George. Paul raised his head, and wiping two big tears from his cheeks, replied, "I am looking for mother." The watchman, affected by the answer, took the child in his arms, and carried him from the mournful place. For several days he was carefully watched; but he soon stopped crying, and every one thought he had got over his sorrow. However, about a month after, during a night still colder than that in which George found the orphan at the graveyard, the watchman heard Dragon howling most piteously; he seemed to be near the grave. George immediately directed his steps towards it, and, by the light of his lantern, perceived Dragon extended by the lifeless body of Paul. The orphan had found his mother! The next day he was laid by her side. American.

CELEBRATION ODE.

The following ode, written by S. Woodworth, at the request of his typographical brethren of this city, was printed on a moveable stage during the late procession in honour of the French revolution, and afterwards sung at the Washington parade ground by the choristers attached to the Park theatre.

Tune—Marseillais Hymn.

O'er regal domes, renown'd in story,
The trinal banner proudly waves,
And France resumes the march of glory,
Her gallant sons no longer slaves.
With tyrants vainly had they pleaded—
But when the press in thunder spoke,
It burst their chains with lightning-stroke,
And peace and liberty succeeded.
Then swell the choral strain,
To hail the blest decree;
Rejoice! rejoice! the press shall reign,
And all the world be free.

All hail, renown'd chivalric nation!
Land of the olive and the vine;
Inspired with kindred emulation,
Our bosoms glow with joy like thine.
Columbia's grateful sons can never Forget that in her darkest hour
She owed to Gallia's arm the power
To disenthral her press for ever.
The day which saw the sceptre shiver'd,
And hail'd Columbia truly free,
From every hireling foe delivered,
We consecrate to joy and thee:
For tyrants tremble now before thee,
And a free press, the beacon light
That burst upon oppressor's night,
Has spread eternal glory o'er thee.

Thy chartered rights, with lawless daring,
Beneath oppressors' feet were trod,
Till startled despots heard, despairing,
The people's voice, the voice of God!
Their sovereign will was loudly spoken,
The press proclaimed it to the world,
Till Freedom's ensign waved unfurled,
And Gallia's galling chains were broken.
Thy gallant band of youthful heroes,
Roused by their bleeding country's prayers,
Undaunted hurled on ruthless Neroes
The vengeance due to crimes like theirs.
Too late they see their fatal error,
Their hireling guards by thousands fall,
The press resigns its types for ball,
And despot fly the scene in terror!

Their deeds shall live in deathless story,
And song preserve their chaplets green,
Yet still the brightest rays of glory
Circle one godlike brow serene.
'Tis his, whose youthful valor aided
Columbia's cause, when hostile bands
Were laying waste her fairest lands,
And all her blooming hopes had faded.
Immortal Lafayette, we hail thee,
The friend of equal rights on earth;
Though servile tools of kings assail thee,
Columbia knows and owns thy worth.
Thou first of heroes, best of ages,
The glorious chaplet thou hast won,
Disciple of our Washington,
Shall bloom like his for endless ages.

COMFORT.

This is a very comfortable word, and it is a sad pity the French do not know what it means. But it still is a greater pity that we, who have the word, and do know its meaning, should so often sacrifice it for the most unsubstantial reasons. The fact is, we are ashamed to be comfortable, lest we should appear ungenteel. The best chamber in the house must be shut up for company; the lightest and the handsomest parlour must be kept closed for the same reason. We must have a large house, and a few domestics, for the sake of appearances; and we sometimes cut ourselves off from intelligent society because we cannot afford to receive them with quite so much show and ceremony as our neighbours. All this is foolish. If we cannot afford to be elegant, we can, at least, be comfortable; and if we can procure the elegancies of life, why not enjoy them every day? Why must spring cushions, and warm carpets, and airy rooms, and handsome walls, be shut up three hundred and fifty days of the year, for the sake of making a grand show off now and then? Why do we not consult our comfort by living in smaller houses, and keeping more domestics? Surely, leisure for intellectual and tasteful pursuits is better than the reputation for lofty rooms and Venetian windows. Why should we refrain from seeing cultivated people in a social, cordial way, because another can give them better wine and rarer fruit?

I believe no people in the world have such fear of public opinion as the Americans. To a certain extent the check is a salutary one; but our domestic life is a matter of much more concern to us than it is to the public, and we ought to have sufficient courage to study our own comfort, and gratify our own tastes.

Our manner of visiting and of receiving visitors is laborious in the extreme. If friends are staying with us, we feel as if every moment must be devoted to them. We cannot sleep, or ride, or read, or visit, for fear our friends should be left alone. This is making visiting a burden to them, as well as to ourselves. We soon become uneasy at such constraint, and they are restless under a conviction that they impose it upon us. The fact is, it is a luxury to a visitor sometimes to be left alone—to read, or ramble, or sleep, according to fancy. Many a time, when I have really admired and loved my hostess, I would have thanked her from my heart for a little relaxation of attention—the privilege of being sometimes left to my own thoughts—the luxury of a little more freedom, for her and for myself.

At the south, they manage these things better than we do. Their hospitality is unbounded. Visitors may be at home in a mansion, without depriving the inhabitants of the pleasure of home. Every thing is at the service of friends; but if the hostess wishes to visit, where her guest has no particular inclination to go, she does not hesitate to leave her to herself, to dispose of time as best suits her. What a relief not to be obliged to visit, or obliged to stay at home! This perfect freedom is the only thing that can make visiting a real pleasure to all parties. A friend lately told me of a very elegant woman he had seen at the south, who formed the most prominent attraction at all the fashionable parties.

"I saw her once early in the morning," said he, "buying some fine fruit, at her door. She had on a calico morning-dress, and a very neat plain cap. I thought her an uncommonly genteel domestic—but never dreamed of its being the brilliant belle I had seen the evening before, until she bowed and spoke to me. We entered into some conversation concerning the fruit she was buying; and simple and common-place as the remarks must have been, during such an interview, I was absolutely enchanted with the graceful ease of her manner. A New-England woman would have escaped into the house on my approach, or not recognised me; or, if I had spoken first, would have blushed, and fidgeted, and apologized for her morning dress."

Which course is the wisest? not to ask, which is the most comfortable. An ordinary woman will never get a character for real elegance by starving herself for state occasions; and a truly tasteful one will lose nothing by being sometimes seen without coronation robes.

BRIGHT CHANTICLEER IN DURANCE VILE.

I remember passing a winter's night in a very strange manner. When I was about eighteen years old, being quartered near a country village, I bought a fine game-cock, not to fight but to keep. He was as fine a feathered bird as ever strutted on a pair of legs. I had him carried home, where he and I arrived about five o'clock on a winter's evening. It so happened that another youth and myself were obliged for a time to occupy one small sleeping apartment. I had a full sized bed in it; my companion occupied a small travelling bed, which fitted him like a coffin, folded up into a portmanteau in the day, and was laid out at night by his servant. No sooner had I arrived than I was summoned to dinner; but what must I do with chanticleer? I was puzzled; so I put him, pro tempore, into a dark wooden cupboard, close to the floor, among a parcel of old shoes and coats and pans, and shut the door. Chanticleer, no doubt, made the best of his quarters and went to roost. I went off to dinner, and, in the hurry and bustle of a party, forgot the cock as completely as if he had never existed.

Now it so happened that my friend's little bed was planted with the pillow end close to this same cupboard, the sleeper's ear almost touching the key-hole, the cupboard not being bigger than a good sized box. About twelve o'clock I came home, got into my bed, and fell fast asleep, still unconscious of chanticleer and all that was soon to ensue. My friend had been fast snoring in the arms of Morpheus for an hour gone.

How long I slept I cannot tell, but I was startled with a lengthened roar, which made me think some horrid convulsion of nature was taking place in the whole country. All aghast and half asleep, I listened, and presently was made fully aware of what had taken place, and would be persisted in; for these birds, be it known, crow full twenty minutes at a stretch, quarter minute time. I thought it quite unnecessary to awaken my friend, since to sleep was impossible.

"The cock's shrill clarion or the echoing horn
No more shall rouse him from his lowly bed."

These lines do not apply to my friend. On went the cock, yelling, at short stated intervals, more like a horse than any other noise I know. The cock was not aware that my friend's ear was only half an inch distant from his own beak. Nor was he aware that the cupboard-door acted as a perfect sounding-board. So, on he went roaring his orison in a style which set the furniture in the room into a state of tumult.

I beg the reader will not fancy an abrupt, short, deep crow; there was nothing guttural in it; it was quite the reverse of the Tyrolean minstrel's; every crotchet of it came from the throat, clear, angry, loud, and above all, long, very long. Presently I heard manifest proofs of uneasiness in the tenant of the truckle bed. On went the bugle, again and again repeated. At last I heard a voice cry, "Oh Lord, what is that?" The cock was silent for a moment, till again he blew his angry pipe. "Good heavens! what is that horrid noise?" Again it was repeated, loud enough to tear down the house. I could bear it no longer; the desire to laugh was insupportable, so I crammed the bolster into my mouth. The cock continued his matins; my friend struggled with the horrid annoyance, and also with sleep, till at last chanticleer, by one violent effort, upset a pan, upon which, no doubt, he was perched. This compound clamour raised my friend from his bed. In a dreadful rage, mixed with amazement and curiosity, he flew to the tinder-box to strike a light. When I saw the expression of his face, puffing at the match and cursing the cock at the same instant, it was insufferably comic; but it would require ribs of steel not to explode with laughter, when his question to me of, "Oh dear, dear, what is this noise?" was drowned by a yell from chanticleer; and to see his look, when, after allowing the cock fully to finish, I replied, as if waking from a deep sleep, "What noise do you mean?" At last, wearied with laughter, I told him all—showed him where the hero was deposited. Instantly he removed his bed. Determined upon vengeance, he opened the cupboard door, which no sooner done than the terrified animal battered out the light with his wings, and escaped into some corner of the room. The candle was lost, so down lay my friend, grumbling. At break of day chanticleer again commenced, but he was quickly assailed with boots and shoes, and all kinds of missiles, from both beds, which silenced him till breakfast.

Such a night of restlessness and fun I never did pass before, and I fear never shall again—it is not often that one gets so hearty and so innocent a laugh, although, to be sure, my friend and chanticleer were sufferers.

A BOOK PUFFED BY A GHOST.

A bookseller of Defoe's acquaintance had, in the tradesphrase, rather overprinted an edition of "Dreincourt's Death," and complained to Defoe of the loss which was likely to ensue. The experienced bookmaker, with the purpose of recommending the edition, advised his friend to prefix the celebrated narrative of Mrs. Vesl's ghost, which he wrote for the occasion, with such an air of truth, that, although, in fact, it does not afford a single title of evidence properly so called, it nevertheless was swallowed so eagerly by the people, that Dreincourt's work on Death, which the supposed spirit recommended to the perusal of her friend, Mrs. Bargrave, instead of sleeping on the bookseller's shelf, moved off by thousands at once; the story, incredible in itself, and unsupported as it was by evidence or inquiry, was received as true, merely from the cunning of the narrator and the addition of a number of adventitious circumstances, which no man alive could have conceived as having occurred to the mind of a person composing a fiction.

Walter Scott.

The following is a beautiful tribute to one of our first poets—by a kindred spirit. It is a pleasant thing to know and feel that the rivalry of mind, among our literary writers, is not one of bitterness, but that the holiest feelings of friendship and affection are cherished by those who have placed themselves in the arena of intellect. TO J. G. B.

It is not that because thy name,
Friend of my sadly checkered days,
Is wedded to immortal fame,
Nor that the world with one acclaim
Joins in the psalm of thy praise,
No! though the distant worldly throng
May prize thee for thy matchless song,
Thy spirit-stirring lays;
Beyond the power of words revealing,
I prize thee with a holier feeling.

I prize thee, for thy heart with mine
Hath ever beat in sweet communion!
Through years of cloud, and hours of shine,
A spell hath brought almost divine,
The link of our unbroken union.
The wondrous tales in fable told
Of friendship in the days of old,
Unequalled are by thine;
May no contentious storm invade
The temple we've to friendship made.

Though distant now—though forests roar
Their leafy heads between us twain,
Still to my heart thou art as dear,
Still to my thought thou art as near,
As when we battled wrongs in vain.
On fleetly, time, to me restore
The golden days of life once more,
When we shall meet again—
For when we meet, I still shall find
My friend in heart as loyal and kind.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

French Revolution.—The copious details which have appeared in the newspapers respecting the celebration which took place in this city on the twenty-sixth instant, in honour of the overthrow of despotism in France, renders it unnecessary for us to enter into any minute description. The martial array, the civic pomp and splendour, and the unanimous bursts of enthusiastic gratulation which issued from thousands of freemen assembled to join in, or to witness the festivities, bore testimony to the deep feelings of joy which freemen in this enlightened country must ever cherish in the success of the cause of the people. Seldom, perhaps never, was a more sublime spectacle exhibited than was presented by the multitudes gathered in and around Washington-square. The aged fathers and patriots of the revolution, and the exulting sons of the vine-clad country, whose emancipation was the theme of praise, formed a conspicuous groupe in the crowd, and elicited the most unbounded admiration. The chorus which chanted the Marseillois con amore, and with astonishing effect, deserved the very highest approbation. The whole went off with an eclat which disappointed the doubtful and querulous few, but realised the warmest wishes of the great body of our citizens.

Prize comedy.—The premium offered by Mr. Hackett last spring for the best comedy which should represent some of our prominent national characteristics, has elicited talents of the very first order. Messrs. Halleck, Bryant, Brooks, Lawson, Wetmore, and Leggett were the committee appointed to examine the several pieces written on the occasion, and to adjudicate the prize. No one will call in question their general competency for the task, nor be dissatisfied when he learns that James K. Paulding was the successful candidate, a gentleman whose honourable and patriotic motives in entering the lists of competition cannot be too highly appreciated. His established reputation and great popularity placed him above the reach of the ordinary incentives which would impel authors of minor note. It was a noble ambition to second the efforts of our indigenous comedian in laying the foundation for a national drama, which alone actuated him, and the result will, we venture to prophesy, be gratifying to his own vanity as well as that of his admiring countrymen. The hero of the comedy is a congress-man from the west. We anxiously await its production.

Lectures on elocution.—We have examined the programme of a course of lectures on dramatic poetry and elocution, to be delivered by Mr. J. J. Adams, at Masonic-hall, commencing on Monday evening next. The opportunities which Mr. Adams has enjoyed, and doubtless improved, of studying the best models in elocution, both at home and abroad, united with his own mental and physical qualifications, render him amply competent to the task he has undertaken. His terms are moderate, being two dollars for the course, comprising five lectures. One ticket admits a lady and gentleman.

Young Kean was well received by a full and fashionable house, on his first appearance, at Boston, last week.

COME AWAY TO THE GLEN.

SUNG BY MR. BRAHAM—COMPOSED BY H. R. BISHOP.

Allegretto e Scherzetto.

Come a-way to my arms with a smile and a sigh, That seems half to yield, and yet half to de-ny; Be the dew man-tled rose on thy lip that I seek, Redeem'd, sweet-est love, by the rose on each cheek: Come, come, come, come a-way. Come, come, come, come a-way, come a-way, loved and love-ly one, Come, come a-way, loved an! love-ly one, come a-way.

SECOND VERSE.

Come away with a flutt'ring tear on thy breast,
 I'll hush on my own its wild tremors to rest.
 Does thy heart wildly throb? let me press it to mine,
 And give back a joy for each tremor of thine:
 Come, come, come, come away, &c.

THIRD VERSE.

Come away to the glen, and the grot, and the grove,
 Dear haunts that were fashioned by nature for love,
 There blessing and blest, hide from day's prying sight,
 And steal from the noon a sweet hour of delight:
 Come, come, come, come away, &c.

For the Mirror.

MARY ASLEEP.

"None such true joy are reaping
 As they who watch o'er all they love while sleeping."

How sweetly the innocent slumber,
 When, like the mild dove on her nest,
 Sleep spreads the soft down of her pinions
 To brood o'er the fluttering breast!

Forgot are the evils of life
 In the spirit's immediate calm,
 While oblivion medicines woe,
 And finds for each sorrow a balm.

But memory sometimes awakes,
 For a moment, to visit the past,
 And recalls, or a pleasure or pain
 Too exquisite ever to last.

And the throb of that innocent breast,
 Says 'tis memory's happy employ
 To wake, on the heart's softest chord,
 An echo of earlier joy!

Oh! if such are thy visions this morn,
 Sleep on, my sweet dreamer, sleep on!
 For thou never canst wake to such bliss
 As one dream of the bliss that is gone.

BULWER AND HIS LADY.—The following description of Mr. and Mrs. Bulwer is an extract of a letter from Miss Landon: "Mrs. Bulwer is in figure what is called a fine woman, tall, exquisitely shaped, with a perfect foot and ankle. The phrase 'the midnight darkness of her hair,' is the poetry of truth as applied to her's; it is of that purple black which gives such an idea of richness; her complexion is just a rose crushed on ivory; and eyes, large, soft, clear, of the most variable hazel; but beautiful as her face is in both colour and feature, its chief charm is expression. Perhaps her fascination is even greater than her beauty; animated, lively, it is difficult to say whether you are most dazzled by her wit or won by her sweetness; such a fairy princess of romance could only be matched by some preux chevalier; and truly, in appearance Mr. Bulwer would do honour even to the court of Charlemagne. He is very handsome; a superb intellectual style; in a state of repose his features have a strong expression of melancholy; and his mouth—a beautiful one, by the by, it is, almost as if chiselled in coral—has a compression strongly indicative of pride and decision; but his smile—I never saw any thing so fascinating, when he pleases; if one could apply harmony to the eyes, instead of ears, I should say it was filled with music. He is fair, a profusion of bright curls, slightly but exquisitely formed, with hands and feet of most aristocratic diminutiveness. To say he is gentlemanly, will give you but a slight idea of his manner, which is the very perfection of the most refined excellence, elegant even more from nature than cultivation, I should rather think him silent and reserved in general, but I have heard him converse until, I must say, the conversation became quite an epoch in my memory; language so fine, thoughts so original and yet so just, such information, and in lighter parts, so graceful in its wit, so delightful in its expression—in short one of the very few—I myself should say, the only one who ever came up to one's preconceived notion of genius; and, for a finishing stroke of interest, theirs was a love match, and they seem to be the most attached as well as the handsomest couple I ever saw."

A LETTER FROM ONE LADY TO ANOTHER.—Some have said they should be willing to marry men of small capacity, because their influence might be greater over them. But such men are invariably jealous and irritable. And even if the wife succeeds in ruling her husband, she sinks in the opinion of the amiable and judicious—and that degrades herself. I would sooner gain the confidence and affection of a man of sense, and make it my study through life to fasten no chains upon him but those of love.

A WELL REGULATED MIND.—A well regulated mind does not regard the abusive language of a low fellow in the light of an insult, and deems it beneath revenge. All the abominations to which the latter may give utterance will not raise him one jot above his proper level, or depress the former, in the slightest degree, below his sphere.

"A moral, sensible, and well-bred man,
 Will not insult me—and no other can."

THE NATIONS OF EUROPE.—The regent duke of Orleans once asked a stranger, what were the different characters and distinctions of the various nations in Europe. "The only manner in which I can answer your royal highness is, to repeat to you the first questions which are asked among the several nations in regard to a stranger who comes among them. In Spain they ask, is he nobleman of the first rank? In Germany, can he be admitted into the chapters? In France, is he in favour at court? In Holland, how much money has he? And in England, who is that man?"

CONSTANCY.

When all things have their trial, you shall find
 Nothing is constant but a virtuous mind.

SKETCH OF A MAN WHO LOST HIS WIFE FROM LOVE OF EASE.

"I CAN'T go such a distance. Let her go alone. Since the invention of steamboats and packets, women travel about the world without danger."

Such were the thoughts of the gentleman, and they were soon, with the quick instinct of affection, found out by the lady. She was proud—to be thought a burthen!—you may suppose her indignation. She made a sacred vow she would not ask him to attend her; and she did not. She walked—she rode—she travelled—she went to public places and to private—she moved in the world as she had vowed, alone. At first her independence irritated the husband—the world would censure him—"to let his wife thus roam about without any one to take care of her!" they would say—"but then for her sake I will not," he soliloquized, "suffer her to annoy me; for annoyance lessens love, and I would not love her less"—what an argument!

His wife was an American, but her mother lived in Paris. They had not met for years—she was anxious to see her, and so she told her husband. He looked very gravely, and was evidently annoyed. He objected to her going—her health would be ruined—the fatigue would be excessive—such strange whims women were seized with!—they were always gadding about the world. Poor woman! They had been married six years, and she had never been off the island—he had nothing under heaven to do, but he had twenty objections to going—the true one was, he hated the trouble—and yet he hated she should go alone; but she resolved she would—she spoke not to him—she did not ask him to attend her; and in his wrath he swore he would not.

"She thinks I am her slave to run from mere volition—from the mere annunciation of her mighty will! I respect the sex, but they really get false opinions of authority—they are as bad as the Bourbons themselves. If I should go, having going as I do, I should confer a favour; and if I do, should I not have credit—should I not have justice? I will not go with her."

She went without him—to a city where the men were all gallantry, and smiles, and kind speeches. She had been accustomed to neglect—she received worship and devotion. The new gallants laughed at the husband's lazy negligence, and they said,

"We will succeed if we can—he deserves to be duped—her natural protector thus to neglect her." These thoughts of the gallants, their attentions, their devotion, and their crafty gifts, had their effect upon the lady. She was vain—and she said,

"What a contrast to the cold cruelty of my husband!—although I do believe he loves me far more than these fawning sycophants. But what is love, if selfishness be greater!—what is love when so subdued it can be neither seen or felt?—but still he loves me, and I will not desert him. Yet, why should I not be kind to those who seem at least so kind to me?"

She was gay then in her new society—they had a merry time in Paris—he trusted in her constancy, yet he thought himself a fool—and so he was; for he had lost by his neglect much love he wished to keep—soon there would be little left.

The time for her projected visit was out—she determined she would sail from Havre, but avoid the packet; she would be more private in a merchantman—and she accordingly took passage in one, the captain of which was acquainted with her husband—there were many dangers it was true, and she had heard of them—but they always exaggerate these things—and risk gave a zest to travelling. But, although she liked the excitement of danger, she was timid as you are pleased to see a woman; and she said, when first she went on board,

"Be cautious, captain."

"There is no fear of me," he answered. "I know your husband, madam, and do you think I would not be careful of his lady?"

Methinks I see them now prepared—the restless ship impatient to be off, and the noisy winds impatient too to carry her. Methinks I hear—the lady heard them too—the threatened horrors to the frail bark.

"I do not like this stormy sky—and these loud winds—and every movement of the ship alarms me—I would rather wait for better auspices."

"What better could you need, good lady," said the captain; "no danger do they betoken, only speed."

"It may be so—but I wish I was on shore."

And yet she rightly thought to meet and part again would be no pleasure to herself or to her friends; so though the captain said that all things could be soon on shore, she decided she would stay—"this voyage may be as safe as any other"—and the captain smiled: but she saw not the smile—and yet there was something she distrusted in his voice—and there was a profession of zeal more ominous of ill than were the fretful winds and the threatening sky—besides, on board was thirty thousand dollars in specie, in small barrels—and many a rare French jewel was she taking home with her. They were off—but she now indeed did wish herself on shore; for she thought how strongly tempted was this wretch to piracy, and how easy to elude detection—his tradings might be turned to some far distant port—his own name changed, and his ship—his owners could never find him. The lady was sick with fear—nor less so was her husband when he heard she was to sail with no protection but the captain's, for when she went she had a friend's. He knew no rest, unhappy man! He wrote entreating that she would not come—but the letter never was received, and if it had been, I would not say that the lady would have heeded it—she might have thought "I will not be controlled and neglected in addition"—but it was not received. There was, alas! too much of true prophecy in the fears that it expressed. The impetuous winds bore the fleet ship swiftly over the silken waves—the lady begged the sail might be taken in—the captain was all obedience to her wishes—and yet she did distrust him sadly—she was haunted by his spectre revelling over her jewel caskets. But how should he know she had jewels?—she had cautiously avoided a display—distrust was but from consciousness of cause—but then the specie too on board!—and it was strange the usual time for landing was arrived, and yet they had not arrived.

"Are we not near?" said she to him.

"Not yet," he answered; "but we soon shall be. To such bad latitudes I have been forced out of my course."

And the lady said no more. But they sailed, and they sailed—day after day they moved rapidly over the dark blue waves, and yet no haven did she see.

"What means this?" said the lady again; "in disposition I am not suspicious; yet you must own this course of yours does seem a strange one."

"I own it, lady—but ere long you will do me justice."

She did him justice indeed afterwards, but she did not then—hers was a confiding temperament—suspicion was agony. In herself she saw no guile, and none in others could she see, nor did she see any in this captain. She blamed herself for thinking that she did, and gave him all her confidence. In him she trusted—but, alas! she was wretchedly confounded. How strange a wretch a man can be to afflict the kind beauty that depends on and confides in his fidelity!—and yet do we often find such wretches—and such a one was this our captain.

After being out twice the ordinary time for the worst ship in the worst times, one dark, drizzling night the vessel stopt, and the lady started from her berth—but to despondency and tears of anguish she came, when she came upon the deck—they had lost their longitude, and this was not the port they had sailed for. The lady was inclined to cry, and to upbraid the captain, but she spoke not—old horrid doubts she was seized with first, and certainty soon after—the fatal truth was revealed to her—she was the victim of a band of pirates—her treasures she would lose—her liberty, perhaps. Famine, disease—some horrid wasting of her life awaited her.

"Kind heaven! save me," on her knees she cried.

What was that woman's agony?—it is agony to think of it—all the knowledge of the crimes of piracy in her life that was accumulated from truth or from fiction, now came upon her with its train of hellish imps. With all the blessings of a knowledge of the past, it has its curses too—it spreads the eating cancer of our fears—it haunts us with the spectres of suffering to come; and this is the suffering which so preys upon the soul; that of the past, the thought of is a pleasure; that of the present can always be alleviated; but the cold hopelessness the fancy brings of future wretchedness is enough to stop the current of existence—for it stops the very life of life—it takes away the appetite—and worse with her, she could not read—she could not speak—she could not sleep—

—she was restless—yet she found no rest. The loathsome beast came in her presence.

"I regret the office I am now to execute—but—"

"Talk not to me, sir," said the lady, interrupting him, "make not your crime more hideous by hypocrisy—my keys I here deliver—I ask not my life—but on that Being who protects the destitute I throw myself for mercy."

"Your safety shall be my care," added he, calmly. "We are now on the island of —; here with some trusty friends must you be left until a conveyance be procured—let me introduce my friend, a gentleman, into whose care I commit you."

In the man's courtesy there was something so insulting, it increased her detestation, and for a moment she resolved, to rid herself of present torment, to throw herself overboard. The hopes of escape restrained her—and she suffered herself to be led on shore with composure and apparent resignation. But alas! there was none—and the hypocrisy policy forced her to assume, embittered still more the hatred of her captors.

Six months was she imprisoned on this hated island. In the course of the seventh she was put on board a merchantman, which had stopped for a supply of water. She was placed on board—but with the threat of assassination should she ever disclose the names and conduct of these sea-thieves, which she never did until she heard of their destruction for atrocities they afterwards committed. She was on board the merchantman, I wrote—but while there and while on the island, what was the state of that unfortunate gentleman, her husband? He raved—he strided—like a madman, he cursed himself—and all his pleasure ceased—he wasted away slowly with anxiety and perplexity—perhaps the certainty of evil would have soothed his pain—the certainty of good did certainly—when he heard of her return, his joy knew no limit, and he rushed wildly to her arms—but she turned away in anger—and she was right, for he deserved it—she thought, "had you done your duty to me as a husband, this would not have happened"—nor would it, probably—they would have come on a packet. The poor gentleman thought of his sins—his heart, with all its blemish, was a good one—his lips were slowly pressed against each other, and the tears came in his eyes—who can bear the reproaches of one we love and have injured? His lady pardoned him—but it was, they felt, too late to call back their old and amiable affections—"we must be friendly and be selfish"—and they were so—she could not love him as she had done—her love was mingled with a bitter sense of the selfishness he had betrayed—she would not ask his aid—he would not offer it—and from the cessation of the acts of affection, there was a cessation of the affection itself—and she had learned to act for herself—she prided herself upon self-action—and the poor husband had a time of it—she opposed as regularly as he proposed—he was very irritable, and nearly went crazy. At length he avoided her and formed new attachments, and entered into new society, which seemed to him more delightful from contrast—and more free—duty was not involved in it—and the laws were opposed to it—what a zest opposition gave possession.

His attentions elsewhere gave her many a pang at first—she sought for some alleviation—she resolved to retaliate—she would have justice—she would insult him in return. Thus was a mutual corruption of morals engendered. But neither was happy, although each was changed—and they found that immorality of conduct, whatever its attractions, when distant, have few when near.

There is no love after all like that we have at home—elsewhere it may be more free from the disfiguring tint of discourtesy, but is never so sweet or so salutary. Their new alliances were evanescent in their brightness—they resembled falling stars: while the old (had they preserved them) would have resembled the bright fixtures of the firmament, which, with less brilliancy, what they have, have lastingly. This difference was soon found out by our ill-fated associates; they plunged by degrees into the heartless, hollow enjoyments of the world, carrying with them the bitter fruits of repentance and disgust. As their personal attractions decayed they became a burthen to themselves. Neglected—abandoned—unloved—and by their own misconduct too, they lingered wretchedly to an old age, and then they died. And all this suffering he might have thanked himself for—it was brought on by his love of ease.

MY UNCLE'S SCRAP-BOOK.

Copse-cottage, November, 1830.

MR. EDITOR—Some two or three months since, while speaking of my uncle Ben, I promised your readers a glimpse of his scrap-book, containing original pieces in prose and verse, and am now happy to have it in my power to redeem that pledge. To remove from myself, however, all suspicion of wronging the author, in thus gratifying public curiosity by exposing his youthful productions, I deem it necessary to state how they came into my possession. Yesterday morning, after breakfast, while my uncle was reading aloud to aunt Dorothy "The Legend of the Tiled Cottage," in a late number of your pleasing miscellany, I withdrew to the library, having anticipated him in the perusal of said article. A maple fire was burning briskly in the grate, and as the room was rather unpleasantly warm, I retired to an adjoining apartment to continue my biography of Hans Duboobens, which, by the way, I intend sending you all in good time. I had not been there long before my uncle entered the library. He did not notice me, however, though the intervening door was half open, and I observed a smile pass over his benevolent features, as his eye fell on three new albums, which had just been sent in for his contributions. Accordingly he seated himself for the task, and accomplished it with surprising facility; for, besides being a ready penman, he has had so much experience in thus gratifying the fair, that he has become a tolerable improvisateur, and obeys all their rhythmical behests with the celerity of instinct. After duly punctuating, he read them, in a full mellow voice, for his own auricular satisfaction, and then leaning back, and in his arm-chair, he seemed meditating what next step to undertake. At length he arose, and turning to a low antique escritoire, took from a concealed drawer a manuscript volume, bound round with a blue ribbon. This was the identical scrap-book—the prosaic-poetic paradise which his imagination had laid out in the days of his boyish fancies. He gazed at it long and silently, and though the expression of his countenance manifested much of fondness for the object before him, it was difficult to determine whether pleasure or pain predominated in his feelings. At last he turned suddenly towards the fire, with the air of one about to perform some unpleasant sacrifice, and for a moment the literary martyr hung suspended over the blaze. It was, however, slowly withdrawn, and the second "longing, lingering look," my uncle fastened on his unoffending victim, was accompanied by the following soliloquy, to which you may listen:

THE POET'S LUGUBRIOUS LAMENT,

On destroying at forty the productions of his teens.

Must I, my firstling, cast thee thus away!
My earliest pledge of wedded Clio's love,
Long wooed with fondest vows, and won at last,
To reign the queen of this enamoured heart!
O who shall tell with what parental care,
From hour to hour I watched thy infant growth,
And marked each tiny charin unfold to view,
Beneath the nurture of my fostering hand!
How oft whilom at midnight's solemn hush,
While all around their wonted rest enjoyed,
And sleep and silence whispered of repose,
Above thy cherished form I fondly hung,
Nor recked the wasted taper's dying light,
Nor languid pulse beat, nor the throbbing brow,
And when my wearied head in slumber's lap,
Upon her poppies pillowed, low reclined,
Thou still wert present to my sleepless thoughts,
The reigning vision of each tuncful dream.
How oft in ripening boyhood's pensive mood
I left my jocund mates to drive the hoop,
Or fly the kite, or chase the bounding ball,
And sought alone some unfrequented haunt,
To muse upon thy intellectual worth,
And poise the prospects of thy future fame.
Even then I deemed, with all a poet's pride
And kindling hopes, and yearnings for renown,
That thou shouldst wake the echo of my name
In hearts as yet unborn, when on my lips
Death's awful seal, oblivion-fraught, was set.
Therefore for thee unfalteringly I craved,
With nightly orisons, the muses' gifts—
Pierian flowers beside the hallowed wave
Of famed Castalia reared—and from the fields,
The gorgeous fields, of youthful fancy culled
Whate'er was fair to deck thy artless verse.
But vain the toil, for many a boding fault
Escaped the eye of wild untutored taste;
And now I dare not give thee to the light,
Lest on thy imperfections, in his pride,
The critic's eye should joyously seize,
And, like a scorpion, with unhallowed zeal,
Scatter its mangled members to the winds.
O then, if thou must fall, (and that thou must Despite thy charms to warmer judgment owes,)—
"Twere better sure," said I, by the hand
Of one that loves thee, than await the rack
And studied tortures of a ruthless foe.
Forgive me, therefore, O virgin-like,
I sever all affectionate ties,
And send thee hence to an early grave,
The author's and the offspring's shame to save!

As my uncle pronounced the last sentence, he averted his face, veiled his eyes with his left hand, and with a kind of spasmodic movement of the right, despatched the subject of his soliloquy in a line towards the grate; but a bow of the blue ribbon which entwined it, caught in the button of his coat sleeve, and it fell short of its fiery destination. I sprang from my seat to the rescue, and when he uncovered his eyes, he beheld his nephew and his devoted favourite directly before him. Though somewhat surprised, he did not seem displeased at my friendly officiousness, and I ventured to speak. "Pray pardon me, sir," said I, "for having thus intruded, but really I could not be apprised of your intended sacrifice without endeavouring to avert it. Ever since my aunt Dorothy sung me your 'Song of the sylvan Sylph,' I have indulged the hope of being gratified with other specimens of your youthful lyre. Will you not, therefore, allow me to retain this memorial of your early efforts in poetry?"

"Poetry!" repeated my uncle, with a deep prolonged emphasis, "do you ever write poetry, boy?" He always called me boy.

"I have rhymed," I replied, "but never dignified my productions with the title of poetry. I call them prose run mad, and it is no misnomer."

"Well," said he, "modesty becomes a young author. Keep the manuscript, since you desire it. I do not much regret your interposition in its behalf, for I could not have destroyed the bantering of my teens without a visitation of sorrow. Moreover, you may find therein some metaphysical hints that may not, perhaps, prove altogether unserviceable. But should you make any quotations from it, I prithee be liberal of inverted commas, for I abominate all literary kidnapping—'tis a villainous appropriation."

"Assuredly it is disingenuous, nay contemptible," and I turned to leave the library.

"Now don't expose me," he continued, laying his hand on my arm, "don't expose me, boy. Be careful of the work, for I feel somewhat of fatherly solicitude for its fate. Don't tear it up to light your lamp with the pieces—'tis written in a fair hand, and on gold-edged paper too. Should you think it worth while, by and by, to publish some of the contents, you may do so; but look to the proof-sheet yourself, and be sure you secure the copy-right first; for it is wise to guard against contingencies—there is no telling what may 'take' now-a-days, public taste is soameleon-like. The world is redolent of rhymes, but good poetry is a glorious article, and to throw such into the press is not like sending flowers to Flushing."

"It is very true, uncle; I will obey your injunctions," and I bowed good morning. Before I reached the foot of the stairs, however, he called out,

"Look to it, boy; don't use it for lighting lamps or cigars."

"No, sir, assuredly not," and in a moment after I was seated in my own room. The blue ribbon was carefully untied, and, as I promised, the miscellaneous stores of the little volume shall be served up from time to time for the gratification of your readers. For the present I hope they will rest satisfied with the following extract.

PROMUS.

SLAVERY.

Ask of the radiant spheres that fly
In the deep blue skies away,
Far as creation's boundary,
What sceptre ye obey?
And they shall sing in their loudest strain—
"On, on! we wear no tyrant's chain!"

Ask of the winds, before whose might
The clouds in their splendour flee,
And the eagle stoops from his daring height—
Whose ruffian slaves are ye?
And the winds shall shout as they rush amain,
In their pride of strength, "We know no chain."

Ask of the waves, whose peaks are rung
Forth to earth's farthest clime—
Where are the fetters Canute flung
Upon your march sublime?
And as they sweep on gloriously,
Thou shalt be answered, "We are free."

Question the tempest, in its hour
Of lightning and of gloom;
Question the thunder's awful power;
The monarch of the tomb—
Whose are the chains around you wrought?
And they shall answer, "Thine are not."

Ask of the jocund birds, that wing
Their flight in every zone,
Mid tropic bowers where smiles the spring
Through one unceasing blossoming;
Or arctic wastes, where winter's form
Careers amid the darkling storm,
And spring is never known—
Yea, ask the birds—whose vassals ye?
And the woods shall echo, "We are free."

But ask not man if he be free
From slavery's with'ring blight,
Unnumbered groans shall answer thee,
E'en in this age of light—
"Be silent thou, nor question Man,
"Creation's saddest wreck,
"His chain is on his brother's limb,
"His foot upon his neck!"

FOREIGN LITERATURE.

FETE OF THE ROSE.

IN the little village adjacent to the town of Bergeus, in French Flanders, there prevails an immemorial custom of celebrating an annual festival, called the "Fête of the Rose." Somewhat resembling, in the ceremonies, the feasts of the old English village greens, and most, perhaps, that of electing a queen of the May, it is, nevertheless, very distinct in its object and tendency. The rose-maiden, as she is prettily designated, who is selected to wear the triumphal wreath, and to preside as queen of the day, aspires to the distinction, not by virtue of superior beauty, station, or influence in the place, but of the reputation she has acquired for filial and domestic virtues; her gentle and obliging manners; in short, for all that makes a girl favourably reported of in her native village. According to an oral tradition, one of these annual festivals was made memorable by the occurrence of some singular incidents, and as singular a discovery, hardly to be anticipated by the chief personages who figured in the humble drama.

In the year 1765, General Muffeldorf, an old campaigner in the wars of the great Frederick, arrived at his family mansion in the vicinity of Bergeus. He was evidently suffering under depression of spirits, as well as a shattered frame; and he brought with him his friend Count Lindenkrone, an old courtier of the Viennese school, whose merry mood marked him a rare exception to the usual line of Austrian thick lips and wits obtuse. As a preparation for cultivating the arts of peace, the general was recommended by his friend to mingle in the approaching festivities: it was the eve of the rose-festival, and it was reported that the prize of merit would be awarded to one of the worthy pastor's daughters. The young Evelina bore the most enviable character; she had punctually fulfilled every duty with unwearying gentleness and assiduity; she was beloved by all for her benevolence; she visited the poor, instructed their children, raised subscriptions, for every object of good, among the neighbouring gentry; and, always eager and enthusiastic in a right cause, she was at once the pride and the life of the hamlet.

Delighted with the account he heard, the good old general commissioned his friend to pay a visit to Evelina and the pastor, and to offer, on his behalf, the free use of the noble lawn, and the hall itself, as the scene of the next day's election. The proposal was accordingly tendered to the ladies' committee, and accepted; the ancient minister was enraptured with the beauty and manners of the fair candidate; and he still lingered, after performing his mission, to converse with her. He regretted that he had not yet seen the village church; and the pastor being from home, Evelina, at her mother's request, instantly took down the keys, and offered to show him through the edifice. Expressing his gratitude in the most profuse terms, the count attended her to the church; and, having seen every thing worthy of notice, turned to depart, when, just on reaching the door, he had the temerity to offer her a salute; and the next instant found himself locked inside the church, with a parting slap of the fair hand tingling on his cheek. Here the count had full leisure to indulge his taste for church architecture, instead of drinking tea with his friend the general, who was now impatiently looking for his return; but he looked in vain. It grew dark, but no count made his appearance. Meantime, in fast durance, the courtier of the old school began to feel uneasy as the shades of night advanced; he could see nothing distinctly; but what he did see, seemed very like the ghosts of deceased elders, coming out of the vaults to read him a grave lecture on the wicked gallantry of the old courts. The shadowy forms of ancient apostles appeared to be leaving their marble stations; strange noises were heard; and fancy was about to run away with him on her witch's broom. In this delectable state he had crawled to the doors, and begun to batter them, crying, at the top of his voice, "Ghosts and murder!" and with so much emphasis, that the words reached the ears of the worthy pastor, as he was jogging by, on his way home. He made a full stop. "Ghosts and murder!" he ejaculated, as he heard the words repeated—"and in my church! this is very shocking! very odd!" Instead of going nearer, however, he only spurred on the faster, thinking it was of no use to examine into the cause before he had got the church keys, if he did at all.

On entering his own door, Evelina came forward and handed him the said keys; but the pastor involuntarily refused them, exclaiming, in an uneasy tone,

"What makes you think I am going to church to-night?"

"You must go, father; I have a particular reason for it."

"And I may have a particular reason for not going."

joined the pastor; and assuredly either you, or your mother, or our old sexton, or all of you, shall go with me; I heard strange noises as I came by."

"Yes, yes! I dare say," replied his daughter: and taking her father's arm, she related to him what had occurred in his absence, as they went along. Greatly comforted in one sense, the worthy pastor thanked heaven that matters were no worse, and hastened his steps to release the unfortunate count.

The moment the church-door was unfastened, out bolted the captive like an arrow shot from a bow, as if pursued by a legion of demons, nor looked once behind him until he had reached the general's, who had almost given him up for lost. Swift as he had come, however, the count had time to invent a story by the way; for he assured the general he had been locked in the church by the sexton, and quite by mistake. It passed with the good old general, who even commiserated the poor count's mishap; while the latter secretly vowed vengeance on the fair cause of his disaster and alarm.

The morning at length appeared, and the general was first roused by the blast of a trumpet under his windows, answered by the peals of a great drum. He looked out and beheld, with astonishment, the most singular company he had ever seen upon parade—literally a skeleton regiment. It consisted of about twenty old, shrivelled, broken-down soldiers—a true inviolated corps, most fit for the body-guard of death. They were almost buried in their wide regimentals, old cocked hats, and huge perukes. They were armed in an equally ludicrous style, while their colours flourished in the grasp of an ugly, hunch-backed little ensign. Their commander, advancing in front, mounted on a richly caparisoned donkey, answered the queries of the general, by informing him that they were a detachment of an inviolated regiment at Bergues, despatched thither by the general's friend, Colonel Solnitz, to do honour to the festival, and preserve peace during the election.

"Just as well qualified for the one as the other," returned the general to the dwarfish officer; "and though I had no idea of calling out the military on this occasion, I will furnish you with some rations, for which, I suspect, you are much better prepared than for fighting; so march, quick time, to my house-steward, he will be your commissary." The general had no need to repeat his request; they suddenly disappeared.

The festival was ushered in by a fine cloudless day. The good and lovely Evelina was conducted from her residence with great pomp. Her fine auburn tresses were wreathed with flowers; flowers were strewn along her path. Upon the green lawn, bedecked as the place of coronation, the pastor addressed the spectators in a short impressive discourse, pointing out the superior advantages of a course of prudent and virtuous conduct, as contrasted with an opposite career. The general next placed the rose-crown on the fair maiden's brow, little dreaming, at the moment, he was bestowing the prize of excellence on his own long-lost child, whose fate, and that of her mother, he had vainly mourned for years. As little could he have conjectured that his ancient friend, Count Lindenkrone, the courtier, would be the cause—hardly, we fear, the innocent cause of making so interesting a discovery; for a certain feeling of revenge was still lurking in his heart, on account of the fright Evelina had thrown him into the day before. He had matured his design; and such was the happy sequel of it.

After the festivities of the day, the parties had withdrawn late in the evening into the castle. While there, engaged in different amusing games and dances, Evelina was informed that a fine lady wished to speak with her in another apartment. She followed her informant's steps, and was conducted into the presence of the strange lady, who requested her to be seated near her. She was alone; she threw her arms round Evelina, and saluted her most warmly. The fair girl shrunk back intimidated, but was terrified at being clasped closer in the lady's arms than before. She shrieked out repeatedly; and, the next moment, Erick, the young forester, (and her reputed lover,) rushed into the room, and, observing the sleeves of a man's coat under the strange lady's gown, instantly knocked her down, and released the trembling Evelina.

No sooner had Erick performed this feat, than in hobbled a party of the skeleton regiment, and boldly took up a position, with a demonstration to seize upon the young forester. But the athletic champion warned them off, begging they "would not compel him to lay a heavy hand upon so respectable a body of veterans; for if they did not respect his person, he would shuffle them all together like a pack of cards, and throw them out of the window." But the count, now rising, joined their standard, and encouraged them to the attack, and, the old general rushing in at the same moment, a scene took place that beggars all description: Evelina fainting—Erick swearing—the count without his wig, moping and mowing like a monkey, in a lady's dress—and the veteran invalids shouldering their crutches, "showing how fields were not won." In the midst of all this hubbub, in burst another personage, a lady in deep mourning, exclaiming,

"My daughter! where is my long-lost daughter?"

She withdrew her veil, and the general started and uttered an exclamation of terror, as he gazed on her countenance.

"Adelaide! my own! my lost one! is it true? Alas! I believed you had been long dead."

The lady seemed little less surprised.

"False, treacherous Mowbray!" she cried; "false to your trust as a husband and a father; how could you desert us? I, too, believed you fallen in battle; and, had it not been for the excellent pastor, who adopted my little Evelina as his child, we had never lived to reproach you."

"Alas!" returned the general, "you cannot reproach me so severely as my own conscience has done. Yet, believe me, I have again and again sought to discover you. I was even assured both you and my child were dead; but thus to meet is an over-payment for all our sufferings."

The general clasped to his bosom his weeping wife and daughter; the veterans were ordered to counter-march; the old count slunk away to adjust his gown; and young Erick, taking Evelina's hand, sank upon his knees before the general, and entreated his blessing.

LITERARY NOTICES.

CAREY'S MISCELLANIES.—If ever there existed an individual to whom the motto prefixed to the present volume,

"Homo sum. Humani me nil alienum puto," more emphatically applied than to all others, that man is Matthew Carey. His heart is open, as the mid-day sun in a cloudless sky, to all the generous sympathies of our nature, and these sympathies are confined to no sect in religion, to no rank in society, to no district of country, and to no generation of time. All objects which have a claim upon benevolence arrest his attention, and excite his ardent and untiring exertions. Nor is his benevolence indiscriminating or pompous in its obtrusion upon public notice. He seeks no display for his charities, excepting such as is necessary to extend the sphere of its operations, and to place it within the power of his fellow-men to go and do likewise. On every public occasion he is found the ready friend of liberal opinions, and the steady promoter of all public-spirited enterprises. This is no exaggerated praise—it is naked fact; and fortunately for his panegyrist Mr. Carey has not confined his efforts to do good to private acts. He has stepped forth as an author to incite the minds of his fellow-citizens whenever he thought an address to their common sense or better feelings was required. We wish that we could say he has always been successful; this, however, has not been the case, as is proved by his late appeal in behalf of the labouring classes of the female sex. No talent was wanting; no absence of convincing and clear argument; no want of heart-stirring fact; but the cause was not fashionable. It did not enlist classic feeling or ardour, and it was not listened to. This failure proves no lack of power on the part of the philanthropist; it betrays shameful indifference on the part of those who well know, at suitable periods, or for interested purposes, how to utter noises, declamations, and procure liberal donations. Mr. Carey's disinterested zeal will not however be forgotten, nor can it fail of attaining ultimate success; its operation will be slow but sure. We have been led to this merited notice of the author by his interesting Miscellanies now lying before us, condensed into a very neat and well-printed octavo. They consist of his "History of the Yellow Fever, which prevailed in Philadelphia in 1793;" "Review of the evidence of the pretended conspiracy of the Roman Catholics of Ireland to massacre the Protestants in 1641;" "Reflections on the subject of Emigration from Europe;" "Essays on the public Charities of Philadelphia;" "A brief view of the policy of the Founders of the Colonies of Massachusetts, Rhode-Island, West-Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, and Carolina, as regards Liberty of Conscience;" "Critical Remarks on Hamlet;" "Vindication of Sterne from the charge of Plagiarism." These essays are all well known—they need no comment.

Elliot and Palmer have published a neat duodecimo volume, entitled, "A complete and accurate description of the procession which took place in this city in commemoration of the triumph of liberty in France, with all the Odes written on the occasion. To which is prefixed, a brief account of the causes which led to the memorable events of July, 1830."

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

SURGICAL RECOVERY OF AN EYE.—M. Maunoir, professor of surgery at Geneva, having performed the operation for cataract, by extraction, upon a man eighty-two years of age, weakened by an operation for hernia, which he had endured six weeks before, perceived to his regret that, although the pupil remained beautifully black, and perfectly in tact, the anterior and posterior chambers of the eye were not replenished, the cornea became sunk and wrinkled, a few bubbles of air penetrated the anterior chamber, and the patient had no vision. Without yielding to the first melancholy impression, the operator, by a happy presence of mind, conceived the hopes of filling the cavity; he sent immediately for some distilled water, warmed it, placed the patient on his back, and filled the external orbit of the eye with the water, opened the eye-lid, and raised the flap of the cornea. The water then penetrated into all the accessible cavities, the folds of the cornea disappeared, and its convexity was restored. Having kept the eye shut for some minutes, he then directed the patient to open it, and found it in the most satisfactory condition; the patient distinguished all the objects presented to him as well as after the most successful operation. A slight pain was felt after the introduction of the water, which went off after a short time. From that period the eye healed without difficulty, and when opened, a week after the operation, it was free from swelling and inflammation; the cornea was perfectly united, but the pupil was a little obscure, the sight feeble, and the patient complained that he did not see so well as immediately after the operation. But six days after the bandage was removed the shade of the pupil was much diminished, the sight grew stronger from day to day, and no doubt was entertained that the patient would soon be able to read common print.

THE SOLAR ECLIPSE OF FEBRUARY.—The American Almanac, just published, contains a variety of calculations relative to the great solar eclipse, which will be visible throughout the United States, on the twelfth of February next. The central eclipse will enter the United States from Mexico, and will pass through the states of Louisiana, Mississippi, and Alabama, the north part of Georgia and South Carolina, North Carolina and south-eastern parts of Virginia and Maryland; thence proceeding along the Atlantic, at a distance of fifty or sixty miles from Long Island, it will pass through the south-eastern part of the island of Nantucket, and thence to Halifax, in Nova Scotia. The unobscured part of the sun will present an annular appearance at all places within about thirty-four miles on each side of this track, and the ring will become more or less uniform in proportion as the place is nearer to the central track. The duration of the annular eclipse, in places where it is central, will be a little over two minutes. The path of the annular eclipse will extend to the town of Chatham, in the county of Barnstable, but to no other part of the continent in the New-England States, and to no part of the middle states except the southern extremity of New-Jersey and Delaware.

ROTARY ENGINE.—Mr. Childs, of Philadelphia, has recently procured a patent for a steam-engine, which promises to be of great use, especially in propelling carriages on rail-roads, upon which it may be made to ascend at almost any desired angle. The United States Gazette says, it is remarkably compact, of very trifling weight, and will draw a carriage at an unusual velocity; it may be made at one quarter of the expense of Mr. Stephenson's. Among the peculiarities of its structure is a circular piston. Dr. Jones is said to have full confidence in the invention of Mr. Childs.

THE PARK THEATRE.

MASTER BURKE.—This wonderful boy has attracted crowded houses every night of his first engagement, and they have averaged no less than twelve hundred dollars each. He is equally at home in comedy, tragedy, and farce. His musical abilities and skill are astonishing for one of his age. We wish to be distinctly understood, as our remarks have been, as we learn, misapprehended, and made to convey the idea that we called his musical powers in question. This is not the fact. We simply objected to the phraseology of the play-bills. If the worthy editor of the Truth Teller will refer to our previous numbers, he will be satisfied that we have done as much as any writer in the city, if not more, to advance the interests of the precocious prodigy.

Miss Clara Fisher succeeds, with her charming and nameless attractions, to occupy the boards.

To a gentleman of this city.

NUMBER SEVEN.

St. Petersburg, 1830.

LEAVING the statue of Peter the Great, we pass the senate-house, arching the Gallernoi-street, and forming the front of two solid squares, and crossing a branch of the Ecatherine canal, we come to an imperial stable. The building stands distinct from any other; the front is of chaste architecture, and on each side of the entrance, on marble pedestals, an Arabian barb is reared, with gigantic naked figures at their sides, stoutly holding their bridles, and endeavouring to curb their native fire. This is one among many that adorn the city, and is alone capable of accommodating fifteen hundred horses. I have myself seen a cavalry regiment of twelve hundred quartered here. A little above, and in the same spacious square, the church of St. Isaac is rebuilding. It occupies the ground with a much greater extension than the old one did, and when finished, will be one of the noblest specimens of architecture in the world. A description of it at this early stage would be premature; but to give you an idea of its strength and proportions I shall only say, that the outside columns are forty-eight in number, each one composed of a solid block of granite fifty-six feet in length and six in diameter, and highly and beautifully polished. The Admiralty is a parallelogram of great length, directly on the bank of the Neva, and encloses a capacious ship-yard. A wide arch opens in the centre, over which Neptune, Minerva, and many inferior gods, are sculptured in bas relief. A tower, supported by Ionic pillars, crowns the roof, and over that rises a tall spire, covered with the finest ducat gold,* and sporting for a vane a full-rigged frigate, of the same material. We found a chapel in one wing, and in the main body a large hall filled with naval models of different nations, a great variety of nautical instruments, weapons of attack and defence, medals, birds, and a few ordinary paintings. The residue of the building is occupied by the chancellerie for naval affairs, and as offices and store-rooms. Strangers are not permitted to visit the yard; but by hastily passing the inner arch, and giving the guard the military salute, I was taken for an attaché, and got an entrance. I had barely time, however, to notice a good supply of building material, piled up in different quarters, and that a large frigate and some smaller craft were on the stocks, when an officer, more knowing than the sentry, politely signified to me that I must instantly retire. As I returned I heard the poor guard catechized in an angry tone, but did not stop to learn whether he paid a further forfeit for this dereliction of duty. Wide gravel walks, kept with the utmost neatness, and shaded by double rows of the linden tree, surround the Admiralty, and run along the square, interspersed with seats for those who are weary of the promenade. On the opposite side stand the four-story barracks of a battalion of the Preobrajensky regiment of guards, and at the end of these the Nevesky Perspective opens—the Broadway of St. Petersburg. This street runs through to the suburbs, and is perfectly straight for one and a half miles, and after passing the Moika canal, is more than twice the width of Broadway. Shade trees skirt the side-walks, a treble line of deal is laid down for carriage wheels, so that they roll along with great rapidity, and as noiselessly as if on a plank floor. The houses in this as well as other quarters of the city, are generally three and four stories in height, occupying from three to six times the ground of those in American cities, with sculpture in front, a wide arch and carriage-way in the centre, and court-yards within. I am told that some of the largest accommodate three or four hundred persons, of different families. The shops are not generally as splendid as with us; and to many of the richest and best furnished, one has to enter through a circuitous back passage, and ascend to a second story. I found both foreign and Russian churches in this street in profusion, of the former the Roman catholic is most worthy of notice. It was erected by the Jesuits, but upon their suppression, passed into the hands of the Dominicans, who are a rich and beneficent order here, and own the whole great square of buildings in which their church is situated. Their preaching is alternately in French, German, and Polish; of the latter languages I know nothing, but in the former I have occasionally heard one of the fraternity deliver an elegant discourse. The organ is of superior tone and very powerful, the singing delightful, and at a grand mass I have counted eight and twenty additional instruments in the choir. In the wall of the right hand aisle as you enter, a plain marble slab is placed to the memory of General Morcau. I should hardly have noticed it had not my knee struck against the little iron railing that surrounds it. I stopped, and simply read,

MOREAU,

Né à Morlaix, 11 Août 1768, Mort à Laune, 2 Sept. 1813.

And is this all, thought I, to one whose achievements had filled my early mind with wonder and admiration, and yet it may be enough; for notwithstanding the sympathy with which we viewed his unmerited exile and untimely fate, still I could never justify his aiding with a foreign enemy to invade his own country.

Near the altar the amiable Stanislaus, the last king of the Poles, lies buried. A lengthened slab is niched over his remains, on a level with the church floor, but so worn by the feet of devotees that I could not make out the inscription. Some statuary and paintings adorned the walls, the best of which was the Last Supper.

Of the Russian churches the cathedral of Our Lady of Cazan is the noblest that the street, or indeed that the capital, can at present boast. Its architecture is in imitation of St. Peters at Rome, and it recedes a considerable distance from the street, throwing from each corner of the façade a circular colonnade of one hundred and thirty Corinthian pillars, forming with the front of the church an extended semicircle, and supporting a low attic all round, seemingly full of deep-toned bells, and over-arching the streets that pass on either side, making a magnificent effect. Colossal statues in bronze of the angels Gabriel and Michael stand at the grand entrance; the doors are composed of the same material, and ornamented by battle and procession scenes, taken from holy writ. The interior, like all Greek churches, is in the shape of a cross, and has two hundred and thirty-one feet in length by one hundred and eighty in breadth. The arch is supported by fifty-six Corinthian pillars, in four ranges, thirty-five feet in length and three and a half in diameter, of dark Finnish granite of entire blocks, and very highly polished. The floor is of checkered Siberian jasper and marble, and a dome rises one hundred and fifty-four feet above. A balustrade of massive silver surrounds the altar, and its sacred door is of the same material, the sides of which are adorned with beautiful full-length paintings of our Saviour, the Virgin Mary, and the apostles. I was assured that diamonds worth twenty thousand dollars encircled the head of the virgin, and that the halo around the Saviour was of pure gold. Along the side and walls paintings of a most heathenish aspect were enclosed in cases; and bloody standards and shattered flags, that had been taken in wars with the different nations of Europe and Asia, hung in festoons, or encircled the columns, spangled with keys of fallen fortresses, and the glittering arms of their commandants. But a single seat, and that on raised steps, encumbers the church, and nothing can exceed the outward respect and apparent devotion of the people. For the first time that a church is passed in the day, the Russian, if in a carriage, or about urgent business, rapidly crosses himself; if not, he pauses before the sacred edifice, takes off his hat, bows, crosses, and utters a brief prayer.

It was on a Sunday that I first visited the cathedral, and I found the congregation mostly made up of common people, the emperor and the nobility having their own private chapels, and only attending here on fête days and grand occasions. From the most delicate female in silk, to the boor in sheepskin, caftan, and basket-shoes, on entering they kneel and repeatedly bow their heads to the dust; rising, the females more generally surround the saints, before which lamps are kept burning, and then repeat their adorations, occasionally approaching and kissing the sacred shrine. The males sent their svistchas, or small candles, to be placed in the row blazing in the great chandelier, then joined the throng that surrounds and worships before the altar. The priests, in their rich flowing robes, long beard, and longer hair, make an imposing appearance, and conduct the preliminary ceremonies of the service in a style similar to the Roman catholics, after which a monk, with a dark velvet cap and black gown, mounts a low pulpit at the extreme of an arm of the cross, and delivers a short and animated sermon. In retiring through the people, he gives his hands to be kissed, and then dismisses them with his blessing. But of such music as was here I had formed no conception, and I am assured it is only to be found at St. Petersburg and Rome. The finest voices of the empire are selected for this choir, and receive the best instruction from their youth up. It is entirely vocal, and consists of a unison of men's and boys' voices. How often have I attended the preparation service of the night before the sabbath, for the exquisite sensations that its melody would alone produce: leaning in a recess of the lengthened cross, the altar faintly lighted up, and showing a beautiful female kneeling before the virgin, with here and there a more homely worshipper at other shrines; the tall columns casting deep shadows from their dark sides; a single priest officiating, and half hid in the smoking incense, muttering his vespers, with alternate bursts from the choir. This through and retired, the music begins in a soft, sweet strain, just reaching the listening ear. Gradually it rises and rises, till the high dome above seems bursting with sound, and then it echoes in loud peals along the vaulted aisles; suddenly it dies away, and again rises in abrupt and broken chants, and then in sweeter and more steady swells, till the deep tones of a ponderous bell announce the vespers closed. Yet this is tame description after all, and I hope you may yet find it worth your while to cross the Atlantic if for nothing more than to see the noble statue of Peter the Great and listen to the court choir. Even Catalani, when here, was so affected on hearing its seraphic strains, as to burst into tears; and I am sure that I am now spoiled for any concert that is likely to be soon got up on your side of the water. ***

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

THE FALSE ONE.

I KNEW him not—I sought him not—
He was my father's guest;
I gave him not one smile more kind
Than those I gave the rest:
He sat beside me at the board,
The choice was not my own,
But oh! I never heard a voice
With half so sweet a tone.

And at the dance again we met,
Again I was his choice,
Again I heard the tender tone
Of that beguiling voice;
I sought him not—he led me forth
From all the fairest there,
And told me he had never seen
A face he thought so fair.

Ah! wherefore did he tell me this?
His praises made me vain;
And, when he left me, how I long'd
To hear that voice again!
I wonder'd why my old pursuits
Had lost their wonted charm,
And why the path was dull, unless
I leant upon his arm.

Alas! I might have guess'd the cause;
For what could make me shun
My parents' cheerful dwelling-place
To wander all alone?
And what could make me braid my hair,
And study to improve
The form that he had deign'd to praise?
What could it be—but love?

Oh! little knew I of the world,
And less of man's career;
I thought each smile was kindly meant,
Each word of praise sincere.
His sweet voice spoke of endless love—
I listen'd and believed,
And little dreamt how oft before
That sweet voice had deceived.

He smiles upon another now,
And in the same sweet tone
He breathes to her those winning words
I once thought all my own.
Oh! why is she so beautiful?
I cannot blame his choice,
Nor can I doubt she will be won
By that beguiling voice.

MY GREAT-GRANDMOTHER'S HARPSICHOORD.

BY T. H. BAYLEY.

"Most musical—most melancholy."

I had drained the last drop of my bottle of claret, and sat musing in solitude before the fire. "Yes," thought I, "yes, my daughters are come to years of education, so I must get a musical instructor and a grand piano."

Girls must be accomplished, and four or five hours a day must be devoted to music. It is absolutely necessary that they should be taught the use of the keys—not the keys that their grandmother (excellent woman!) handled: no—they were suspended in a bunch at her side.

For three generations our family has been decidedly unmusical; I speak it with shame and deep humiliation, but it is the truth, and I will be brave enough to own it—for three generations we have possessed (critically speaking) neither voices, ears, nor souls!

* Whatever the reader may think of a golden spire, he may be assured there is no mistake about the matter; for, during the French invasion, the imperial treasure being low, it was proposed to the emperor, as a means to replenish it, to strip the Admiralty steeple, but Alexander nobly replied, that what his ancestors had so magnificently done, he would never undo.

My grandmother, the lady with the bunch before mentioned, was the pink of notability. She knew how to preserve all the fruits of the earth, how to pickle all the vegetables of the garden; in a culinary point of view, she was decidedly a genius; but of music she knew nothing. To her one tune was just like any other, and she denominated every tune a noise! She knew nothing of the gamut, every thing of the gammon; her bars were the bars of the kitchen grate, her accompaniments were garnishes, her catches were snacks, and her rounds were rounds of beef.

Had she lived in these days, she would have been a melancholy and degraded outcast of society; but, in the times of female drudgery and degradation she was esteemed an excellent housewife, and a proper motherly woman.

Her daughter, (my mother,) the second person singularly tuneless in the three generations I have alluded to, was of an equestrian turn. She delighted to ride upon the backs of high trotting horses; the bare her talents surmounted were the bars of gates that possessed fire; in a fox chase she would be the running accompaniment of the most daring squire in the county. She knew of no flourishes save those of her whip; and cared not for "dying, dying falls," except when some luckless companion was precipitated over a hedge on the crown of his head. She had neither time nor inclination for home pursuits; she almost lived on horseback; and her music was the huntsman's horn.

I inherited the unhappy failing of my mother and my grandmother: music, that "softens rocks, and bends the knotted oak," softened not and bent not me.

For three generations, therefore, have we been an inharmonious race. But there is one point in our favour—a great point—a redeeming one; in the shape of my great-grandmother. She was a woman of taste, and played upon the harpsichord.

"By the by," thought I, "why should I purchase a grand piano-forte, an article of no small cost, when my great-grandmother's harpsichord, with a double row of keys, stands up stairs in the lumber-room, and will no doubt answer every purpose?"

How well I remember my great-grandmother. She was an old lady, and I a small boy, at the period of my reminiscence; yet in my mind's eye I behold her now. She was tall, she was straight, as the poplar tree; her waist was a prodigy for length and diminutiveness; and the brocaded silk of her gown stood out around her, as if afraid to encroach by pressing too closely upon her graceful limbs. On her head rose an unparalleled structure of pure white gauze or lace, and on her forehead her powdered hair was most profusely frizzed. Her gowns were the most independent garments imaginable; for, if the mistress chanced to step out of them, they still stood erect in the innate stability of their structure.

She had no idea of undress and full dress, as modern ladies have; changing from a seven-shilling muslin of a morning, to a cheap beggarly silk or crape at night. The mistress could then never be mistaken for the maid, nor the maid for the mistress. She was always responsibly attired; her small feet, in her high-heeled shoes, regally reposed under her glossy petticoat; and her snowy elbows modestly peeped from the sheltering canopy of her pure lace ruffles.

When she wished to appear in full dress, she wore immense diamond ear-rings, and upon her fingers she placed several brilliant hoop-rings. These splendid auxiliaries were put on in a moment; and let her be surprised by visitors at any hour, she came forth with glittering ears and fingers, curtsied down to the very ground, and looked as if equipped to grace a court.

She was a relict of the oldest school; she emulated the grandeur of baronial state; and in her lodgings in a watering place, instead of vulgarly rising to ring the bell when she wanted a domestic, she sat patiently and proudly on her sofa, and in her feeble, still, small voice, cried, "Who waits?" till by some fortunate chance her maid heard, and attended to the call.

Her harpsichord was her delight; it was a two-decker. I know nothing of music, but I know it had two rows of keys; and on these she played alternately, waving to and fro her stately head, and often looking round to me for applause.

She played the popular songs of the day: the popular songs—alas! what were they? They are gone, they are forgotten, like the smiles and the roses of the girls who sang them; like the hopes and the affections of the youths who listened to them. The triumphs of the singers of those days, and the popularity of the songs, where are they? 'Tis a lesson to a modern chansonnier!

I used to dine now and then with my great-grandmother, and, by way of amusing me, she would sit down and play me a minuet, or some endless sonata; her high-heeled shoes pressed the pedals, and she rambled over the double decks of keys with infinite self-possession. She thought me, I believe, a very dull boy, for I never could contrive to seem pleased with her playing. But when she sent me home, she generally slipped a little golden coin into my hand, and I left her gaily and contentedly, for my play-time was at hand. But to return to my reverie.

"Why," thought I, "should I buy a piano, when I already possess an instrument which I have frequently heard my great-grandmother say was unrivalled?"

I went up stairs to a dark, dusty lumber-room, and there lay the two-decker, with a broken leg and an unsound sounding-board. I had it carefully conveyed below, and it creaked and groaned, and threatened to fall to pieces at every step. A carpenter mended the wounded limb; and I then sent for the learned professor, who was in future to be my daughters' music-master, and with pride exhibited to him the instrument which had been declared by my great-grandmother (a musical paragon in her day) to be the sweetest and the best she ever heard. The professor smiled.

"It is as an antiquary you value it, I presume?" said he.

"How so, sir?" said I.

"I mean, you are not seriously pronouncing a favourable judgment upon it as a musical instrument," he replied.

"Thought I, he knows I am not musical, and he is sneering at me."

"Sir," said I, "have the goodness to put that invaluable instrument into perfect tune, and commence instructing my daughters."

The professor actually spun round upon my music-stool, and, after staring at me incredulously for a moment, he burst into a fit of laughter. I only wished my great-grandmother had been present.

"I beg your pardon, sir," at length said the professor, "but the instrument is not—I must be candid—it is only fit for—"

"Fit for what, sir?" said I.

"For firewood," replied the professor.

He was right; and to prove that he was so, he vigorously thumped the two rows of keys. The appeal was unanswerable. I stopped my ears, and then stopped his proceedings. The professor was immediately commissioned to choose for me a grand piano-forte, with all the new patents, the extra-octaves, the additional keys, the supernumerary pedals, and every other "invention of the enemy" to silence, tranquillity, and repose.

The professor left me, and I then gazed upon the once dearly prized and carefully preserved instrument. What would my great-grandmother say, thought I, could she know that thou art to be chopped up into fuel to warm the frigid fingers of her great-grand-daughters. Her husband bought the instrument for her in the first year of their marriage: it was meant as a surprise, and was placed in her sitting-room very early on the morning of her birth-day, that she might unexpectedly find it there when she came down to breakfast. This happened long before I was born; but the old lady in her widowhood told me of it with tears in her eyes: and, without being told, I can imagine the delight of the young bride on receiving the gift.

How often has her husband leant over her when she touched those now discoloured keys! How often has she looked laughingly up in his face, playing some lively air, which she knew he loved, because they had danced together to its melody!

I am no musician, and I have no love for old harpsichords, nor for new grand pianos; but I cannot bear to see the tokens, hallowed by the best and purest affections of one generation, tossed about with contempt and turned into ridicule by another. It is thus with my grandmother's portrait. There it hangs; a shepherdess's hat at the back of her head, a dove on her right forefinger, and a half-blown cabbage-rose in her left hand. Every body who looks at it now laughs at the outré dress, or the stiff attitude, or the antiquated expression. Those for whom we have our portraits painted, should they happen to outlive us, ought to make a point of burning us in effigy before they die, or of carrying our canvass representatives with them to the grave.

When my grandmother sat for that portrait, nobody knows what pains she took about her looks and the arrangement of her dress; and now it is undeniable that the picture is a quiz. When the first faggot of her dilapidated harpsichord crackles on the hearth, it would be charitable to throw the portrait into the blaze.

Mutual affections and countless associations endear such memorials to our contemporaries, and to those who immediately survive us; but when those friends have followed us on the dark path from which there is no return, our portraits become the mere records of by-gone fashions, and the features that are clothed in them are a marvel and a mockery.

The best of all possible grand piano-fortes has been selected, and the professor has commenced his instructions. Morning, noon, and night, my daughters are practising; and when practice has at length rendered them perfect mistresses of the instrument, it is to be hoped they will marry men who have souls, and leave me (unmusical as I am) a quiet house.

A time will no doubt arrive when the novelties of the present day will, in their turn, become obsolete; and my daughters' great grandchildren will perhaps make faggots of the grand piano, as we have most undutifully made light of my great-grandmother's harpsichord.

TIME AND LOVE.

"Oh! make the most," said Time, "of hours,"

To a fair maiden's heart;

"For see! thou those bright, beaming bowers?—

There Love and thou wilt part!

Mortals accuse my sober wing

Of robbing them of joys;

But mine's not half so sharp a sting

As yonder fickle boy's."

The maiden heeded not the strain,

But still framed visions wild,

Believing Time's dull warning vain;

For at her side Love smiled.

The bark which bore them as its freight,

Now soon her anchor cast;

Ah, maiden! would that silent fate

Had noor'd thy hopes as fast!

Love kiss'd her cheek, and leap'd on shore,

Saying, "We soon shall meet;

But I have known this isle before,

And have some friends to greet."

He went, but ne'er return'd to bring

His offering, like the dove's:

Ah! then she learnt, Time had no sting

So sharp as fickle Love's."

AN ADVENTURE IN ITALY.

BY W. H. HARRISON.

"Stand, sir, and throw us that you have about you."

It was towards the close of a beautiful autumnal day that two travellers were pursuing their journey through a tract of that luxuriant and romantic scenery with which Italy abounds. The younger, having the appearance of being about eight and twenty, was of a tall though compact figure; the expression of whose very handsome features, glowing with health and exercise, was rather heightened than diminished by the tint they had derived from exposure to the sun. His dress and bearing indicated what he really was, an Englishman of rank. The other, his elder by some years, was of about the same stature, though of a squarer and more robust make, with a cast of countenance decidedly Hibernian, in which an air of openness and good-humour compensated for whatever it might want of comeliness. They stood towards each other in the relation of master and servant.

The master, whom I shall call Vernon, had sent his carriage on before him, having determined on performing the latter part of his journey on foot; a resolution adopted rather on the impulse of a somewhat romantic temperament, than in obedience to the dictates of prudence, since the police of the district, at no period very effective, was, at the time of which I am writing, in so relaxed a state as to encourage rather than repress the outrages of those predatory bands by which Italy has always, in a greater or less degree, been infested.

Having arrived at the ruin of one of those architectural monuments of its ancient splendour, with which the country is interspersed, Vernon paused to survey the magnificent prospect it commanded. The setting sun was shedding his parting glories upon a noble stream that expanded to the breadth of a lake in the extreme distance, and pursued its devious course through a thickly wooded country, in which, for some miles, it was buried from the traveller's eye, and then flowed within a few hundred yards of his feet. Here and there, among the woodlands, were scattered the castles and palaces of the ancient nobility, and the temples of classic times, lifting their tall summits into the sunshine above the trees, and imparting an air of grandeur to the scene, of which none but those who have gazed upon an Italian landscape can form an adequate conception.

"A fine country this!" exclaimed Vernon, after a long pause, to his attendant, who, as an old servant of the family, was a sort of privileged person.

"Your honour may say that," was the reply; "but to my humble thinking, the sight of an inn, or even an alehouse, would improve it greatly."

"Why, I must confess, Terence," cried his master, "our own prospects would be none the worse for such an addition. I begin to fear we have taken the wrong road."

"A road your honour calls it?" rejoined Terence. "Faith, and it's doubtful I am if any foot but a brute beast's has been upon the path we're treading for this many a-day. It's benighted we'll be, any how."

"Not quite so bad as that, Terence," said his master, "I hope: you appear to be quite out of spirits on the occasion."

"That's true for your honour," replied Terence, mournfully, "for sorrow a drop of Innishowen's in the bottle."

"Nay, I did not allude to your whiskey-flask; I meant that you looked on the dark side of the matter."

"Will your honour see any other side of it by this light?" inquired the man, for the sun had then dropped behind the mountain, and the mists were beginning to come up from the valley.

"But surely," continued Vernon, "some of the buildings we see around us must be inhabited."

"O yes!" was the reply; "I'll be bail for them they are, but it's by them that don't cook their victuals before they eat them. Troth, and it's a wild place we're in, your honour; the more by token that a big fox came out of a bush just now, and may be he did not look up in my face as bould as if he never seen a christian before in his born days."

"Your eyes were sharper than mine, then, Terence."

"How would your honour see it, and you busy reading the inscription down there? And it's glad I'd been if ye'd lighted on 'good entertainment for man and horse,' instead of that same."

"If my eyes deceive me not, Terence," exclaimed his master, "there is certainly a light glimmering from a window down in the valley there. Let us make towards it."

"O, then it's meself would go after your honour any where," was the reply; "but I hope you won't find yourself up to the chin in a bog, as I did, one night, when I'd a fancy for following a light as like that to the for as two peas."

Regardless, however, of his servant's apprehensions, Vernon pressed forward in the direction of the light, followed by Terence. They were just entering a defile of the valley, when they were startled by a voice commanding them to stop; and, on looking upwards, they perceived the figure of a man standing upon a projection of the rock, in high relief against the twilight sky. The travellers, neither admiring the tone in which the mandate was uttered, nor the appearance of the speaker, continued to advance, when the challenger unslung his carbine and presented it. Before, however, he could adjust his aim he received a pistol shot in his arm, which dropped useless by his side.

"Put that in your pipe, and smoke it," exclaimed Terence, who, happening to be a little in the rear of Vernon, was not at first observed by the robber, and had fired immediately on perceiving the danger to which his master was exposed.

Scarcely had the smoke dispersed when they were surrounded by a dozen banditti, by whom they were, after a short but severe struggle, secured; not, however, until Terence had wounded another by the discharge of his remaining pistol, and brought a third to the earth with the butt end of it; while his master received a slight wound in the shoulder, a favour which he acknowledged by placing a brace of his assailants on the pension list for life. The travellers were then disarmed and marched off, in the midst of the band, to headquarters, to be examined and plundered at leisure.

The reader is mistaken if, judging from what he has seen on the stage, or read in a novel, he imagines the captain of the band to have been a fellow six feet high, with a corsair cast of features, and differing from a hero of the first water in no other respect than his having preferred to make war and levy contributions on his own account, instead of for the benefit of his country. The chieftain to whom our travellers were introduced was a short, bloated man, between forty and fifty, with a red knobbed nose, small but fiery eyes, and a countenance whose general expression bespoke him vulgar, sensual, and cruel by nature, and brutalized by intemperance.

The robbers were exasperated at the resistance they had encountered, and disappointed on finding that the property on Vernon's person consisted chiefly of letters of credit, which to them were useless: while their apprehensions were excited by the discovery of the rank of the party on whom they had committed the outrage.

It was under the combined influence of these considerations, any one of which would have decided their fate, that the captain informed the prisoners they must prepare for death, for that they should be shot the next morning at sunrise. It was in vain that Vernon backed his remonstrances by the offer of procuring a ransom to any amount they might name. Their reply was, that any communication they might suffer him to have with the capital for that purpose, would be more likely to bring a troop of horse down upon them than the money. The prisoners were then conducted to an apartment, secured by a grated door, before which was placed a sentinel with a loaded carbine.

The approach of dissolution, under whatever circumstances of preparation, must always be viewed with awe: on the bed of sickness, although the mind becomes in some degree familiarized with the idea, and bodily anguish may have made life a burden, it is painful to look our last upon a world, which with all its anxieties, holds much that is dear to us; but to receive the dread summons when health and hope and happiness are around us, is indeed to taste of death in all its bitterness and sorrow.

Vernon was constitutionally brave, but it is one thing to encounter death amid the excitement of battle, and another to meet it in the form under which it was then approaching him. The possessor of most earthly sources of happiness, the object of a mother's hope, a sister's pride, and the idol of one to whom a few months were to have given a name "dearer than all," it was some time before he could sufficiently abstract his mind from the world he was about to quit, in order to a preparation for that to which he was hastening.

Terence, however, though not deficient in courage, and with fewer ties to bind him to existence, appeared much more incapable of applying himself to so serious and necessary a task, for he took his station at the grating of the prison, and watched the sentinel with great attention, until, catching his eye at last, he said—

"Is that yourself, Tim?"

The man started at hearing himself thus called on by name, but turned away his face, and remained silent, when Terence continued:

"Tim—Tim Dolan, I say! it's the bad thing ye're doing! and then, after a pause, during which he received no reply— "Maybe you think I don't know your mother's son behind the black crop you've sown on your lip there. I'll tell you one thing, Tim, it's make your soul of the same colour you will." At length, getting out of patience, Terence exclaimed—"Is it deaf you are? or is them the manners you've come all the way from Mullinahone to learn? I might as well be talking Latin to a goose."

"Asy now, Terry," said the sentinel at last; "what a bother you make; don't you see I'm on duty."

"Is it duty?" said Terence. "Oh! then it's a queer notion you have of that same, to be lending a hand to cut the throat of two honest men, and one your countryman and cousin-german to boot. 'Twould be more like a decent christian, I'm thinking, to be dropping the bar outside there, and letting us out."

"I tell you I can't, Terence; it's more than my place is worth."

"And that's little enough, Tim, any how. It is not for myself I care so much, for, go when I will, I'll be no loss to any one; but it's for the sake of the master, here to the fore, that I'm asking the kind thing of you. Oh Tim, Tim! think upon his young blood, and that it will be red upon your soul, if it's shed by them ruffians, and you able to prevent it. Think, Tim, upon the old gray-headed man in Mullinahone, who'd curse the hour you were born, if he knew his son was bringing disgrace upon his name and his country in this fashion."

This last appeal appeared to touch the sentinel, for he answered in a softer tone than that which he had hitherto adopted:

"Oh! then it isn't myself would refuse to help a friend at a pinch, and that you know yourself right well; but where's the use of my opening the door when the only way out of the place is through the room they're drinking in?"

"That's our concern," said Terence: "you might give us a squeak for our lives at any rate."

"And get my own throat cut for my pains."

"And what's the reason you can't take your chance with us? Wouldn't it be better to die in a good cause than to be strung up by the neck some day between earth and heaven, as if you had no business in either. The master wouldn't be the man to forget the kind deed, I'm thinking."

At this juncture Vernon, who had been an attentive listener to the latter part of the conference, came forward, and enforced Terence's arguments by promising to open the way for Tim's return to an honest path in life, and to reward him liberally besides, in the event of his co-operation in their escape proving successful.

Dolan, who had joined the band in a fit of disappointment, and had more than once repented of the act, was not without his feelings, and after some further hesitation, consented to aid their escape. Accordingly, after releasing them from prison, he restored to them their arms, to which he had access, with the means of re-loading them, and furnished them each with a sword in addition.

As they approached the scene of the robbers' carousal, the boisterous sounds of conviviality which saluted their ears inspired them with a hope that the revellers were too far gone in their cups to notice their attempt, or to frustrate it if they did. A single glance, which they were enabled, unperceived, to get at the party, was sufficient to destroy so vain an expectation. The robbers had drunk wine enough to inflame their ferocity, without disarming their vigilance, and had so disposed themselves that it was next to impossible for the fugitives to gain the opposite door without coming in personal contact with one or more of the band.

A large torch was fixed on the table round which they were sitting, and while it flung its red glare upon the forbidding countenances of the banqueters, illuminated the remotest corner of the chamber. Dolan, as the best acquainted with the path, led the way upon his hands and knees, and, crawling close under the wall, succeeded in gaining the door unperceived by the robbers. Terence, elated by the successful example of his countryman, followed in his steps, but, either from want of sufficient care, or from the circumstance of his being a stouter man, he, on squeezing himself between the wall and a barrel on which one of the banditti was seated, overturned the latter, and thus betrayed himself and his master to the view of the robbers.

"Treason, treason!" exclaimed the band in concert, as they started to their feet, and, with their swords flashing in the torchlight, rushed upon their prey. Vernon, with a presence of mind peculiar to gallant spirits, instead of making for the door, sprang to the table, struck down the torch, and involved the whole party in darkness. He was, however, seized at the same instant by the captain, who clung to his throat like a bloodhound, and by his weight dragged his captive to the ground. A fearful struggle ensued, during which Vernon and the robber-chief were alternately uppermost, the former being deterred from discharging his pistol by the fear of discovering their relative positions by the flash, while the rest of the band refrained from using their weapons in the dark, where they were more likely to smite friends than foes.

Vernon at last succeeded in placing his knee upon the neck of his antagonist, and compelling him to relinquish his hold. After some difficulty he was so fortunate as to gain the door, and passed through it into the court-yard, which, with the exception of an angle of it, was illuminated by the beams of the full-moon. As, however, he was making his way toward the outer gate, he had the mortification of perceiving two of the robbers running for the same point, with the view of cutting off the retreat of the fugitives, while he heard the footsteps of the rest in close pursuit at his heels. Before he could decide upon the alternative of pressing forward or surrendering, two shots, fired simultaneously from the shaded angle of the court-yard, which was by the gate, stretched the robbers in advance upon the grass, and, at almost the same instant, he perceived the figures of Terence and Dolan dart through the portal. Vernon followed with the speed of light, and had no sooner overtaken them, than Tim seized him and Terence by the arm, without speaking, and dragged them down an almost precipitous descent, covered with briars and underwood, by which their clothes were nearly torn from their backs, and their persons much lacerated before they reached, or rather rolled, to the bottom.

As soon as they gained their feet, Dolan whispered,

"Now run, boys, for the bare life, and keep out of the moonshine, or it's kilt and murdered ye are, intirely."

This caution was not needless; for, as they followed in his steps, they heard the robbers, who had hit upon their track, breaking through the bushes about two hundred yards in their rear, while their random shots were whistling among the leaves about the fugitives in all directions. After running for about a quarter of a mile, they arrived at a shed, in which were tied the horses of the banditti. To select one each, and to slip the bridles over the heads of the others and turn them loose upon the road, was the work of a moment, and the next they were galloping off at the top of their speed towards the river. Arrived at the brink, they pushed their horses into the stream, and were soon on the opposite bank. Thus safe from pursuit, they continued their journey at their leisure, and, after an hour's riding, arrived at the town to which Vernon had sent forward his carriage.

Dolan was rewarded for his services beyond his expectations, and is now respectably settled in his own country, an honest and useful member of society.

HOPE AND LOVE.

One day, through fancy's telescope,
Which is my richest treasure,
I saw, dear Susan, Love and Hope
Set out in search of pleasure:
All mirth and smiles I saw them go;
Each was the other's banker;
For Hope took up her brother's bow,
And Love, his sister's anchor.

They rambled on o'er vale and hill,
They passed by cot and tower;
Through summer's glow and winter's chill,
Through sunshine and through shower;
But what did those fond playmates care
For climate, or for weather?
All scenes to them were bright and fair,
On which they gazed together.

Sometimes they turned aside to bless
Some muse and her wild numbers,
Or breathe a dream of holiness
On beauty's quiet slumbers;
"Fly on," said Wisdom, with cold sneers;
"I teach my friends to doubt you;"
"Come back," said Age, with bitter tears,
"My heart is cold without you."

When poverty beset their path,
And threatened to divide them,
They coaxed away the bekame's wrath,
Ere she had breath to chide them,
By vowing all her rags were silk,
And all her bitters, honey,
And showing taste for bread and milk,
And utter scorn of money.

They met stern danger in their way,
Upon a ruin seated;
Before him kings had quaked that day,
And armies had retreated:
But he was robed in such a cloud,
As Love and Hope came near him,
That though he thundered long and loud,
They did not see or hear him.

A grey-beard joined them, Time by name;
And Love was nearly crazy,
To find that he was very lame,
And also very lazy:
Hope, as he listened to her tale,
Tied wings upon his jacket;
And then they far outran the mail,
And far outsailed the packet.

And so, when they had safely passed
O'er many a land and billow,
Before a grave they stopped at last,
Beneath a weeping willow:
The moon upon the humble mound
Her softest light was flinging;
And from the thickets all around
Sad nightingales were singing.

"I leave you here," quoth father Time,
As hoarse as any raven;
And Love kneeled down to spell the rhyme
Upon the rude stone graven:
But Hope looked onward, calmly brave;
And whispered, "Dearest brother,
We're parted on this side the grave,—
We'll meet upon the other."

EXPRESSION, &c.

The importance of a concise, forcible, and correct form of expression is realized by few.

Without it the best ideas appear common-place and insignificant; while with it, common-place ideas appear dignified and original.

A man who expresses himself well is always listened to attentively, though his conversation possesses but little intrinsic merit; while that of the man of fine ideas is unheeded, because clothed in a redundant, frivolous, or awkward language.

Expression is to ideas what clothing is to the person.

Though a man's presence be ever so good, he will not appear to advantage if dressed in a slovenly or superfluous manner.

Simplicity of expression is more interesting and elegant than turgidness.

A universal error in conversation is to dwell, and enlarge too much upon an idea.

Sententiousness is more impressive than loquacity.

It is more easy to write well than to converse well—or rather, the former talent is cultivated, while the latter is generally neglected. Consequently, few professional or great men would strike us as such if their conversation were the criterion by which they must be judged.

To converse well is of more importance in every-day life than to write well. But they are both talents or acquirements of inestimable value, the possession of one of which need in no instance exclude that of the other. On the contrary, if properly cultivated, they are mutual promoters.

The conversational talent, particularly, is acquired only by practice. It is intuitive in none. Men who have astonished the world by the eloquence and elegance of their writings, have frequently been unable to give intelligible expression to their ideas in conversation.

Addison, whose style of writing is a specimen of all that is chaste and eloquent in composition, lacked the most common conversational abilities. His abortive and ludicrous attempt to speak in parliament is universally known; as well as several anecdotes to the same effect related by his biographer, Dr. Johnson.

A man who can converse well, is irresistible at home. A man who can write well, is irresistible abroad. But one who can both converse and write well is, in every sense, and in every situation irresistible, whatever his personal disadvantages may be. To acquire the ability particularly referred to in these remarks, i. e. that of conversing well, is an end which can only be attained by observation and practice; but it is an end to which any man of sense may attain.

An individual whose retiring disposition and peculiar tone of mind excludes him from society, will never converse fluently while he submits to this inclination.

Such a one must mingle with the gay, the sad, the merry, the wise, and the foolish, before he can give unexceptionable utterance to his thoughts.

However badly a man of taste expresses himself, he notices the slightest defect in style or grammar in others.

Here, then, is a rule to go by—"Think before you speak," said a wise man—and think after you speak; let one of his admirers add, that thereby you may detect that which was wrong or foolish in what you said, and profit in future.

If you find your conversation unheeded, while that of your neighbour is equally swallowed, try to discover the cause. Compare your remarks and manner with his, and profit accordingly.

It is not quantity that regulates the value of conversation, it is quality. The man of few words is more apt to be listened to than the one of many sentences. "A wholesome tongue is a tree of life; but perverseness therein is a breach of the spirit."

ON TAILORS.

"Coat!" said Russellton, with an appearance of the most naïve surprise, and taking hold of the collar suspiciously, by the finger and thumb, "coat, Sir Willoughby! do you call this thing a coat?"

A much abused person is your tailor. He is ordinarily supposed to need less endowment than his fellows—(the ninth part of a man, I think they call him)—I shall prove to you that he needs more. Poetry is a lesser art in my esteem.

Any man or woman may stich—make a "cover-me-decently." The world goes clothed—town and country—though, (bear us witness, Pelham) there are but three tailors (proper tailors, I say) from Bath to Savannah. For the rest, their daily work is a profanity of broadcloth—a sacrilege of kersey-mere. Your eyes are shocked perpetually by the sight of unfortunate strangers who have fallen into the hands of those Vandals.

No true tailor makes a man a coat till he has seen him walk. The way you move is every thing. If you have a crab's gait, sideways, the hitch must be counteracted. If you are a meek man, and carry your head low, the collar must be set back to remedy the defect. If your passions are violent, a tight sleeve or a close fit at the shoulder is impolitic. If your neck is too long or too short, if your body is crooked or your bust flat, or if you are a vain man and swell at the lower button, it must be allowed for in your coat. It is the tailor's business to make you perfect—or seem so—which is quite the same thing.

A friend of mine is so unfortunate as to have two or three coats on hand. It excruciates me to see him come into the room—flat breasted, flap-dividing, pinched collared, scrimped, pasteboard looking abominations! He cannot move a limb without having the whole coat follow in a piece. Touch his collar and his skirt flies up. The moment it is unbuttoned, down hugs the cape to his neck, and out flies the back at the waist, the whole gets at sharp angles to his figure, and presents him to your eye like a caricature of a man frightened. Save us from such spectacles, benevolent Jove!

Your vile tailor does every thing by padding. He slips you into a casement of buckram as unaccommodating as a coffin, and, with the second button fastened, shoves you up to his glass, and while you stand perfectly still, because you are unable to move, praises the smoothness of the fit! We would not trust such a fellow to make a cover for an umbrella.

Next to the human form divine, the most beautiful thing in nature is a perfect coat. It is like a perfect style—it looks as if it was the easiest thing in the world. The collar lies loose and yet neatly to the shoulders. The back, buttoned or unbuttoned, fits neatly and under all motions to the figure. The skirts hang gracefully and independently of the back, parallel and slender. The sleeves work fitly with the arm, and the breasts lie flat and yet ample on the chest, and the wearer has that look in it, that a spectator would suppose it grew to him, that it was a part and evidence of his fair proportions and the skill of the artist. There are a few artists who have acquired immortality in the cut of pantaloons; but a man must grow gray in practice before he acquires even the theoretical principles of that article.

You shall go through the cities and look at the popular tailors, and if there is one who can cut but a fragment of a coat well, who has not a fine head phenologically, we are forewarned. The heads of your quack tailors are as flat behind as the white sides of a melon. They are all face—all animal. You would see they were simpletons at once. Your talented artist, on the contrary, has the head of a scholar—a fine lift behind, a good eye, broad forehead, and strong mouth. He looks like a mathematician—large over the eye, high cheek bones, and prominent organs. You may search the world over and we will warrant the result.

COURTSHIP AND MARRIAGE.

It is told that Abernethy, while attending a lady for several weeks, observed those admirable qualities in her daughter which he truly esteemed to be calculated to render the married state happy. Accordingly, on a Saturday, when taking leave of his patient, he addressed her to the following purport:—"You are now so well that I need not see you after Monday next, when I shall come and pay you my farewell visit. But, in the meantime, I wish you and your daughter seriously to consider the proposal I am about to make. It is abrupt and unceremonious, I am aware; but the excessive occupation of my time, by my professional duties, affords me no leisure to accomplish what I desire by the more ordinary course of attention and solicitation. My annual receipts amount to — and I can settle — on my wife; my character is generally known to the public, so that you may readily ascertain what it is. I have seen in your daughter a tender and affectionate child, an assiduous and careful nurse, and a gentle and lady-like member of a family; such a person must be all that a husband covets, and I offer my hand and fortune for her acceptance. On Monday, when I call, I shall expect your determination; for I really have not time for the routine of courtship." In this humor the lady was wooed and won; and, we believe we may add, the union has been felicitous in every respect.

Scattering Votes.—More than three columns of the public journals have recently been occupied in publishing the names for which the scattering votes were given at the late election in this state. We agree with the editor of the American, that this custom is "both useless and offensive; useless, as publishing no information of value beyond what the simple statement that there were so many scattering votes would afford; and offensive, as making public the paltry malice which delights in secretly and safely vilifying its object." We also hope, "to see the provisions of the law, requiring this publication in detail, abrogated."

Public Dinners.—We do not—no one can—object to the propriety of the friends of any individual offering him, on suitable occasions, the compliment of a dinner, or any other entertainment. But we must condemn, as out of all taste, and contrary to the rules of private courtesy, the practice of filling up newspaper columns with the toasts and speeches given at table. If we had no other reason to urge against them, it is sufficient that they are generally not worth reading.

DESMOND'S SONG.

WRITTEN BY THOMAS MOORE, ESQ.—ARRANGED BY H. R. BISHOP.

"Thomas, the heir of the Desmond family, had accidentally been so engaged in the chase, that he was benighted near Tralee, and obliged to take shelter at the Abbey of Feal, in the house of one of his dependants, called Mac Cormac. Catharine, a beautiful daughter of his host, instantly inspired the Earl with a violent passion, which he could not subdue: he married, and by this inferior alliance alienated his followers, whose brutal pride regarded this indulgence of his love as an unpardonable degradation of his family."—LELAND, vol. 2.

Innocente.

2d—Love came and brought sorrow
Too soon in his train;
Yet so sweet that to-morrow
'Twould be welcome again:
Were misery's full measure
Pour'd out to me now,

I would drain it with pleasure
So the Hebe were thou.
2d—You, who call it dishonour
To bow to this flame,
If you've eyes, look but on her,
And blush while you blame.

Hath the pearl less whiteness
Because of its birth?
Hath the violet less brightness
For growing near earth?
4th—No; man, for his glory,
To ancestry flies.

While woman's bright story
Is told in her eyes:
While the monarch but traces
Through mortals his line,
Beauty born of the graces,
Ranks next to divine.

SONG.

How long, since we two parted,
The path of time appears!
Return, thou faithless-hearted!
I call thee back with tears.
The roar of war, which rended
The skies, hath died away;
Our loud rejoicings ended:—
And where dost thou delay?
We have roses by our dwelling,
Making fragrant all the air;
And the nightingale is telling
Her tale of sorrow there;
These flowers could once delight thee,
That music charm of yore;
Oh! let its strain invite thee
To return to us once more!
We have hearts—more kind and tender
Thou ne'er, perchance, shalt see;
They wait but to surrender
Their willing love to thee.
Return, and smiles shall meet thee,
If words are all too vain;
And the voice of song shall greet thee,
Singing, "Welcome back again!"

MARRIAGE A-LA-MODE.

"Tom, you should take a wife."—"Now, love forbid!"—"I found you one last night."—"The deuce you did!"—"Softly, perhaps she'll please you."—"Oh, of course!"—"Fifteen."—"Alarming!"—"Witty."—"Nay, that's worse!"—"Discreet."—"All show!"—"Handsome."—"To lure the fellows!"—"High-born."—"Ay, haughty."—"Tender-hearted."—"Jealous!"—"Talents o'erflowing."—"Ay, enough to sluice me!"—"And then, Tom, such a fortune!"—"Introduce me!"

THE ENRAGED AUTHOR.—At one of the Parisian theatres, a writer of little or no real pretensions to talent had, by means of flattery and intrigue, obtained the acceptance of a piece, where others of sterling worth had been rejected. On the night of performance the piece was assailed with hisses from all parts of the house, whereat the enraged author dashed on to the stage, and throwing his hat into the pit, dared the most valiant to bring it to him. A young gentleman took it up, and was about to present it, when he was interrupted by a wag, who coolly observed, "Stop, sir, what would be the use of returning the man his hat, when he has evidently lost his head?"

VEAL AND VINEGAR.—Baretti, in his amusing letters from Spain and Portugal, tells us that he fell in with a Spanish soldier, who in the course of conversation, told him that he had been some time a prisoner in England, and that he hated the English; and on being asked why, he hesitated awhile, and at last answered, because they used vinegar with their veal.

A CONVENIENT FORMULA.—Sheridan had a very convenient formula, as a reply to all new publications that were constantly sent to him, viz.—"Dear sir, I have received your exquisite work, and have no doubt I shall be highly delighted after I have read it."

A TENDER WIFE.—A French lady of quality, seeing the funeral procession of her husband, exclaimed, "Ah, how happy would my poor husband be if he could see this sight, as he was remarkably fond of such ceremonies."

POINTS OF HONOUR.—Colonel Montgomery was shot in a duel about a dog; Captain Ramsay in one about a servant; Mr. Fetherston in one about a recruit; Sterne's father in one about a goose; and another gentleman in one about "an acre of anchovies; one officer was challenged for merely asking his opponent to enjoy the second goblet; and another was compelled to fight about a pinch of snuff; General Barry was challenged by a Captain Smith, for declining a glass of wine with him at dinner in a steam-boat, although the general had pleaded as an excuse that wine invariably made him sick; and Lieutenant Crowther lost his life in a duel, because he was refused admittance to a club of pigeon shooters.

MARTYRDOM AT THE STAKE.—William Martyr, a clergyman settled in Buckfield, Virginia, was travelling with two friends a short time since, and passed through the pleasant town of Bennington, Vermont. At dinner a beef-steak was placed before Mr. Martyr, who was so much engrossed in attending to the calls of his appetite, that he uttered not a word during the meal. One of his companions remarked, that he was very sorry to be a witness to so melancholy a spectacle as Martyr-dumb at the stake.

ARABIAN MAXIMS.—Curtail thy sleep, and increase thy knowledge; he who knows the value of his object, despises the pains it cost him.

Say not the possessors of science have passed away, and are forgotten; every one who has walked in the path of science has reached the goal.

Increase of knowledge is a victory over idleness; and the beauty of knowledge is rectitude of conduct.

Pay visits only on alternate days, thou wilt be beloved the more; for he who multiplies his comings and goings fatigues his friends.

POPULAR MORAL TALES.

SCENES AT PALERMO.

In the year 1750, the ears of the whole Palermitan nobility, on the Corso, were struck by the sounds of cannon from the sea. It was one of those evenings in March which are the true heralds of May, and whose serenity, softness, and beauty, are altogether unrivalled in Europe: even the Neapolitan spring is unequal to the Silesian. The fertility of the island seems to be inexhaustible, and the temperature of the air covers it, in the depth of winter, with flowers which, in the northern summer, will not live under the open sky.

But the approach of spring pours out the whole higher population of Palermo to the grand promenade by the northern gate, the Porta Felice, which fully deserves the name, from the matchless splendour, extent, and variety of its view. The neighbourhood of Palermo is crowded with mountains, of singularly picturesque forms, and covered with vegetation of all the colours of the south, high up their sides; the summits are marble pinnacles, which catch the sun-light at all hours; and, as morning, noon, or evening shines upon them, are successively silver, golden, or bathed in a depth of purple sky. The Corso (the promenade) exhibits all the rank and pomp of the city enjoying the evening breeze, which, in the earlier months of the year, has a sweetness and lightness, an impression of vitality, that almost gives the idea of a delightful intoxication. On this immense mole the population wanders for hours, conversing, listening to the perpetual music, which, whether of the voice, violin, or guitar, makes so prominent a part of Italian enjoyment; and watching the changes of colour on the sea, as the evening comes on, until the lights from St. Rosalia's shrine on the Monte Pellegrino are seen, and the bell for the arce is heard, which are a general signal of departure.

But on this evening the lights twinkled from the mountains top in vain; and the whole showy cortège lingered on the mole, waiting, in intense anxiety, for the result of the cannonade. It was heavy, and evidently approached; but night falls with rapidity in the climates of the south, and there was soon no possibility of seeing beyond the mole. The rumour now was, that the explosions were not the work of artillery, but of the much more powerful agent to which every Sicilian is accustomed: a new volcano was supposed to have burst out under the waters; and Palermo was to be honoured with the presence of a new Lipari island in front of its port. But this high distinction, of which, such is the national taste, the whole Sicilian populace would have been proud, was not to be vouchsafed, even to the murmur of aves and supplications to the virgin and all the saints, that Palermo might not be forever behind-hand with Naples, but might have something to show to the world, and boast of a Vesuvius of its own.

The cannonade was a mortal one after all. Just as the moon was touching the outlines of the Monte Mezzagno with beams that made its wild sides and pointed summits look like the tracery of an immense cathedral; while Monte Cuccio on the west, and Falso-melle on the south-east, wrapped in darkness, and with only their bare tops visible, looked like colossal priests, with their naked foreheads bowing down before its gates, a succession of flashes, that seemed to come up from the bosom of the water, startled the eyes of the gazers. A large galley was at length seen, dismantled and disabled in every way, but still making a desperate resistance against a squadron that now gathered round her, pouring in an incessant fire. Curiosity, however, had become a hazardous indulgence; for the balls that missed the galley, began to roll towards the beach; and one enormous shot, that took off the top of the Duca di Poltrone's new English calèche, so perfectly satisfied his serene highness of the absurdity of standing by to see the decision of other men's quarrels, that he dismounted instantly, and left his superb English horses to make the best of their way home by themselves, over the crowd of sudden fugitives. Night, propitious to the Sicilian name, covered the retreat of many a gallant charioteer besides; and, before another shot could lay waste the Palermitan noblesse, the mole was as clear as if it had been a sand-bank in the centre of the Mediterranean.

Morning dawned; the sun rose bright and broad as ever.

Monte Pellegrino was in a blaze of day, and all Palermo flocked down to the shore. Could they believe their eyes? If magic had ever operated upon a people, it had been at work there; for neither galley nor squadron was to be seen. The sea was as destitute of ships as the top of Monte Pellegrino; or as the mole was destitute of nobility after the shot which took off the top of the duke's calèche. The public rumours were boundless; for there is nothing so vivid as the imagination, where a people have nothing to do. "Bella Italia" is one great castle of indolence; and, of course, there is no spot of the earth where imagination is more prolific. But all was in vain. The monks could make nothing of it. The viceroy, a descendant of the grandes of Castile; a noble who looked down upon all the kings of the universe as parvenus, and wore mustachios worthy of Pelayo, or a royal tiger; held council upon council, and could make nothing of it. Even the nuns could make nothing of it. But the populace made infinite laughter of the flight of their betters; Palermo teemed with voluntary minstrels, who delivered over the chief fugitives to immortality; and the escutcheons of the leaders on the occasion were covered with burlesque; until a new incident relieved them from the tongues of the priests, the nuns, and the poets together.

In the height of a summer's day, three months after, at noon, when the sun burns so fiercely in the streets of Palermo as to give rise to the Sicilian story that Lucifer, having asked leave to take a walk through the world, and coming by accident into Il Cassero, (the principal street of the city,) plunged instantly down to his old place to cool himself—or, as the gentler phrase says, "when none but dogs and Englishmen are abroad;" the whole population were roused from their siesta, by the sound of trumpets and drums, a chorus of martial music. If those had announced an army at their gates, and if the walls, towers, and all, were to have been stormed within the next half hour, not a Palermitan would have stirred from his pillow; each man, woman, and child, on lying down on simple flock-bed, or under silken canopy, having committed Sicily to St. Rosalia, the saint was responsible for all that might happen till dinner-time. But there was something so exhilarating in this music, that to sleep was impossible; the people started up, and rushed to their doors and windows by one impulse; and the spectacle was worth their trouble.

Since the day when the famous Count Rogero, the Norman, drove out the Mussulmans from the Cassar, and sent the carrier-pigeons with the letters dipped in blood, which extinguished the courage and blunted the cimeters of the Saracen lords of Sicily, there never had been so strange, so novel, and so magnificent a sight in the high street of Palermo. It was the procession of the prince of Tripoli, Hoseyn Abdallah, heir to the three castles, the ten temples of the desert, the Pentapolis, and first cousin to the seven planets. He was the handsomest Moor ever seen in the city; and the splendour of his horse, his turban, and his cimeter, dazzled the eyes of all the belles, the jewellers, and the dragoon officers, of that luxurious capital. He was attended by a train of guards, dagger-bearers, pipe-bearers, handkerchief-bearers, and grooms, scarcely less magnificent than himself. He was now proceeding to the viceroy's palace, to present his letters, as ambassador from his father, Mustapha Bey, of the Tripolitan regency, to make a treaty of perpetual alliance and friendship, which was to last, as usual, just till either of the high contracting parties found it convenient to break it.

The viceroy received the Tripolitan prince with Spanish dignity, but with Spanish courtesy: heard his mission through an interpreter, received a gold vessel of the genuine otto of Shiraz roses, a diamond cup of opium, from the sultan's garden at Bachtiserai; and an ataghan of the perfumed Damascus fabric; all which he returned by a speech, a bow, and a fervent wish that his serene highness might live a thousand years.

The prince won the hearts of the nation by his evident delight at every thing he saw; and his bon-mots and compliments were repeated in all the leading circles, as doing extraordinary honour to the sagacity of a Moslem. He spent his time, too, in a way that attracted all hearts; for he was constantly galloping round the environs, which are proverbially beautiful; and surveying the Arabic remains with an eye of admiration.

Of all European cities, scarcely excepting Granada itself, the most oriental is Palermo. The viceroy's palace contains a hall of divan, in which the sultan himself might sit without discovering that he was in the land of unbelievers; it has the fretted roof, the vermilion painting, the mosaic of mother-of-pearl, ivory, and ebony, and the sentences from the Koran, that figure in the seraglio. But Abdallah's peculiar delight was in the cathedral, that noble work of the twelfth century, and first monument of the skill and splendour of the Arabian architects. Day after day he was seen admiring its crowd of cupolas, that look like golden oranges on a bed of verdure, and its four towers modelled on the great mosque at Medina.

There was one deficiency in the establishment of this stately stranger—he had left his harem behind; but this omission was looked upon as so distinguished a compliment to either the priests or the ladies of Palermo, (and each took it to themselves,) that it raised the Tripolitan prince to the summit of popularity.

Yet all things have an end in this best of possible worlds; and, after a fortnight's wonder, the Palermitans grew weary of being enraptured; the magnificent Moslem, beard, horse, diamonds, and all, lost their charms; and the noblesse and the populace were equally dying for want of a new wonder.

After a month of mortal ennui the topic came. The approaching nuptials of Count Girolamo Farnese with Julia Calascibetta, the loveliest woman in Sicily, were announced, and threw the whole multitude into transports of joy. Girolamo was a ruffian, but he was of high rank and birth, chamberlain to the king of the Two Sicilies, a general in the service, and heir of half the province of Puglia. His choice of a Sicilian belle, in preference to the myriad of Neapolitan, Roman, Venetian, German, and French, who assailed his heart, or perhaps his fortune, with charms of every colour, eyes of every hue, and accents of every language, was taken as a positive honour to the island; and every woman, from the muscle-gatherer at the foot of the mole to the duchess in her Milan carriage, painted with a thousand cupids, felt herself exalted by the selection.

But Julia was worth all the counts of Italy, if the merits of the husband were to be weighed against the black eyes of the wife. She was young, and had left her convent but a month, yet in that time she had done more involuntary mischief, and been the innocent cause of a greater number of intolerable sonnets, than any reigning beauty since the days of Queen Joanna. The Sicilian women, en masse, disappoint the eye that has expected to see a classic land peopled by classic forms; but some of them are exquisitely handsome. They have none of the heavy features and yellow hair of the German Venus, nor the abrupt nose and feline physiognomy of the French. The black eye and the black tresses are universal; and, in some instances, the black eye has the living brightness of a star, and the black tresses are deeper than the raven's wing; the shape is slender, the profile Grecian, the movement gay, graceful, and yet dignified. Such the Sicilian beauty, a model of European loveliness.

By the habits of Sicily, the bride prepares herself for the duties of the married state, by a more assiduous attendance at church, for a week before the ceremony. Julia performed her service with the punctuality of a woman who had made up her mind to be a countess; and even grew more fervent as the hour approached. But, on the last day of the week, her calèche had waited at the door of the cathedral until sunset, and her attendants were wondering at the zeal of her devotions, when the porter came to bar the gates for the night. No Julia was there. She had gone to the confessional of Padre Jeronimo, the most sanctified confessor within a circuit of fifty miles. But the father was now at his supper in the refectory, and, after the next bottle of Lacryma, would be in bed. The confusion was indescribable—the convent was searched. The only conclusion was, that so fair a creature had suddenly turned angel and gone to heaven; for not on earth, or under the earth, was she to be found: she had vanished! Palermo had lost a beauty, the count a bride, and the populace, what they felt worst of all, a marriage, with its fireworks, wine, and supper.

As if to make the confusion of her noble family more perplexing, Count Girolamo was to arrive the next day; but they were saved from this catastrophe, for the count never arrived.

A frightened secretary, and half a hundred valets, stripped to the skin, arrived in his place; to tell that, twenty miles from Messina, the count's whole cortège had been stopped in a defile, where they found their way onward stopped by a barricade of rocks, and their way backward by a range of muskets, while the hill above them was actually alive with pikes and swords. Like true Neapolitans, they could boast of having been routed without having the inhumanity to shed the blood of a fellow-creature; and, like first-rate trucidians, they had finished their campaign without the loss of a man. The robbers had relieved them of every thing in the shape of clothes or baggage, and thus enabled them to move more rapidly, when they were once again upon the road. But Count Girolamo had been detained as a hostage for the general ransom; of which every day's delay was, according to the most legitimate code of highway law, to cost him a slice of his car, duly forwarded to the viceroy of Palermo.

At twelve o'clock next day the remittance was punctually made; but by invisible hands. A packet was laid on the viceroy's table, close beside his last despatches from the court; and to his surprise at the presumption of his new correspondents, there was the slice, with a note appended to it, demanding twenty thousand ducats for the writer's trouble.

A council was summoned on the subject, in which it was strongly held, that so far from the count's ears being worth so vast a sum, it would have been an exorbitant purchase for his whole body, and the bodies of all his ancestors besides. But the viceroy was too sagacious to suffer this motion to pass; he knew the value of a great chamberlain's influence, if not of his person, and finally settled all the scruples of the council by saying, that the money was not to be drawn from their own coffers, but to be raised by a tax upon the citizens. The decision then passed unanimously; and a letter was despatched to the banditti, imploring a respite for Count Girolamo's ears until it could be levied. The next difficulty was, how to raise the money, without raising an insurrection along with it; for, on the first announcement of the measure, the Palermians had flung the tax-gatherers from the top of the mole, and, as they saw them swimming for their lives, bade them go and tell their masters that their sea-bathing was but a prelude to the general ablation of the viceroy and council.

Yet this was but a new occasion for the magnificent Moslem's generosity. On hearing of the state emergency, he ordered his chief secretary to appear before him. "Yakoub Effendi," said he, in a tone of evident displeasure, "have you ate of my bread, been perfumed with my rose-water, and worn my slippers?" The secretary, three times bowing to the prince, and once towards the tomb of the prophet, acknowledged that he held his life only by the breath of his highness, and humbly asked his pleasure. "Yakoub," was the answer, "am I to be the last to hear of the sorrows of my friends? I have slept under the roofs of this people, and must I turn my ear to the ground and say, that all is bright as the pearls that cover the grass in paradise, and smooth as the well of Zennem? Go, take these purses to the viceroy, and say to him that they, and more than twice their amount, are at his disposal." The announcement of the message was received with wonder by the council, and with shouts by the populace. They crowded round the gates of his palace to pour forth their thanks, and assure him of their respect for Mahomet, "though their opportunities of showing it were few." But the lordly Tripolitan had already sunk into the luxurious indulgence of his sofa. He had taken his pipe, smoked a pipe or two, and was, at the time of this effervescence of Sicilian gratitude, in a profound slumber, or, probably, with his prophet, flying, in spirit, on the winged horse through the thirty-three regions of the fixed stars.

The money was deposited by Yakoub on the council-table. Ten thousand sequins were, on that evening, sent off to Catania, where the bandit's letter had ordered it to be paid. The other ten thousand the viceroy put into his privy purse, as the most moderate compensation for his anxieties in the business. Yet, by some unaccountable misfortune, Count Girolamo was not forthcoming. The messenger had reached the spot in the suburbs of Catania, where he was to have found the noble captive. He found the ruins of a villa still burning, but no count; and, while he was lingering in the neighbourhood, he was suddenly seized by a band of peasantry, who charged him with being the incendiary, searched him for papers, seized the money, which they declared to be highly suspicious, and, after detaining him for some nights in a kind of prison, sent him back to make the best of his way and his story.

But while the public tongue was busy with the melancholy fate of the bridegroom, a new event occurred, which produced a still more extraordinary sensation. Count Girolamo had left but few weepers for his misfortune in Sicily; for he had once been governor of the island, and his harshness of character, and general insolence, had so far alienated the people, that there were some plain-spoken enough to wish that the banditti had not contented themselves with nipping his noble ears, but had applied the same discipline to his tongue. But the present event was of a nature to touch the tender bosom of every female. Catherina Villa Rosata, a beautiful girl of the Val di Noto, was asked in marriage by two lovers at the same time, the young Signor Fabian Diodati, and the old Marquis Manfredoni; the one a simple lieutenant of dragoons, and the other the proprietor of the salt marshes of Catania, and worth half a million of gold ducats. The lady's family was noble, but it was poor; and the old marquis's ducats altogether eclipsed the sparkling black eyes and handsome countenance of the young dragoon. Catherina had formed a different estimate, and, as a proof of her opinion, had descended, the night before her proposed marriage, a ladder, reaching from the garden-wall forty feet to her chamber window, with the purpose of abandoning Sicily, and taking the chances of the world with the man of her heart.

But love, that puts such valour into the heart of woman, often forgets to put the vigilance of her watchers to sleep. At the foot of the ladder she found the signor; but it was in the hands of a party of soldiers, who had been posted by her family to take care that love should not carry her beyond the garden-wall. The signor stormed, and threatened to invade the mansion with his whole regiment, sword in hand. The lovely Catherina wept, wrung the whitest hands in the world, and was borne off fainting, and longing to get rid of all her agonies in whatever way death might come most speedily. A guard was posted round the mansion during the night, and the marquis was ready to receive his bride by daybreak. The impatience of old bridegrooms is proverbial; they seem to be aware that they have no time to lose. This ardent lover of sixty-five came attended by relatives, and a crowd of valets, in sumptuous equipages, before the bells of the cathedral had begun to toll, or the archbishop had read the gazette. The case of the Count Villa Rosata was scarcely awake. The marquis, however, was welcomed with the cordiality that men feel for a son-in-law who brings half a million of ducats into a family, and gives a hope of providing for all the sons and daughters of the line.

The count proceeded to the lovely bride's chamber. He lingered—the marquis grew impatient—the count was sent for. He returned at last, with a face as pale as if he had announced an earthquake, or a failure of the miracle of St. Januarius's blood: the bride was not to be found. The guard were summoned; they were all astonishment. From the moment of the signor's arrest, they had not seen a human being enter or leave the house, except the marquis's own aid-de-camp, who brought his excellency's presents for the countess, and who, on giving the countersign, had been admitted at daybreak, and gone away in a few moments after, and gone alone. This left the mystery as dark as ever. The marquis had sent his aid-de-camp with the presents; they had been delivered to the attendant; and the aid-de-camp was now at his side. If all the wit of man had been there, nothing more could be done now than break up the meeting. The carriages were ordered back; the marquis left the house, to encounter, on his way through the streets, that kind of congratulation which is given to one at whose misfortune all the world instinctively laughs; and the family of Villa Rosata saw their commissions and places scattered into empty air.

But the marquis was not yet done with fate. In his chagrin he had reclaimed the jewels presented to Catherina, and which had been found on her toilet-table; for the proprietor of the salt marshes loved money, like all men who have infinitely more than they ever mean to make use of; and if his heart could have been seen, when his first wrath was over, it would have been discovered to be by no means displeased, that if he had not obtained the charms of a wife, he had, at least, escaped the cost of one. But Palermo was now no place for him; he drove post-haste to Catania, and when, from an ascent in the road he cast his eye over the immense expanse of his salt marshes, blue and dreary as they were, he exulted in the other half million that he was now to extract from them, undisturbed by the cares of a marchioness. The road, within about a league of the city, sinks into a small woody dell, crossed by a shallow stream; the day was sultry, and the drivers stopped for a while to water their horses. The marquis fell fast asleep, until a shot shattered the glass above his head, and startled him from a glorious dream, in which he had seen himself viceroy of Mexico, and making his grand entry over a road covered with dollars and ducatoons.

He awoke in a new world; there was not a soul within sight; three of the horses of his travelling chariot were grazing on the bank, and one was lying down in the stream to cool himself; but not a postilion, not a valet, not a human being of the dozen that had attended him up to this spot was visible. However, there were signs of worldly visitants; for, as the marquis opened his eyes more widely, he found that his trunks were cut away from the chariot, that his jewel-case was gone, and that he was without purse, watch, or pocket-book. Never was noble personage less indebted to the gifts of fortune; but the sun was going down; in half an hour more the defile would be black as midnight, and the farce of robbery might be finished by the tragedy of putting his nobility out of the world. The marquis was shrewd enough to draw the conclusion, and to take instant means to avoid its being realized. To harness the horses to his chariot was out of the question—for to catch them he soon found hopeless; but he could still walk, and he pushed onward for Catania. Night fell as he entered his beloved marshes; and, for the first time, he found them intolerably long and frightfully dreary; their pestilential vapour rose up round him, and he began to think that money might be made in more merciful ways than in covering the most fertile soil in the world with a waste of sterile and deadly fen. He reached Catania at midnight, after a march which he thought would be his last, and after being bewildered for six hours in this labyrinth of sand, salt, and water.

That night's march gave him a moral lesson. Nothing makes a man feel the vanity of human things so much as losing his money; and nothing softens the heart so much as the fear of being shot. The marquis, too, like most marquises, had something to repent of. In early life he had privately married a Calabrese Venus, a creature of brilliant eyes, buoyant spirits, and fond heart. He lived with her for a year, had a son, and succeeded to the Manfredoni estate and title; but, becoming a great man, and a great knave at the same time, he stole away from the fair Calabrese, and emerged into Sicilian society as the richest of bachelors. Of course, all matrons with many daughters proclaimed him the wisest, best, and handsomest of mankind; and all the daughters of those mothers fell in love with him at first sight. But in Sicily, as in the rest of the world, not even marquises have their privileges for nothing; and some of the lovers of those quick-sighted damsels, indignant at the public scorn which naturally falls upon the jilted, marked the rich and desirable countess their rejection for instant vengeance. Manfredoni twice had a carbine-load of bullets discharged through his chamber window; was once stilettoed coming from the opera; and lived in perpetual terror of being poisoned by his own cook.

The life of triumph was too dearly purchased on such terms; and to make universal peace, he at length proclaimed an aversion to Hymen, fled from a pair of rosy cheeks and coral lips as he would from a rattlesnake, and gave up his soul to merry-making, and his body to the salt marshes. He had now received another specimen of the hazard of his attractions; and he resolved, long before the toll of midnight from the cathedral tower of Catania, never to fall in love or to be beloved again.

The Palermians were highly amused at the adventure; which, by some spell, had reached them, in all its details, with the rapidity of an Aleppo carrier-pigeon; but when the tale more slowly made its way through the silken curtains and drowsy luxury of the Tripolitan palace, it threw its whole tribe of pale-faced and tiger-moustachioed opium-eaters into roars of laughter. The gravity of the sons of Mahomet was never so shaken before. Even his highness, Hoseyn Abdallah, was seen to smile; and, sending for his pipe, coffee, and secretary, addressed the yellow-visaged and trembling slave: "Yakoub Effendi," said his highness. "I am here," was the answer, "at the feet of your throne, longing to kiss the dust of grandeur off the slippers of majesty." The slave bowed his forehead four times to the ground, thrice to the prince, and once to Mecca. "What dogs those infidels are, Yakoub," said his highness, with a smile; "they have not the honesty to lay down the fair price for a woman, nor the sense to manage her when they have made the purchase. But we must have pity for the fools who know nothing of the Koran, and who are born, like their brother dogs, with their eyes shut, though, unlike the dogs, they never open them." He took a purse from his sash, and, throwing it on the floor, said, "Take these sequins to the unfortunate infidel, and let him buy a wife, and be comforted."

"Light of the world," said Yakoub, "he is the son of sorrow already; and a wife would be to his soul what the pepper of the isles of the yellow sea would be to the foot of the bastinadoed. Besides, the purse contains but a thousand sequins. May your slave speak the truth before he dies?"

"Speak, then, Effendi," said his highness, "but be brief." "Then," said Yakoub, "the truth is this: that the price of the fairest of the fair in the dominions of my lord would not buy petticoats and pincushions for the daughters of the unbelievers. They would spend more in a week in colours for their cheeks, curls for their foreheads, and combs for their curls, than would buy a harem."

His highness was astonished, and thanked Mahomet that he was not born in a climate where combs and curls were so essential, and the colours of women's cheeks so dear. "But, take this purse," said he; "the gifts of the mighty must not return to them, unless in thanks," as it is written in the book of books, and distribute it among the people." The purse was forthwith carried from his highness's presence. The secretary subtracted from it only three-fourths for his trouble, gave the remainder to the poor, and received, in return, ten thousand blessings for his highness, from all the mendicants of the city. Never was man so popular in Palermo.

But the public joy was soon to be dashed with grief. An unusual bustle was perceived in his highness's palace; horses were caparisoned, sumpter mules were hired, and it was at length formally announced to the viceroy, that the embassy was about to take leave. Nothing could exceed the noble Spaniard's regret, for his own revenue had been prodigiously benefited by the outlay of the infidel; he having mulcted every dealer with his highness's household, from the hirer of the palace down to the seller of charcoal, in one-half his gains. The loss of the embassy was a national calamity; and to detain it, even but for a week longer, the viceroy invited his highness to be present at the most imposing ceremony of the church, the taking of the veil by a noble nun. All Palermo was in a tumult of delight at the news; and the handsome Moslem grew into higher favour than ever, from his thus being the promoter of the general festival. The streets echoed no longer the melancholy cries of "O Divina Provvidenza! poveretto morto di fame. O boni servi di Dio, fateci la carità!" which the English travellers universally take for national melodies, and copy down in their journals; declaring the Italians the most musical people alive. But now the air rang with shouts of "Viva il Grande!—Viva Abdallah!—Vivean gli Moslemani!" All was joy; with no slight tendency to the Koran, that inculcated the giving of sequins. A Mahometan missionary might have wondered at Palermo during that week.

At length the day of public happiness dawned. All the city rushed to the cathedral at daybreak; and no building on earth could be fitter for the most sumptuous displays of the Romish worship. It was built by the Saracens, and had for many a year echoed from its gilded walls, fretted roof, and Pærian and porphyry columns, the sounds of "Allah il Allah!" But the sword of Count Rogero had driven out the infidels; and, for five hundred years, the glorious cathedral had exchanged "Allah il Allah!" for the sounds of "Maria sanctissima!—Virgo purissima!—Mater Dulcissima!—Dea celatissima!—Ora pro nobis!" On this occasion the ceremony was to be enhanced by making three nuns instead of one. The three lovely youngest daughters of the noble houses of Leonforte, Monteleone, and Pandatari, three living rosebuds, were on this day to plant their beauties in the cloister; they each had a lover, perhaps many; but the honour of their families was concerned in each bequeathing a daughter to the church; and what is love in the child compared to honour in the parent?

The assembly was all magnificence, nobility, and rapture. Every moment increased the public eagerness. At length the bell tolled noon; the gates of the chancel were thrown open; every human being was on tiptoe—every heart panted. Suddenly a scream was heard—it was followed by a confused sound of feet, and the sound was followed by the appearance of the lady abbess of the noble convent of St. Agnes de Spalatro rushing in with her veil dishevelled, and fainting in the astonished archbishop's arms. The news transpired too soon; the three nuns were not to be nuns; they were gone; but whether by magic none could tell. Human search was of no avail; they were not to be found within convent or cathedral. The ceremony now broke up in infinite disorder. All Palermo was scandalized, peculiarly by its failure in the presence of the great Mahometan. "What will he think of our religion?" was the cry from noon till midnight, under every roof in the city.

They were still to suffer the further calamity of his highness's departure. Next morning, at daybreak, his train was seen issuing from the Porta Felice, and passing along at the foot of Monte Pellegrino, till it reached the angle of the road leading across the island to Messina. The multitude followed him for miles, partly through gratitude, partly through idleness, for they had nothing else to do, and partly for the pauls and other coins which his highness and his attendants occasionally threw into the road.

The noble Moslem's departure had eclipsed even the loss of the three nuns; and nothing was talked of for a week but his jewels, his horses, his pearls, and his beard. But this topic went the way of all the rest; and Palermo was yawning away by ten thousand at a time, when it was revived by the rumour that some terrible tragedy had been done, or was doing, in the palace lately occupied by the famous Tripolitan. The rumour became more interesting by the fact, that Count Girolamo had actually made his appearance, was in the palace with a tale of the most romantic horrors, and, in a state of the highest indignation, had superseded the viceroy, and ordered all the troops in Palermo to be under arms, at midnight, for an expedition across the mountains.

The count's tale was curious enough, though not uncommon in the loveliest of all climates; and was true enough, though told in a land where every body confesses to a friar once a month. On his journey from Messina every thing had gone well for the first day; but, at night, he had been seized in his quarters at the foot of Ætna, his escort taken, and his own noble person consigned to a troop of mountain robbers, who kept guard over him in one of their dens, and practised the indignity on his noble ears which had so much excited the pleasantries of his ill-wishers at Palermo. The whole council expressed their surprise. "Further," said the count, "I discovered by the conversation of my guards, that a grand scheme for turning you all into the burlesque that you so richly deserve, was going on by favour of my absence; that the fellow whom they call Mano-di-ferro, but who is unquestionably the rejected son of the Marquis Manfredoni, after having played the pirate in every corner of the Mediterranean, had, by joining with the Maltese galleys in pursuit of a Turkish corsair off your coast, contrived to carry off the prize, and then, equipping himself in the Turk's finery, made his appearance in this most worshipful city of fools, as his highness Hoseyn Abdallah, ambassador of Tripoli." The council were dumb with wonder.

"Furthermore," said the count, with increased indignation, "the pirate having had the unspeakable insolence to fall in love, two or three years ago, with the lady whom I intended for my bride, had the insufferable insolence to persuade her to run away with him on the very night when I was to have arrived in Palermo; and, to this hour, the Dama Calascibetta is living with the knave. Furthermore, the young Countess Villa Rosata, having been the particular friend of the Dama, this Signor Mano-di-ferro contrived to carry her off too, and save her from a marriage with a man to whom she had no other objections than that he was old, ugly, and not to her liking. Even the old marquis was not better off than others; for the bandit managed to give him postillions and an escort out of his own troop. Of course he was robbed without further trouble. Finally, most noble and wise council, the Signor, understanding that it pleased not his new wife that three nuns should be made in one day, though with no other reason against it but that they hated the sight of the veil, and were in love with three coxcombs of their own choice, managed to carry off the whole three from their cells, between veespers and matins, and give them for companions to his Calascibetta."

The whole assembly started from their seats in astonishment, and each councillor professing that he had long suspected something extraordinary in the pretended Moslem's seclusion, demanded that a price should be set upon his head. "Dotards," exclaimed the count, rising, "I have not left the vengeance of Count Girolamo to sleepers like you: behold this dagger!" He drew a blade from under his cloak, red from hilt to point. "That colour is his heart's blood. Last night one of his gang led me to the cottage where he lay unguarded—I drove that weapon through his heart—I forced his perfidious wife to rise; and she is now in my palace. So may the wrongs of Girolamo be revenged!" He descended from his seat with the words, and rushed from the chamber.

The news spread instantly through Palermo; and, to believe themselves, there was not a more sagacious city under the sun. Every man had recognised the pirate in the showy Moslem from the beginning, and "had kept the secret from mere generosity." The ladies were not less aware of the retreat of the fair Calascibetta; but "they had felt that it was not becoming to separate man and wife." However, their feelings were soon drawn to more important matters; a summons to a grand ball at the count's palace, in celebration of his intended marriage with the fair Calascibetta. All Palermo was enchanted; the men, with the magnanimous justice which had deposed a viceroy who suffered banditti to cut off the ears of royal chamberlains; and the ladies, with his magnanimous determination to marry at all hazards, and turn a weeping widow into a blooming wife.

The night came, the ball was given, the archbishop was in his pontificals; and the bride, tearful, pale, and in agonies of sorrow and reluctance, was forced to the altar by her family. Count Girolamo was in his cabinet, waiting for the priestly summons. But a strange howl suddenly struck the general ear. All paused. In another moment the door of the cabinet was thrown open, and the count rushed out with a look of terror: a bloodhound, of the largest breed of the Abruzzos, was at his heels. All shrank from the bared tusks and fiery eyes of the animal, which was scarcely inferior to an ordinary-sized lion. Swords were drawn; but he burst his way through all obstacles, and, with his broad nostrils, tracked the flying count. At length Girolamo, in his despair, drawing his dagger, took refuge at the altar. The bloodhound stopped at its foot for an instant, as if measuring his victim, and then, with a roar and a tremendous bound, fastened on his throat, and tore him to the ground. The outcry was now universal; women fainted, men rushed to force away or kill the infuriated animal; but it was too late. The bloodhound, laying one huge paw on the count's breast, and with the other pressing down his forehead, darted his fangs into his naked throat. Girolamo made one or two desperate struggles, tried to stab the animal, failed, and sank backward. A groan and a convulsion told that there had fled the spirit of the tyrant, the man of fiery passions, and the author of many a secret murder.

Calascibetta, screaming with horror, fled from the sight—the nobles dispersed—a procès verbal of the transaction was forwarded to court—every house in Palermo was full of various versions of the story for a week, and then it abandoned them once more to ennui.

Two years after it was announced that the old Marquis Manfredoni had died, acknowledging the son whom he had abandoned in infancy, and leaving him a million of sequins. A man, with a fourth of the sum, could not be suspected of any thing less than angelic virtues, and certainly the young marquis was never charged with having been a pirate; but he was observed to be in delicate health, in consequence, it was said, of a stab which had left him for dead, and from which his recovery was long doubtful. The lady Calascibetta was with him, looking lovelier than ten hours; and what was an object of unceasing remark, she was always attended by an enormous Abruzzo bloodhound, which she decorated with ribbons and ornaments, and which, next to the young marquis, seemed to be the greatest favourite she had in the world.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

Miss Clara Fisher and Mr. C. Kean are the alternate attractions every evening at this house. The former, who was not long since the Burke of her sex, retains all the power to charm an audience which has gained her so much "golden applause" since her first arrival in this country. The latter has just returned from Boston, in which city he commenced an engagement under very unpromising auspices, but terminated it with equal lustre and profit. His personation of the character of Hamlet—so chaste and true to nature withal—completed his victory over the polished inhabitants of the "literary emporium." These two stars present no ordinary attraction on the boards; but how far they will succeed to draw gazers after the overwhelming excitement occasioned by the "boy prodigy," remains still to be seen. Such an excitement has never before been witnessed here; and we can well conceive the feelings with which the towering genius of Cooke was wont, under similar circumstances, to regard the success of his rival, Master Betty. Where this powerful tragedian was compelled to submit, it can be no hardship for any other to yield for a while. As the public fever subsides, they will no doubt be reinstated in all their merited honours.

THEATRICAL CHIT-CHAT.—Forrest, Booth, Thorne, Hackett, Master Burke, and Medames Austin, Sharpe, and Knight are at Philadelphia. The papers of that city speak in raptures of Mrs. Austin's singing, and of the operas as produced at the Arch-street theatre. Madame Feron has been singing at the Tremont theatre, Boston. Miss Rock is at Charleston, South Carolina. Mr. Davis opened the French opera house at New Orleans on the fourteenth ultimo with La Dame Blanche. The Bowery theatre of this city has closed for the season.

NUMBER EIGHT.

St. Petersburg, 1830.

FROM the Cazan church, still keeping the Nevesky Perspective, you will again cross the Ecatherine canal; and after passing the Hotel de Ville with a high tower and clock, the first object that attracts attention is the Gastena Dvorr. This is a range of buildings occupying an entire large square, presenting a uniform front of two high stories, with unbroken arched galleries above and below, running around it, divided into three hundred and forty shops, occupied exclusively by Russians, and is the great centre of the retail trade of the city. One side of the lower range is mostly devoted to woollens, another to jewelry, crockery, and glass; a third to the choicer articles of grocery; and the fourth to silk and fancy goods. A few of the upper shops were similarly occupied, but the greater proportion I found devoted to furs, of which they have a varied and beautiful selection. It is really a magnificent bazar, and of great convenience to the city; for whatever may be the state of the weather here, the ladies drive up in their close carriages, dismount beneath the arch, and make the tour for their purchases alike screened from the hot rays of the sun, or the peltings of a driving storm. The idea, with a few emendations, would be well worthy the consideration of the possessors of some of the lower Broadway squares, and could they agree to adopt the plan, might erect an arcade to some purpose—not like the little diminutive cut now running from Maiden-lane to John-street; but an extensive bazar, adding alike to the splendour and convenience of the town.

I have generally found among the foreign retailers here, but one price to their goods, yet not so the Russian, at least with strangers. He usually begins with asking double or treble what he would gladly take; and unless one understands the system of trade, he will pay very dear for his purchases. One of the principals is seen parading in front of the shop, continually lifting his hat to every passer, and courteously saluting him with his "ezvolit'li," "pazait' gospodin?"—what will you please to have, sir?—and if you pause a moment, runs over a long list of articles that he has to offer to your notice, in a tone more rapid than a twenty-line current; winding up with a most superlative commendation of their superexcellence. These are the richer and consequently more independent class of Russian retailers, and their officious courtesy always possessed more of the amusing than disagreeable with me. But the cap and shoe shops of a rear square are occupied by a more needy race, and one is literally deafened with their "karoshy sapaghe"—magnificent boots—"pokrasné toufki"—the reddest shoes—and to procure a pass along the side-walk, I have been occasionally obliged to forcibly shove them aside, or call out in unmeasured terms to clear the way.

Next to the Gastena Dvorr, the Imperial library presents itself, containing three hundred and fifty thousand printed volumes, and being besides rich in manuscripts, some of which are highly curious. Duplicate copies of every work printed in the empire, must be deposited here; but the greatest accession received, was a transfer from Warsaw, of the celebrated Zaloutsky library at the fall of that city, before the assault of the bloody Suwarof. Pursuing the line to the Fontanka, you pass the French theatre, a low building at the extremity of a long court, and then front the palace of Anitchkof. This is a plain neat building, sufficiently capacious with projecting wings, a narrow court before surrounded by a high wall, and a small garden in the rear, inclosed with an iron fence. It was the residence of the present emperor previous to his ascending the throne, and is now held in reserve for the heir apparent, the little grand duke Alexander.

Crossing the Fontanka canal, the brick buildings cease at the third square, and an open field spreads out to the left, devoted to the winter market. It is here that when the cold weather has fairly set in, the frozen provisions are brought from the interior, inspected and disposed of, for a description of which I must refer you to Dr. Clark's travels in Russia. What is called the Cossack Village succeeds—it is in neat rows of wooden houses painted brown, and inhabited by the families of the Cossack part of the imperial guards. They seem to possess great taste for flowers, as the front windows of both stories were universally crowded with a considerable variety in full blossom and beauty. It is here that the street curves, and soon heads at the convent of St. Alexander Nevesky. A thick wall fronts the extended grounds around the convent, and we entered through an arched gate to a long passage leading to the buildings that form it, and to the left of which extends the cemetery of the princes and nobility. We found it already nearly filled with monuments to the departed, many of which must have been reared at great expense, and were no less appropriate than beautiful; pillars and obelisks rose around, and groups of sculptured angels of the purest marble were weeping over the ashes of the deceased. Outside the hallowed paling, I was attracted by the sight of some neglected tombs; and upon inquiring why they were thus unprotectedly left, I was told they were the graves of noble suicides; the tenets of the Greek religion not permitting the self-destructor a common burial with those who have departed at the irresistible summons of their Maker. What a melancholy contrast was here, and indeed a sad emblem of a more lasting separation that awaits us. Within, the monuments were guarded from dilapidation and untouched, save by the venerable hand of time—without, the graves lay scattered as it were, by the way-side, exposed to the rude insults of the vulgar passer, and the ruder tread of ignoble beasts; the older tombs were scattered in broken fragments around, and those more recently erected were already half in ruins!

A second archway leads to a nearly triangular space of considerable area, formed by the fronts of the convent buildings. Here are five churches, the residence of the metropolitan, a theological seminary, and numerous cells for the monks; those I saw wore long hair and beards, and were habited in long black gowns, making rather a sombre figure. The principal church is of fine architecture, with a dome of considerable height. The ceiling is in fresco; and the most attractive paintings that adorn the walls, are full-length portraits of Catherine second, Peter, and a Russian archbishop. The empress must have been a very fine looking woman, with an animated expression; and nothing can be more venerable and imposing than the archbishop in his sparkling mitre, rich flowing robes, his silver beard reaching to his girdle, and a huge golden cross suspended from his neck; and within the altar is an admirable painting of the annunciation; but the most remarkable object of curiosity here, is the tomb of the beatified hero from whom the convent takes its name,—St. Alexander Nevesky. It is in the form of a sarcophagus, with a raised canopy and a painting of our Saviour over it. A complete suit of armour of a knight, when chivalry was in its glory, with trophies of warlike instruments, hang from the wall around; these, together with the tomb, are of massive silver, and weigh more than seven thousand pounds, and were the gifts of the empresses Elizabeth and Catherine second. They are exceedingly resplendent, and beautifully wrought in scenes descriptive of the actions of the saint, whose memory seems to be held in the greatest veneration by the Russians. Numerous devotees surrounded the tomb during service, kneeling and bowing their heads before it, and offering up their ejaculations; and on the dismissal of the congregation, I noticed that many more, especially of the female part, passed by, falling on their knees, or stooping and kissing it with the greatest veneration. Indeed, the sarcophagus was quite worn in many places by these pious devotions. The largest bell in the city is here, and weighs upwards of thirty thousand pounds; its tone is remarkably deep and musical; the singing also was exquisite, though not so full as at the cathedral. In one of the contiguous chapels is a marble column to the infant children of Alexander, whose remains lie buried here, and we were shown various relics, the virtues of which I have quite forgotten. A large garden with a few flowers and better stock of vegetables is neatly kept; but the grounds about are very little adorned, having no other shade than scattered white birch, and present rather a gloomy aspect. A grand religious ceremony annually takes place here in August, in honour of St. Alexander Nevesky, at which the imperial family, nobility, and clergy assist; and at the close of which a procession is formed, the monks marching before, chanting their hymns with raised banners and lighted flambeaus all the way to the cathedral of Our Lady of Cazan.

CANALS AND RAILROADS.—The proposition to construct a railroad on the tow-path of the Delaware and Raritan canal, has called forth the following lines from a correspondent of the New-Brunswick Freedonian; they are neat and appropriate:

Canals and railroads, running side by side,
Recall a plan by Newton once applied,
Who had, (no doubt the tale you've heard before,)
With love of order and proportion smitten,
Two holes cut through the bottom of his door,
A large one for the cow and a small one for the kitten.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

THE PAINTER OF PISA.

BY D. CONWAY.

"HERE have I sat ten long days, looking from my window at the river flowing by, and at the people passing along, not one of whom has yet stopped at my door. Is not my studio on the Lung Arno, the place of greatest resort in the city of Pisa? and yet I am left without one inquirer after my talents. I had better remained to eat my ribotole in my native Massa, than have come to starve at Pisa."

So spake to himself the painter Giotto, as he sat in his studio one autumn evening, some time in the beginning of the seventeenth century; and immediately afterwards, rising from his chair, and walking two or three times hurriedly up and down in his apartment, he suddenly stopped, and rubbing his hands with the air of a man who has made an agreeable discovery, exclaimed aloud, "Bravissimo!" Now, what had given occasion for the sudden expression of joy manifested by the action and exclamation of the painter of Pisa will be presently seen. Although it was already almost sunset, Giotto seized his pallet and brushes and began to work; and, before light entirely failed him, he had sketched the outline of a female countenance.

Next morning the sun, as it looked over the Apennines, found Giotto at his task, and its beams, as it sunk in the Mediterranean, still lighted his wet canvass, but assiduity like this had its natural reward; a finished picture speedily rose beneath his pencil; and, having silently contemplated the result of his labour for a few moments, he again exclaimed, "Bravissimo!"

Now this exclamation was not owing to the beauty of the conception evinced in the picture; its excellence, as a work of art, was indeed great, but, if meant for the beau ideal of female beauty, the work would have been at once pronounced a failure. Such, however, was far from Giotto's intention. The picture represented a lady about thirty years of age, with a countenance no one could designate as plain, and which yet few would pronounce handsome; the features were sufficiently regular, but devoid of intelligence—that charm which is, above all others, prized in Italy; and, in short, no one having any pretensions to beauty could have felt it a compliment to be likened to the subject of Giotto's painting, although the artist had given to it all the advantages of the richest drapery, and of that charming colouring and exquisite finish for which the productions of his pencil are so remarkable.

Next morning, long before the bosom of the Arno reflected the tints of the morning, Giotto was at work in the window of his studio, and almost before a footstep was heard upon the Lung Arno he had placed his picture in the most conspicuous situation; on each side of it was suspended a broad mirror, and underneath the picture appeared this inscription in large gold letters: "This is the portrait of the most beautiful woman in Pisa." Giotto, having so disposed his work, took a few turns in the street in front of his studio, every time pausing as he passed to look at his picture; and being satisfied with the effect, he returned to his studio, saying to himself, "Bravissimo! if this does not produce employment, I'll hang myself." On the strength of this expectation, Giotto ate his breakfast with a better appetite than he had felt since arriving in the city of Pisa; and, filling a cup with red Tuscan, he placed himself in such a situation as might enable him to watch the result of his invention.

Soon the Lung Arno was filled with the usual sounds of business and pleasure; and although even before mid-day many a "bravo" escaped Giotto's lips as a pair of dark eyes would glance contempt at his portrait of "the most beautiful woman in Pisa," or as those of his own sex turned with a sneer from this rival to the charms of their favourites, it was not until evening that he had to congratulate himself upon the perfect triumph of his invention. The Lung Arno, the Corso of Pisa, was thronged with the beautiful and the gay; every moment a new group was arrested by Giotto's picture and its inscription; deep flushes of anger passed over the cheeks of many of the cavalieri serrenti; while a throb of offended pride agitated many a fair bosom; and the sensation was greatly increased by the excellence of Giotto's picture as a work of art, as well as by the name of the artist being a novelty to the inhabitants of Pisa. So greatly aggrieved, indeed, did one individual of a group feel himself to be, that he abruptly entered the studio, demanding satisfaction for the insult offered to the lady he had the happiness to serve; to which Giotto replied, that he was ready to afford to the injured lady the most satisfactory kind of reparation, by painting her su-

Next day all was confusion throughout the city of Pisa; the affront publicly offered to the charming eyes and seductive lips of the fair inhabitants was the general theme of conversation. Many a haughty beauty vowed revenge in the way most agreeable to Giotto's wishes. The cavalieri serventi vowed revenge in another way; but the ladies of their devotion dissuaded them from this, preferring a species of revenge more triumphant for their own charms. Husbands even were found asserting the beauty of their wives and talking of reparation. Nay, even the cittadini felt the insult; and if they did not resolve upon the same kind of revenge as that anticipated by their patrician rivals in beauty, they at least had the satisfaction of contrasting their own charms with Giotto's portrait in the mirrors which so ingeniously aided his design.

Promptly did the offended beauties of Pisa execute their threats of revenge; if Giotto had possessed twenty hands he might have employed them all; and not only was his employment profitable, but delightful also; for, from morning until night, the most bewitching countenances in Tuscany were subjected to his scrutiny, and in the utmost variety too; for Giotto, fearful that his fortunes might decline as suddenly as they had risen, resolved to gather the vintage while the sun shone, and courteously accepted every invitation to transfer to his canvass the living lips and eyes that so eloquently besought this favour. Nor was the good fortune of the painter of Pisa so transient as he had feared it might be. Founded upon the vanity of others, it was secured by their rivalry; for if the portrait of an unknown had so wounded the self-love and roused the jealousy of those who thought highly of their own charms, how much more would these passions be inflamed by the exhibition of the real portrait which Giotto substituted for it? and besides, from the moment that the coaches of the Lanfranchi and the Lanfranducci families—the most princely among the nobility—were seen at the door of Giotto's studio, he became the fashion; and three months had scarcely elapsed since his arrival in Pisa, before he stood on the highest pinnacle of public favour. He had no longer any occasion to display at his window a portrait to create jealousy, or mirrors to minister to vanity; his studio was a gallery of beauty; and she, whose charms had not risen into new life beneath the magic hand of Giotto, was supposed to have resigned her pretensions to rank among the lovely of Pisa.

THE BETROTHED.

"And now 'twas done; on the lone shore were plighted
Their hearts; the stars, their nuptial torches, shed
Beauty upon the beautiful they lighted!"

The mist was sleeping on the hill,
The dew was on the brake,
And the wild-bird's scream went lone and shrill
Along a quiet lake:
In the deep silence of the night,
A youth and maiden stand,
Where the waters ripple low and light,
Like music to the strand.

There was a spell of holiness
Around them, as they stood—
The starry night in her gala dress,
And the bright and peaceful flood;
But the pale girl shook with a silent fear,
As he knelt before her there,
And his voice, like a spirit's, low and clear,
Went forth on the quiet air.

"Long years ago, on this same spot,
I knelt before you first;
And told (oh, is the tale forgot?)
The love that childhood nursed;
Such love as only childhood can:
You wept and listen'd then,
And bade me, when I grew a man,
To tell the tale again.

"We parted on this spot of ground,
With fast but pleasant tears;
And the busy world went on its round,
With its hopes and with its fears;
And now I am a man—mid men
Of sterner mood and brow:
Moonlight was on those waters then,
Moonlight is on them now!

"If thou wilt plight me thy heart and hand,
And live where my fathers lie,
I will build thee a bower in another land,
And under as blue a sky:
If thou wilt buffet the waves of time,
And the storms of the world, with me,
I will find thee a home in a sunny clime,
Far over the western sea!

"I do not promise thee gold to wear,
Nor gems of price and pride;

But thou shalt weave in thine own bright hair
The flower of the mountain-side:
Thy place with the dames of that land shall be,
Mid the high and the noble of blood,
And thy step on the hill be as proud and free
As the bride of a chieftain's should.

"I do not promise thee lighted hall,
The torch, nor the diamond's glare;
You must say farewell to the midnight ball,
When you tread on the wild heaths there:
But you shall see from your bower, afar,
The lake as it sleeps in light;
And the tranquil rays of the evening star,
As it rests on the waves by night.

"I do not promise thee page to wait,
Nor maiden to bend the knee;
I do not promise thee robe of state,
Nor gilded canopy:
I may not lead thee to lordly dome,
Where pride and the proud ones be;
But I'll share with thee, in my father's home,
What my fathers have shared with me.

"I give thee the promise that childhood gave,
In its first and fervent love;
To share one dwelling, on land or wave,
And one guiding-star above:
One bliss—one pain—one hope—one fear—
One altar, and one God;
One trust hereafter—and one here;
One grave, and one green sod!"

The tale is told—his lips are mute,
And bent to earth his brow;
One tear of hers has stain'd his lute—
How beat his pulses now?
Tell me, sweet cousin, if you know,
When maiden's cheek grows pale,
And when her tears begin to flow,
How answers she such tale?

THE INDIAN CITY OF BENARES.

BY MISS EMMA ROBERTS.

The city of Benares, which, in wealth and importance, ranks next to Delhi, the capital of Hindostan, is delightfully situated on the left bank of the Ganges. The variety and magnificence of the buildings, the broad terraces of the Ghauts, so peculiar and so superb a feature of Indian architecture, and the intermixture of fine trees, waving amid pagodas, domes, towers, and palaces, present a combination of the most beautiful and picturesque objects which imagination can portray. The minarets are supposed to be the finest in the world: their light slender columns crowned with the open lantern, and springing in graceful spires from a confused mass of buildings below, have a very beautiful and singular effect, adding considerably to the oriental grandeur of the scene. The best and perhaps the only good view of Benares is obtained from the river; for, like all other Indian cities, the streets are so narrow, and the houses so crowded together, that many of the buildings are completely hid, and the beauty of all much obscured; the summits of the minarets are, however, favourite points, and present a splendid view of the city stretching below, and of the adjacent country. Benares still remains the stronghold of Hindoo superstition, although no longer the theatre of its most revolting ordinances. It has obtained the appellation of "the Holy City," from a tradition that it was the birth-place of one of the principal deities of that strange and fantastic mythology, which forms the religious belief of a large portion of the inhabitants of Hindostan. It is also the centre of learning, the Bramins having there a college, which is justly celebrated for the number and scientific attainments of its scholars.

The sacrifices of human victims upon the altars of their gods, so dark a stain upon the religion of the Hindoos, have been discontinued at Benares since the subjugation of the country by the moosaulmauns and the Christians; the former, under the emperor Aurungzebe, partially destroyed the temples in which these shocking rites were performed; but the custom still exists of conveying the bodies of persons supposed to be beyond the reach of medical aid to the banks of the Ganges, where death is not unfrequently precipitated by the application of mud to the mouth and nostrils of the sufferer; while others are committed to the flood before life is actually extinct, the recovery of the patient being by no means a desirable object, as it involves the loss of cast. There is a village in the neighbourhood of Calcutta appropriated solely for the residence of those persons who, after having been brought to expire beside the sacred waters of the Ganges, have been snatched from an untimely death; or, according to the Hindoo notion, have been rejected by the holy river. These unfortunates, severed from all their former enjoyments, deprived of all the privileges of rank and birth, linger out the remainder of their existence amid strangers and outcasts like themselves; drowning or suffocation may, therefore, in some cases be considered as an act of charity.

The immolation of widows upon the funeral piles of their deceased husbands is also an event of not unfrequent occurrence in the neighbourhood of Benares, the European magistrates unfortunately being restricted to the exercise of persuasion alone in their efforts to abolish these barbarous exhibitions. It appears that, with few exceptions, these sacrifices are voluntary, as far as relates to actual and forcible compulsion. But the suttee has only a choice of evils; she must instantly descend from the rank which she held in society, and sink into the lowest and most degraded class. A Hindoo widow cannot inherit any portion of her deceased husband's property: she is forbidden to wear ornaments, a disgrace which an Asiatic can alone appreciate; the widow is also required to perform menial and servile offices, than which nothing can be more revolting to a woman of high cast; she is restricted both in the quality and quantity of her food; compelled to sleep upon the bare earth, and subjected to every indignity which the contempt of her relations can inflict. The extent of suffering produced by these privations and mortifications can only be estimated by persons who have some acquaintance with eastern manners and customs. A life of luxury and ease, splendid attire, command in the Zenana, and seclusion from the public eye, constitute feminine happiness in India; and she who, from her infancy, has been accustomed to sloth and magnificence, considers death less appalling than the abject state of servitude to which in widowhood she must submit. The motives, unconnected with worldly considerations, which influence the suttee, seem to vary. Some have declared their perfect conviction, that, by the act of cremation, they not only redeem the souls of all their relations, but ascend themselves directly to heaven; while others prophesy the number of transmigrations which they must undergo previously to the attainment of final beatitude.

Benares is celebrated for its looms. Every sort of gold and silver stuff, tissues, and brocades, and a superb kind of damask, flowered with gold and silver, called kincob, and in much esteem for the dresses of natives of rank, are manufactured there. The turbans made at Benares are also particularly beautiful; they are fabricated of the richest materials, and seem to be actually formed of gems. The city abounds with ingenious artificers, jewellers, goldsmiths, dyers, ivory-cutters, and workers in wood. Precious stones, shawls, gums, spices, dried fruits, and other productions of the east are to be obtained from the merchants; long strings of camels heavily laden arrive yearly from Persia and Thibet; the serais are filled with strangers, resorting to so good a mart for the sale of foreign commodities; and, at the festival seasons, it is crowded with pilgrims flocking from all parts of Hindostan. Many of the native inhabitants are extremely wealthy, and live in great pomp, while the rajah maintains a style of magnificence little short of regal splendour. The narrow streets of the city, thronged with an immense population, are infested by sacred animals. Of these the Bramin bulls form a nuisance of no small magnitude, more particularly to the moosaulmaun portion of the inhabitants, who do not hold them, like the Hindoos, in deferential reverence. Allowed to thrust their devouring jaws into the baskets where grain and vegetables are exposed for sale in the bazaars, they grow to an immense size, and overfed and growing vicious with age, become extremely dangerous. The passenger who, blocked in some narrow entry, is obliged to await the pleasure of one of these petted animals before he can proceed on his way, may esteem himself lucky if he escape without personal injury. Monkeys of all sorts, parrots, pigeons, peacocks, squirrels, and pariah dogs innumerable, are to be seen in all directions; while jackalls lurk in the secret places, and kites and vultures, perched upon the roofs, pillars, posts, and gateways of the houses, perform the part of scavengers, and clear away the offal, which is abandoned entirely to their jurisdiction. The servants of the East India company reside in an extensive district, called Jecrole, about two miles from the city, which, though not so beautiful as many other European stations, is well planted with mango, tamarind, peepul, and a great variety of equally luxuriant trees, and watered by a mullah.

ADVENTURES IN HYDRABAD.

BY JAMES E. ALEXANDER, OF THE SIXTEENTH LANCERS.

Silent leges inter arma.

To those unacquainted with the east be it known that Hyderabad is the capital city of the Nizam of the Deccan of India, and that it is situated on the Moosa river, which in the rains flows swiftly past the lofty walls in a full torrent, and at other seasons of the year is a clear and limpid stream. The city is four miles in length, and nearly as many broad; and, being the seat of one of the few remaining Mongul governments, it is crowded with idle Musselmauns of all kinds, and more of the old forms and ceremonies of the great Indian dynasty are preserved in the nizami's court than in any other.

We had marched towards Hydrabad from the north, and as we approached it, the features of the country gradually changed from flat and monotonous tracts to a landscape diversified with tanks and teckrees, small lakes, and eminences crowned with huge masses of rock. Beautiful tamarind-trees and dates were not wanting, and the umbrageous mango shaded the road as we advanced. We passed near the celebrated fortress of Golconda, used as a state prison, and as the repository of the gold and jewels of the lords of the deccan, and then found ourselves in an extensive plain, on whose surface were seen, here and there, groups of rocks fantastically arranged and heaped, cromlech-like, on one another, and rice-fields with their accompanying reservoirs of water. The city rose before us, and the towers, minarets, and domes gleamed in the eastern sun.

We pitched our tents on the banks of the Hoosen Sanger tank; and shortly after donning my Musselmaun costume, I rode towards the city, accompanied with a native friend, Moideen Khan. We crossed the river at the Chadur Ghât, or sheet ford, and entered the city by the gate of the same name. A highly interesting sight was now afforded us. Instead of deserted streets and empty houses, these were crowded with men of every cast, colour, and country of Hindoostan. The costumes, too, were widely dissimilar and highly picturesque: of course the turban prevailed, but it was of every colour and shape; and the other vestments were of divers bright dyes, causing an assemblage of the people to resemble a bed of tulips. Every man who was able to wield a sword had one begirt about him, and the shawl sash sustained daggers and pistols. In consequence of arms being so generally worn, and the police being ineffective, brawls and murders are of daily occurrence; and the people are so accustomed to these that they walk past a pool of human gore, or a dead body, in the streets, with seeming indifference. It is highly dangerous for Europeans to enter within the walls; they will certainly get insulted, and perhaps shot from a window.

We traversed numberless streets, where the celebrated oriental magnificence and splendour, painted in such glowing colours in the Arabian Nights, were realized. Elephants in gorgeous trappings were constantly seen parading about in every direction. The shops in the bazaars glistened with cloth of gold and embroidery; shawls of cashmere, exposed for sale, formed flowing draperies in others; and the hum of so many thousand voices, and the sight of so many turbaned heads, occasioned in us a most pleasing excitement.

Suddenly a shouting and noise was heard at some distance; we turned our horses towards the quarter whence it proceeded, and saw, rushing towards us, a dark and savage-looking native, his eyes starting from their sockets, and in his hand a bloody dagger. We prepared for defence, when we observed that he was pursued by a tall Musselmaun wielding a curved sabre: he advanced with hasty strides after the fugitive, and, coming up with him, dealt him a smart cut across the neck, which brought him to the dust. Over he rolled, writhing in the agonies of death, and, turning towards the Musselmaun, he muttered a prayer for mercy. "Accursed dog! did you show any to the Hakim Bashee?" said the other; and, with a blow on the throat, he sent him to render his account to Allah. The spectators then commenced congratulating and praising the young Musselmaun; and, on inquiring the particulars of the affray, we were able to collect what follows.

The Nizam's physician was passing along in his palankeen between the Mucca Masjid, (or Mecca Mosque) where the famous Nizam Allee lies buried, and the Char Minar, or gateway of the four minarets. He was accosted by three Puthan men, one of whom held out his left hand for his pulse to be felt. Whilst performing the friendly office, the physician was stabbed in the stomach by the villain, and at the same moment received his death-wound in his side from a murderer at the other door of the palankeen, which the bearers immediately let fall and fled, and the blood was poured out like water on the streets. The Puthans immediately attempted to make off, but were pursued by a servant, who, calling out that these were the men who had just murdered his master, the young Musselmaun nobleman before mentioned, sitting in his upper story, heard him, and, sallying out into the street, came up with the fugitives and cut them down in succession. It seems that the Puthans belonged to a troublesome tribe, who a short time before had been expelled the city; and thinking that the physician was instrumental in procuring their banishment, they revenged themselves on him as before described. The three bodies were afterwards suspended from the gates, and presented a ghastly spectacle.

Turning from this scene, we passed onwards by the palaces of the nobles, at the gates of which were seated soldiers in chain armour, armed with matchlocks; and men of rank passed us on prancing Arab steeds, with armed attendants behind them. After completing our survey of the city, we returned to our tents.

"It was that hour when on some tree
The boobool poured his melody,
As fled the parting gleam of day,
And breath of gentlest zephyrs came
In whispering sighs to fan the frame."

LOVE AND AMBITION.

BY MISS S. STRICKLAND.

Love, laughing, to Ambition said,
"Resign thine iron crown to me!"
The mighty conqueror shook his head:
"My bride is Immortality!"

With that the urchin drew his bow,
And, smiling, fix'd his keenest dart;
So true the aim, so sure the blow,
It struck the tyrant to the heart.

The laurel wreath lies all unbound,
The banner in the dust is furled,
The trumpet spreads no terrors round;
What now to him is all the world?

LITERARY NOTICES.

SOUTHERN REVIEW.—The twelfth number of this ably conducted work has lately made its appearance, and fully sustains by the variety, spirit, and importance of its matter, the high reputation which had been previously awarded to it, both in this country and abroad. "The race is not always to the swift, nor the battle to the strong;" and the Southern Review, though supported by talents of the first order, is, we regret to learn, to be discontinued for want of patronage. This failure reflects no credit on the magnanimity of our countrymen. The work was undoubtedly established with the twofold object of contributing to the general literature of the nation, and of defending the political interests and vindicating the aspersed character of the south. And it is the successful accomplishment of this latter purpose which has, we apprehend, been the great source of jealousy and fear to interested individuals in other sections of the country. The influence of the talent of our southern brethren has long been powerfully felt in our national councils and on every national emergency. To repress this power and curtail the extent of its operations, has ever been a darling pursuit with selfish partisans elsewhere; and this motive alone can, as it appears to us, explain the limited encouragement bestowed upon a periodical publication which was eminently calculated to promote a taste for sound learning and elegant letters, and to diffuse correct opinions on most subjects connected with political economy and morals. Its party politics were necessarily exclusive; but so long as they were advanced decorously and with manly dignity, little exception should have been taken to them, and less doubt entertained of their injurious tendency. Discussion is the only alembic for the development of truth; and he who would refuse to submit his opinions to this test, is unworthy to act the part of an enlightened citizen of a free country. Let us hope that local jealousies may subside, and sectional divisions be no longer carried to the extent of checking the ardour of literary enterprise or silencing the voice of unshackled argument. The literature of the south is an honour to our common stock. There is a vivacity and charm of wit, a raciness and freshness of imagination, a zeal for classical associations, and a generous enthusiasm of sentiment characteristic of the compositions of our best southern writers, which go far to relieve the more severe and precise style, the more critically accurate logic, and the more abstract, and perhaps profound, but less popular and winning philosophy of the eastern and northern schools. We of the middle states should patronize both; and while we avoid their respective faults, learn to improve by their peculiar excellencies. We are more especially called upon to assist an unsuccessful competition for literary promotion, as it unfortunately happens, that "the great and powerful state" is without even a respectable monthly.

THE WATER-WITCH.—Mr. Cooper is certainly incorrigible. Most of the critics in the country opened in full cry against the errors of his former productions; yet here is another novel, in which they are all repeated; here is the same mannerism in style—the same awkwardness and heaviness in the conversations—the same ill-judged and badly drawn characters. We were strongly tempted to fling the book aside, after wading through the first fifty pages, but the hope of something better encouraged us; nor were our hopes disappointed, for after several dull and tedious chapters, we came at last to others of deep power and intense interest—to a succession of sea scenes, in short, worthy of the author of the Pilot and the Red Rover. For this we were fully prepared. The moment we left the land and embarked in the Coquette, we knew a rich treat was in store for us; and as we were carried on from one spirit-stirring adventure to another, from the hazard of the pursuit to the deeper interest of the escape—from the intricacies and perils of the chase through Hellgate to the encounter with the enemy—from the "heady fight" to the bloody victory—from victory to misfortune, and from misfortune to danger, and the brink of despair, we were almost ready to excuse all the dullness which provoked us at first. We say almost, for we cannot quite forgive Mr. Cooper for thus doing things by halves—for leaving such great blemishes by the side of such great beauties. It is most injurious to his general reputation. Already many give him credit for nothing but power of description; and we ourselves, while we cannot think that such an eye for the grand and beautiful in nature as he possesses can exist without some force of imagination, some depth of feeling, some fancy and invention, must request him, as he values our good opinion, to throw a little more life and spirit into his dialogue, and not to "caricature humanity so abominably" as he does in some of his delineations.

The plot of the present work may be disposed of in a few words. Mr. Van Beverout is an alderman of the city of New-York, and if stupidity be, as some say, characteristic of a city dignitary, this sketch is certainly true to nature. We hope, however, for the credit of our common council, they have improved in honesty since his day, for the worthy magistrate is a free trader. The alderman retires with his niece, Alida de Barbérie, to his villa on the shores of New-Jersey. The famous Water-witch is lying at anchor near them; and one of her crew, who goes by the name of Seadrift, misled by what he takes for a signal from his customer, the alderman, enters Alida's apartment. The young lady's fancy is taken partly by his beauty and graceful address, but more especially by the splendid articles of finery he brings with him—an attraction which the author, with as little truth as politeness, represents as not to be resisted by the fair sex. Captain Ludlow, (the commander of the Coquette, a king's vessel lying in the harbour of New-York,) who had been paying a lover's visit to Alida in the evening, is seized by a party of the smugglers and brought to the young lady's apartment. He sees her charmed with the looks and tones almost as much as with the silks and satins of the young sailor, and when his liberty is given him, takes his leave in a high fever of rage and jealousy. Next morning Alida has disappeared. Suspecting that she has been carried on board the "Water-witch," he goes thither in search of her, in company with the alderman and a heavy personage of the name of Oloffe Van Staats, a fellow-suitor. They do not succeed in finding the lady. In her stead they are introduced to the witch who gives name to the vessel; who performs, for their amusement, some incantations, conceived in the worst possible taste. On his return, Ludlow finds Alida quietly installed at home, who very reasonably refuses to give any account of her late disappearance, and enters Ludlow's vessel with her uncle. The Coquette now, for the third time, discovers and pursues the Water-witch, but in vain. The chase is prolonged through Hellgate to the east end of Long-Island, where a French armed vessel is descried, to which the British officer, though without boats and with only half his crew on board, offers battle. He is just gaining a bloody victory when another French ship heaves in sight, and compels him to abandon his prize. His own vessel is then attacked by the Frenchmen's boats, which, after a desperate struggle, are driven off by the timely aid of "the Skimmer of the Seas," and his men. Another and more imminent peril succeeds. The Coquette is discovered to be on fire, and Ludlow, with the alderman, Alida, Seadrift, and the "Skimmer of the Seas," escape on a raft, and are rescued by the Water-witch. Now comes the dénouement. The supposed sailor, Seadrift, is metamorphosed into Eudora, the daughter of the alderman, by the wife of his youthful love, Ludlow and Alida are duly married, and Eudora leaves her new found father to follow the fortunes of "the Skimmer of the Seas." We omit one or two scenes and characters, which have nothing to do with the main story. Lord Cornbury, the governor of the province, is introduced, though to what earthly purpose our critical ingenuity has not been able to discover.

We will freely confess ourselves a little disappointed in this book; with all its faults it has great merit, but yet not quite as much as we had anticipated. We expected from its title, a tale, not merely of the escape of a smuggler, but of the adventures of a more daring rover. We were in hopes that Mr. Cooper had occupied that ground which Scott in his Pirate has rather glanced at than entered upon—the history of our American buccaners. This is the true fairy land of romance. There is no one domain either of history or fable, where a rich and glowing imagination might expand so freely as in this. The roving, adventurous career of these men—their black crimes, desperate courage, and careless generosity—their lawless lives and fearless deaths—all make a picture of brilliant and striking colours; a scene checkered with that mixture of good and evil which is most natural, and therefore most pleasing to the mind. Why are we condemned to read of the exploits of these bold adventurers in the “Buccaners of America,” or such catch-penny trash? Mr. Cooper, is above all others, fitted to be their chronicler. Let him lay the scene of his next novel in the West Indies or South America, at the time when men of much courage and little principle found in them the true El Dorado—let him describe with the truth of a seaman and the eloquence of a poet, their battles and their cruises, and the splendid phenomena of the sky and sea of the tropics—let him give some moderate probability to his plot and characters, and we will promise him the unequalled praise of critics, and the highest admiration of the public.

THE BARBADOES GIRL.—THE SISTERS.—The zeal to convey instruction, in an alluring form, to the youthful mind, continues unabated. Mrs. Hofland, the authoress of the two little volumes now before us, is worthy of all praise for her untiring exertions to promote this most important and useful object, and her success is commensurate with her industry and ardour. Few writers have gained more popularity, or identified themselves so effectually with the subject of juvenile education in its enlarged sense as this amiable and benevolent lady. Her name is a passport for any volume into a family. Mr. Burgess, the spirited publisher of these last efforts of her pen, merits patronage for the very creditable form in which he has ushered them forth to public notice.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

President's Message.—Start not, gentle reader, at the unusual title of the article we are now about to indite for thy special benefit and pleasure. We are fully aware that thy nerves are sensitive, and have been rendered so by the luxurious usage thou hast ever received at our hands. Thou hast been accustomed to roam with us in the flowery paths where light and balsamic breezes alone blow to winnow fragrance and delight around thee; and the soft murmurs of purling streams, blended with the melodious warbles of feathered choristers, lull thee to sweet sleep, or more delicious reverie; and the beams of even the garish mid-day sun came to thy delicate vision shorn of their too dazzling lustre by the interposing umbrage of elm and sycamore, under which thou didst compose thyself to quiet contemplation, if the dying light of day, or the silvery splendour of that best and most faithful reflector, the moon, were not preferred for our joint converse upon poetry and letters. And when the storm raged, and the blast of winter swept the earth, and desolated all its external forms of beauty, we have held thee in durance by the blazing hearth where the bright and cheering flames roared and flickered, and have called to thy aid all the spirits of fancy to soothe thee in thy solitude, and all the virtues of domestic happiness to warm thee into bliss in thy social mood. All hath been peace, and quiet, and romance whenever we have met. And shall we now, after having indulged thee thus in ease and all a student's loved seclusion from the strifes which agitate the busy world, shall we now lead thee forth unprepared into the blank and dreary wastes over which sweeps in endless succession the fell breath of the hot simoom, or impenetrable volumes of piercing dust, which lay the traveller low, and soon expose his whitened bones to the crunching jaws of famished beasts of prey? Or shall we expose thee to the contentions and fierce waves and winds which agitate the tempestuous ocean, or to the deadly strokes of murderous hosts eager to drink each other's blood in battle array? All this and more mightest thou apprehend if we were once to entice thee into the lists of political disputants, and all this and more rise up to thy frightened view at the bare mention of the president's message. What canst thou anticipate but a discussion of the merits of its style, or of the cogency of its arguments, or of the soundness of its general views of national policy; and that we shall either pronounce it the most able, incontrovertible, and patriotic document which has ever been issued from the chair of the chief magistrate of the Union; or that it is most silly and puerile, and hostile to the best interests of the people? Well thou knowest that a middle path exists, not in politics, or if it does, it has long been choked up by the weeds and briars of corruption, and that party strife is ready to deal its blows on all who come near its blighting presence. We shall not mix in such scenes:

“The best of men have ever loved repose;
They hate to mingle in the filthy fray;
Where the soul sours and gradual rancour grows
Embittered more from peevish day to day.”

Our object at the present time is to regard this state document not with critical or political bias, but as an “ensemble” of the national character in comparison with similar testimonials in other civilized countries. We speak not in reference to any one message, but to the character of such a production generally, as it annually emanates from Washington, and flies with the wings of the wind to be received with eager curiosity by the millions who inhabit this extensive and prosperous country; we would contrast the vigour and frankness of its style, the simplicity and lofty tone of its sentiments, the pure ardor of its aspirations for the good of the nation, and its unaffected deference to the will of the people, with the turgid and studied declamation, the pompous ambiguities and lordly tone of self-supremacy exhibited in royal speeches. And we would gather thence fresh causes for gratulation on the happy lot in which it has pleased a benign Providence to cast us. And we would offer up our ardent prayers, that prosperous as is the condition of our people, multiplying and increasing in numbers, wealth, intelligence, and all the sources of civil and domestic happiness, so may it be perpetual!

Revolutionary Fathers.—In the recent celebration, commemorative of the late French revolution, we were forcibly struck on witnessing a few of the venerable patriots of our revolutionary war. Time, which has furrowed their cheeks and wasted their frames, has consecrated them in the bosoms of their countrymen. Their names and services will live in imperishable glory. The present generation, to whom they are only known as the remnant of a band of heroes, whose exploits are recorded in glowing language on the faithful page of history, regard them with feelings of the utmost respect and veneration. These sentiments increase in proportion to the diminution of their numbers and the lapse of years. The mighty object for which they so zealously contended, was nobly won. That liberty so highly prized by us all, was the reward of their bravery, perseverance, and suffering. They have lived to see a new generation in the full fruition of their wishes; and that country, so dear to every one, rising in strength and majesty, and taking an ascendant, which promises to reach the highest pinnacle of splendour and beauty. These men are the pride of the nation, and, though tottering to the grave, ought every where to be held sacred, and cherished with all those evidences of warmth and devotion which the recital of their deeds and the magnitude of their achievements naturally inspire. The period is rapidly advancing when these hoary relics, whose lives were devoted to the independence of their country, and whose bodies formed its rampart, will repose in peace beneath the soil which many of them moistened with their blood, and their voices will be heard no more.

In beholding the immense fabric which has sprung up from the combined efforts of those unshaken spirits, who staked every thing in the issue of the great contest, we scarcely know which most to admire, the heroism which accomplished so much by exposure and sacrifices in the field, or that wisdom which has linked the states together in one powerful family compact, and which is conducting us on the highway of freedom, with all the flattering presages which point to the goal of wealth, distinction, and renown. The man who is incapable of rightly appreciating these things, is negatively criminal, and deserves to be pitied. He who would wantonly disregard them, either by an ungrateful requital on the one hand, or by a sacrilegious attempt at subversion on the other, would merit a severity of punishment which no language is adequate to express.

In contemplating a scene so well calculated to awaken our admiration and wonder, one painful reflection unwelcomely obtrudes itself. Of the few surviving and scattered fragments of the army of liberty, a small portion only have the means of a comfortable support. Many have died in poverty and wretchedness; and not a few, it is to be feared, have uttered the complaints of their wrongs before a tribunal whose leading attribute is justice, and from whose omnipotent decree there can be no appeal. Let the people then seize the only opportunity that remains, and wipe from their escutcheon the stain that has adhered too long and too closely to them—that of cruel neglect and deep ingratitude.

Public dinners.—It is with pleasure we learn that the incidental remark made by us last week, touching these public entertainments, has excited much attention. All judicious men must deplore the egotism and vanity which would induce a company of self-congregated individuals, after drinking each other's health in the most fulsome strains of puff-eulogy, to consent to a publication of these wretched outpourings of their weakness and self-conceit. It betrays an intentional purpose of rising into public notoriety, on wings which will scarcely stand the test with better success than those which, for a few fleeting moments, upheld the son of Icarus. To such exposure there is attached no crime—the folly involves and ensures its own condemnation. Our pity is excited rather than our indignation; but the public taste—not altogether so depraved as such attempts to pander to its corruption would indicate—revuls at the spectacle of respectable individuals voluntarily putting on their heads the cap of folly with all its jangling bells, and then calling out to the multitude, “Come, see and hear what pretty figures we make; what delightful music we play!” Public dinners are very appropriate at times—on great and solemn national festivals—after triumphs and victories—or in honour of eminent public benefactors; but to repeat them on every occasion which can minister to the silly vanity of transient popularity and ephemeral renown, is contrary to the maxims of good sense, no less than of public decorum.

The Lions of the West; or, a Trip to Washington.—It having been erroneously stated in some of the public papers, that the hero of this piece was intended to represent a late member of congress from the state of Tennessee, we are authorized, and requested, by the author, to say that it is not so. The design was to embody certain peculiar characteristics of the west in one single person, who should thus represent, not an individual, but the species. There was no intention to bring any particular individual before the public, and it is hoped those papers which have given currency to the error, will take the earliest opportunity to correct it.

The Holidays.—The season of festivity is fast approaching, and with it come fond retrospections of the past, unalloyed enjoyments for the present, and delightful anticipations of the future. The elastic buoyancy of childhood, and the rainbow hopes of youth, the vigorous confidence of manhood, the tender sensibilities of female loveliness, all will receive a new and fresh impulse which will cause the blood to leap and course through the natural alleys with a livelier thrill, check the inroads of sorrow and decay, and open new and enlarged prospects of coming felicity. The social hearth will blaze with a more cheerful ray, the hospitable board groan under renewed pressure of luxurious delicacies, and the red wine cup shall once again hallow the pledge of mutual recognition and heartfelt aspirations of reciprocal good will. Shall the poor be forgotten? To them no ready host extends a friendly grasp—no genial voice bids welcome to plenteous joys—cheerless and desolate is their home, if home they have. Hard is the morsel they bite, cold the air they breathe, and ragged the raiment that scarce covers their poverty and suffering. Shall no sympathy be kindled up in their cause? Shall they not be remembered on the day of general rejoicing—or shall they be left to the awful and heart-corroding consciousness of cruel and biting neglect? Humanity answers, no.

Mr. James Lawson.—This gentleman, well known as the author of a volume of “Tales and Sketches,” recently published in this city, and numerous other miscellaneous productions in prose and verse, and as one of the original editors of the Courier and Enquirer, has withdrawn from that establishment, and associated himself with the Mercurial Advertiser. Mr. Lawson is universally esteemed for his talents and good qualities, and may be emphatically pronounced “a man of many friends.”

Navarino hats.—The manufacture of Navarino hats, or paper Leghorns, has become quite a business in Boston. It is said that about sixty thousand have been made there during the past year. The impressions are produced on the paper by copper-plates, similar to embossing.

New music.—Mrs. Embury's exquisite Warrior, entitled “How have I thought of thee,” have been set to music by Mr. Wilhelm Icho, and published by Firth and Hall.

The steam-engine.—The “Gardener's Magazine” anticipates that at some future day the steam-engine, “will plough and sow a thousand acres in a week, and reap the crop in a day.”

She read, and sigh'd, and lost her heart.

Archly jeering, Love was there,
And cried, "Of Fancy, maids beware."

EXCERPTS FROM LABRUYERE.

THE philosopher leaves the fashion of his clothes to his tailor; it is as great a weakness to be out of fashion, as to affect to be in it.

The man of mode is not long so, for fashions are very transitory; if perchance he is a man of merit, he cannot suffer annihilation, but by something or other will still subsist, equally worthy of estimation, though less esteemed.

Virtue has this happiness, that she can subsist of herself, and knows how to exist without admirers, partisans, and protectors; want of assistance and approbation does not only not affect her, but preserves, purifies, and renders her more perfect.

There must, I confess, be judgments, seizures, prisons, and executions; but justice, law, and necessity apart, 'tis always strange to me when I consider with what violence and fury men act towards one another.

Some things are insupportable if they are but indifferent; as poetry, music, and painting, and public speeches.

'Tis the business of the journalist to inform us when a book is published, for whom it is printed, in what character, on what paper, how bound, and at what bookseller's it is to be found. This is his business; 'tis folly for him to pretend to criticize.

The highest reach of a new writer is an empty reasoning on policy, and vain conjectures on the public management.

Some people have a facility of speaking off-hand, and a long time joined with extravagant gestures, a loud voice, and strong lungs. This the vulgar call eloquence.

A genius and great abilities are sometimes wanting, sometimes only opportunities. Some deserve praise for what they have done, and others for what they could have done.

'Tis the glory or the merit of some men to write well; and of others not to write at all.

It is virtue which should determine us in the choice of our friends, so it is that alone we should always regard in them, without inquiring into their good or ill fortune; and when we find we have resolution enough to follow them in adversity, we ought boldly, and with assurance, to cultivate their friendship in their greatest prosperity.

There is a time when the richest women ought to marry; they seldom let slip an opportunity at first, but it costs them a long repentance; the reputation of their fortune seems to decay with that of their beauty. On the contrary, every thing favours the young of that sex, even the men's opinion, who are fond of giving them all the advantages possible to render them still more desirable.

The man who is in pain to know what alteration time and age have made in him, needs only to consult the eyes of the fair one he addresses, and by the tone of her voice as she talks with him, he will learn what he fears to know. But, O! how hard a lesson!

Love seizes on us suddenly, without giving us time to reflect; our disposition or our weakness favours the surprise; one look, one glance from the fair fixes and determines us.

Friendship stands in need of all help, care, confidence, and complaisance; if not supplied with these, it expires.

He who has had the experience of a great and violent love, neglects friendship; and he who has consumed all his passion upon friendship, is nothing advanced towards love.

There is some pleasure in meeting the eyes of a person whom we have lately obliged.

He who loves to such a degree as to wish he were able to love a thousand times more than he does, yields in love to none but to him who loves more than he wishes for.

Men are sometimes inclinable to be in love, but cannot succeed in their desire; they seek all occasions of being conquered, but escape still! If I may be allowed the expression, they are bound to continue free.

The coldness and disorders which happen in friendship have their causes; in love there is hardly any other reason for ceasing to love than that we are too well beloved.

Love receives its death's wound from disgust, and is buried by oblivion.

Some little failings we voluntarily give up to censure, and we are not angry at being rallied for them; we should make choice of the same kind of failings when we rally others.

We are sensible of the beginning and declension of love, by the perplexity we are in to find ourselves alone.

'Tis a weakness to love: 'tis sometimes another weakness to attempt to cure it.

'Tis endeavour to forget one is the certain course to think of nothing else. Love has this in common with scruples, that it is exacerbated by the reflections used to free us from it. If it were practicable, there's nothing necessary to weaken our passion, but never to mind it.

If we cannot be accounted to live but at such times as we enjoy ourselves, life will be found to be very short; since were we only to reckon the hours we pass agreeably, a great number of years would not make up a life of a few months.

The blockhead is always ridiculous, it is his character; a man of some sense may sometimes be ridiculous, but will not be so long.

The wit of conversation consists more in finding it in others than in showing a great deal yourself; he who goes from your conversation pleased with himself and his own wit, is perfectly well pleased with you. Most men had rather please than admire you, and seek less to be instructed, nay, diverted, than approved and applauded; the most delicate of pleasures is to please another.

There are certain people who so ardently and passionately desire a thing, that out of fear of losing it, they leave nothing undone to make them lose it.

THE RUINED SHRINE.

BY GEORGE D. STRONG.

AWAY, away! let no sound of mirth
Pass o'er the ruined shrine!
Let the vow ascend and the prayer be said,
Though its lights no longer shine!
Alas! for the loved ones passed away,
In the pride of their beauty fled;
By the sacred altar's smothered blaze
We will mourn the early dead!

The early dead! there's a thrilling chord
That wakes at memory's call—
From the flowers that bloom o'er the broken shrine,
We will weave their coronal!
And where the vesper bell awoke
With its chimes the evening prayer,
We will bring affection's holiest gems,
And place the offering there!

Shrine of the dead! the past recall!
Let the floating incense rise!
Bring forth from thy shroud the once-loved forms,
To prepare for the sacrifice!
I know by the tear that dims thine eye,
Maid of the peerless brow!
'That the flowers of joy that decked thy path
Are fading with sorrow now.

And for thee, bold knight of the eagle plume,
Whose eye unblanch'd meets mine;
The vulture whets his ravenous beak
For thy corse in Palestine.
And the strong in arm and firm in heart
There marshalled in proud array;
The banner that floats o'er their towering crests
Shall enshroud their lifeless clay!

But away, away! ye by-gone hosts,
Ye mailed and martial train,
Your helmet and buckler, lance and spear,
Shall never gleam again!
And your lady loves, and the swelling choir,
Whose anthems pealed on high;
And the fretted aisle and the ponderous arch—
All, all, are things passed by!

But thou, cherished form, in my heart enshrined,
Beloved in woe or bliss!
Why come you not with the buoyant step,
And the smile of happiness?
The fireside hearth has a vacant seat—
On the couch no form reposes;
While the added stone, 'neath the yew-tree's shade,
The mournful tale discloses!

Thou ruined shrine! I deem thee still Far holier in decay,
Than when before thee bent the knee
Of the lovely, proud, and gay;
And to light thy censor's vanished blaze,
My heart will fondly bring
The incense of its buried joys,
The hopes of its early spring!

POPULAR MORAL TALES.

FATHER EUSTACIO.

A Portuguese Legend.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "LORD MORCAR OF HERWARD."
"Je n'avois plus d'amante, il me fallut un Dieu."

In one of the most beautiful provinces of Portugal stands a convent, in itself an object of beauty from its exquisite architecture, and rendered doubly attractive from the almost unequalled loveliness of its situation. Let the imagination revel amid groves of orange-trees, laden at once with fruit, flower, and perfume—amid tracks of the dark olive and pine, relieved by the fragrant and lively foliage of the myrtle and geranium—alleys of lemons and citrons, bowers of roses, and springs and rills of the coolest and freshest water, yielding nature's own mirror to the clinging tufts of violets and wild lilies which blossom spontaneously on their margin—let it do all this, and yet it will scarcely trace on its own tablet the luxuriant landscape. On the southern side of the convent, beneath a hill, gay with its belt of timber and its laughing vineyard, stood the Quinta d'as Lagrimas; but I am premature in thus designating it—the name of the "Villa of Tears" was given to it after that of which I am about to tell had taken place.

In this convent dwelt the mysterious Father Eustacio. The monastic robe of white serge fell round his tall and graceful form in folds better suited to the regal purple: the crown of his head was shaven; but the raven curls clustered richly round a brow high and smooth as marble, and the dark fiery eye, and the scornful smile which discovered teeth like eastern pearls, yet told of a world he had vowed to renounce for ever. He was a Spaniard—the brotherhood themselves knew no more; he had made rich offerings at the shrine of the patron saint of their order; he had broken the weapon which he wore at his arrival on the steps of the altar, and trampled his dark plume beneath his feet on the threshold; he had withdrawn a rich jewel from his neck, and laid it at the feet of the Madonna (Nossa Senhora da Piedade;) and he had finally taken the vows of the order, and become, to appearance, like the rest of the community, a mere creature of mechanism and habit.

But no one followed Eustacio to his narrow cell—no ear drank in the low sounds which escaped from his overcharged spirit in his solitude—no eye beheld the contempt with which he hurled from him the effeminate habit of the brotherhood—none looked on him in his paroxysms of emotion, when, with clenched hands, fixed teeth, and starting eyeballs, he stood in the midst of his confined apartment like a thing of stone, and then sprang, as it were, into life so suddenly, that every nerve quivered, and every vein swelled almost to bursting; when his heart heaved as though he had not space even for existence in his narrow prison, and his hand instinctively sought to grasp a weapon which he wore no longer, and then fell listlessly at his side—none heard the soul-fraught groan that followed as he sank down, with his face buried in his spread palms, and spent the night gazing unconsciously at the dim lamp that lit up the misshapen altar, the rude crucifix, and the grinning skull, which were the furniture of his cell.

It was the festival of their patron saint, and one of the brotherhood watched by his shrine all night: Eustacio won permission from the prior to be that one; and the vesper was chanted, and the twilight mass said, and the monks uttered their orisons at the shrine, and departed, and Eustacio was alone. He looked around him and smiled. There was a taper dimly lighting up the figure of the saint; and the holy lamp, which is never extinguished at the altar of the sacramento, shed its faint light over a limited space, and left the rest of the vast edifice in darkness. No sound was there, save the fall of his own footsteps, as he strode through the murky aisle. Twice had he traversed it, and returned to the shrine he watched; a third time he paced its solemn length, and approached the altar; but now he started, and the blood sprang to his brow, while he passed his hand over his eyes, questioning the evidence they gave him. Kneeling there, with her veil thrown back, and disclosing her pure and pallid beauty, was a female, whose mantle of sable velvet fell around her in large and heavy folds; jewels were in her hair and on her arms, and the very missal in her small hand was clasped with a rich gem. Her lips moved noiselessly, and she seemed so absorbed in her devotions that she had not heard his approach. Eustacio stood like one entranced—a thousand recollections pressed upon his spirits—his dark eyes flashed fire—his breast heaved—yet he stirred not. The prayer was ended, the lady rose to depart, and started on discovering the monk. Eustacio gazed upon her as her features were fully revealed by the taper which burnt before the shrine of the saint. She was beautiful; but it was a proud, pale beauty, which sorrow seemed to be wasting, though it had failed to destroy. Her form was slight and graceful as the sweep of the river willow. Something that lady read in the countenance whereon she gazed which forbade fear, for in an instant she stood calmly and almost proudly before him. The monk remained like a statue rivetted to the spot.

"Holy father!" she commenced, in a tone so rich and deep that it died away down the long aisle of the chapel, like the last note of the vesper organ.

"Scarce saint enough for the first, or reverend enough for the second, lady," murmured the monk, as though he brooked not the address from such lips; and the dark eye flashed, and the rich blood mantled in the proud brow; "and yet other epithets become me not, even from beauty."

There was questioning in the look which was turned on him as he spoke, but he replied not to it, save by casting still farther back the cowl which had partially shaded his face, and erecting his fine person yet more loftily. But there needed not words to tell the heart of the lady that it was possible even yet to forget the cowl and rosary, and to look on him as a man, not as a monk; passion was there in the eye and on the lip—passion of the world's birth, which the chill of the cloister had failed to displace; and there was pride in the heaving of the serge-clad chest, and the dilation of the enveloped figure—even in the grasp of the finely-formed white hand, which drew more gracefully together the folds of the coarse habit. For all this one glance sufficed. Never had the lady looked on such a face and form within those walls—never on any with the feeling which now pressed upon her heart. Slowly and silently she drew from her bosom a small golden key, and, adjusting it to a concealed lock in an ornamented panel of the shrine, a narrow door fell back, and, raising a lamp from the ground, she turned one long, fixed look on the monk, and retreated, closing the door as she withdrew. Long stood Eustacio gazing after her, as though he deemed that she would re-appear; but she came no more that night.

Thenceforward the piety of Father Eustacio became a proverb among the brotherhood. His nights were no longer spent in sleep; he kept holy vigils when the world was buried in slumber. There was something in the departing look of the mysterious visitant of the chapel, which had assured him that she went not for ever, and the assurance was verified. Night after night she trod the secret passage from her own sunny home to the convent shrine; and Eustacio heard her tale of sorrow; and she breathed it as she sat on the marble step of the altar where they had first met; and the hand of the monk wiped away the few large drops which fell, as she murmured it in his ear. It was a simple and a sad tale. Her father had vowed her to a hated union, and she pined in soul, while she won, by supplication, frequent but short delays. Then came the name of her hated suitor, and the cowed listener started from her side, and clenched his hands, and ground his teeth, as he murmured out,

"'Tis he! 'tis he!—the murderer of my sister—the hunted one of my hate, whom I pursued until my soul sickened that it found him not, and in despair vowed itself away to a cloister, that it might moulder into inanity, and forget. But think not that I have forgotten. Harken to me, Inez!"—and he drew towards his agitated listener, who had already risen and stood before him—"harken to me: I could not forget! The cell, the cowl, and the cloister—they are not the anodynes I madly thought them—they bring no Lethe—I am still Adrian, duke of —, while I strive only to be a monk: I am still the brother of the dead Carlotta, while I thought only to throw off the world and the world's ties. Dare not to marry him! Listen but to one vow from his polluting lips, and the curse of thy crime be on thee! Blood is there upon his hand, though he may stretch it to thee in gentleness—poison in his breath, though it may syllable passion. He was the husband of my sister: she passed away, and none knew where or how; but many whispered—murder! Think you not that I pursued him? Ay, as a hunted deer, he fled from place to place, and I was ever at his heels—alas, too late! Then mark me, Inez! for I can but breathe it in a whisper—he sought to rid himself of so tenacious a pursuer, so bitter an enemy, and he poured his subtle poison in the ears of one in power, and I was proclaimed—a traitor! The blow was struck—my sister, my revenge, all were forgotten—my proud name became a reproach—my honours were bowed to the dust. Look at yonder sparkling cross, pendent from the neck of the Madonna; little deemed I, when I knelt to receive that boon, that the giver, in his blind belief of an enemy, would so soon cast me forth to shame and obloquy! I uttered no justification—to be suspected was enough; but I came hither—came to forget myself to stone—to be a man no longer—to be a monk—and I am one! The convent rings with my piety; the blind crowd, who look on me, hold me as a thing too holy for this world. I am pointed at as a pattern, made the depository of the sins of others, and held to be too pure to sin myself: but it is not so, Inez!"—and the deep voice grew yet deeper—"the very thought of crime has roused me from my lethargy—the very thought of him whom I have sworn to sacrifice. I had vowed the dagger; I have hunted him to his lair, and now I can strike it even to his heart's centre!"

"Adrian! Eustacio!" murmured the lady.

"Either name is dear from thy lips," said the cowed noble, "though the one is sullied by calumny, and the other but a mockery. But hark, Inez, they have rung in the dawn; the drones are about to shake off their drowsiness, and live on another day in their apathy; till to-morrow, then, farewell!"

"Farewell!" echoed Inez, as he strained her to his heart, and ere many moments she had disappeared. The officiating monk had sleepily entered the chapel to feed the lamp, at the altar of the sacramento, and Father Eustacio was prostrate before the shrine of the saint.

Weeks passed, and still at intervals the noble monk and the gentle Inez met when the world slept; but the spirit of the duke panted for vengeance on his enemy, and it came at last.

It was on a lovely midnight, when the landscape was flooded with light, and the sparkling stars flashed out of the clear heavens like diamond studs scattered over a robe of purple, that the monk wandered from the convent garden to the grounds of the adjoining quinta. For a while he passed on, gazing as he went on the white clusters of the clematis and the richer blossoms of the pomegranate, as they disclosed their beauty to the moon, and thought of Inez; but ere long came wilder visions, and he remembered his sister, who was murdered in her loveliness, and on whose grave no eye had rested. Then came the memory of her husband, of the murderer! and he looked up to the moon as she rode in light, and then down on the dark shadow cast along the earth by the wooded height which bounded the landscape. He felt that he stood there a dishonoured man and an alien—he felt that he was loved even in his evil fortune, and that his enemy had again crossed his path. He struck his hand forcibly on his breast, and it came in contact with the hilt of his dagger: the monk smiled—the world has seldom looked on a smile like that with which he drew it forth. He cast back his clinging robe, he fetched one long deep breath; there was fire at his heart and in his brain: and he hurried on. There had been feasting in that place of beauty, and the guests were yet awake. He approached the house; an avenue of citron trees threw up their rich perfume to the sky, and darkened the space beneath them. He hastened to that spot of gloom; but it had other occupants. He heard the voice of Inez; tremblingly and tearfully she spoke, and entreaty quivered on her tongue. Other accents heard he also—the accents of his enemy! For a moment he paused silently and sternly, and then he sprang convulsively forward and stood before them. There was a faint scream, the agonizing scream of a woman; but the revellers heard it not. Then came louder and longer sounds; names were shouted, and imprecations followed them: there was a struggle, a wrestling for life; but Inez in her agony stirred not a limb. The loud laughter of her father's guests came fitfully on the night breeze like the rejoicings of observant fends. Light was around them—the pure light of the silver moon; but they stood on a spot of darkness! The struggle was brief, yet to Inez it seemed to have lasted years: one of the combatants staggered and fell heavily against the trunk of a citron tree, and the white blossoms showered on him as he sank down bleeding and senseless; then came the deep tones of the monk upon her ear, as he laughed out his triumph, and struggled for a moment ere he fell prostrate beside his enemy.

The moon bowed her silver brow to the coming dawn, and the blossoms scattered fresh sweetness to the morning breeze: the revellers shook off the heaviness of sleep, and came forth to gladden their oppressed energies by the freshness of nature. One among them entered the avenue of citrons—two lay dead before him, the affianced noble and the holy monk; and a third was there—she looked up and pointed with stern eye and steady finger to the corse of the cowed combatant—it was the lady Inez. Her hair was dank with the night dew, and her lips livid and compressed. One glance sufficed—horror had been busy with her—she was a maniac!

Few heard the tale: the holy brotherhood bore away their dead; the count consigned his fellow noble to a silent grave, and of his daughter no one knew more. The peasant, as he passes the forsaken pile, doffs his cap while he hastily mutters a Pater and an Ave, and hastens on his mules from the Quinta d'as Lagrimas.

Was ever a great discovery prosecuted, or an important benefit conferred upon the human race by him who was incapable of standing, and thinking, and feeling alone?

Nobility may exist in name, the sovereign may confer titles, the herald blazon out the descent, but solid glory and real greatness are inseparably connected with virtue.

ROMANCE OF HISTORY.

BESSY BELL AND MARY GRAY.

Founded on Scottish History.

It was in the yet Doric days of Scotland (comparing the present with the past) that Kenneth Bell, one of the lairds of the green holms of Kinvaid, having lost his lady by a sudden dispensation of Providence, remained for a long time wrapt up in the reveries of grief, and utterly inconsolable. The tide of affliction was at length stemmed by the nourice bringing before him his helpless infant daughter—the very miniature of her departed mother, after whom she had been named.

The looks of the innocent babe recalled the father's heart to a sense of the duties which life yet required of him; and little Beasy grew up in health and beauty, the apple of her father's eye. Nor was his fondness for her diminished, as year after year more fully developed those lineaments which at length ripened into a more matured likeness of her who was gone. She became, as it were, a part of the old man's being; she attended him in his garden walks; rode out with him on her palfrey on sunny mornings; and was as his shadow by the evening hearth. She doted on him with more than a daughter's fondness; and he, at length, seemed bound to earth by no tie save her existence.

It was thus that Beasy Bell grew up to woman's stature; and, in the quiet of her father's hall, she was now, in her eighteenth year, a picture of feminine loveliness. All around had heard of the beauty of the heiress of Kinvaid. The cottager who experienced her bounty drank to her health in his homely jug of nut-brown ale; and the squire, at wassail, toasted her in the golden wine-cup.

The dreadful plague of 1666 now fell out, and rapidly spread its devastations over Scotland. Men stood aghast; the fountains of society were broken up; and day after day brought into rural seclusion some additional proofs of its fearful ravages. Nought was heard around but the wailings of deprivation; and omens in the heavens and on the earth heralded miseries yet to come.

Having been carried from Edinburgh (in whose ill-ventilated closes and wyndes it had made terrible havoc) across the Frith of Forth, the northern counties were now thrown into alarm, and families broke up, forsaking the towns and villages to disperse themselves under the freer atmosphere of the country. Among others, the laird of Kinvaid trembled for the safety of his beloved child, and the arrival of young Bruce, of Powfoulis Priory, afforded him an excellent opportunity of having his daughter escorted to Lynedoch, the residence of a warmly attached friend and relation.

Under the protection of this gallant young squire, Beasy rode off on the following morning, and, the day being delightful, the young pair, happy in themselves, forgot, in the beauty of nature, the miseries that encompassed them.

Besides being a youth of handsome appearance and engaging manners, young Bruce had seen a good deal of the world, having for several years served as a member of the body guard of the French king. He had returned from Paris only a few months before, and yet wore the cap and plume peculiar to the distinguished corps to which he still belonged. The heart of poor Beasy Bell was as sensitive as it was innocent and unsophisticated; and, as her protector made his proud steed fret and curvet by her side, she thought to herself, as they rode along, that he was like one of the knights concerning whom she had read in romance, and, unknown to herself, there arose in her bosom a feeling to which it had hitherto been a stranger.

Her reception at Lynedoch was most cordial; nor the less so, perhaps, on the part of the young lady of that mansion, because her attendant was Bruce, the secret but accepted suitor for the hand of Mary Gray. Ah! had this mystery been at once revealed to Beasy Bell, what a world of misery it would have saved her!

From the plague had our travellers been flying; but the demon of desolation was here before them, and the smoke was ceasing to ascend from many a cottage-hearth. It became necessary that the household of Lynedoch should be immediately dispersed. Bruce and Lynedoch remained in the vicinity of the dwelling-house, and a bower of turf and moss was reared for the young ladies on the pastoral banks of the Brauchie-burn, a tributary of the Almond.

It was there that Beasy Bell and Mary Gray lived for a while in rural seclusion, far from the bustle and parade of gay life, verifying in some measure what ancient poetry hath feigned of the golden age. Bruce was a daily visitant at the bower by the Brauchie-burn: he wandered with them through the green solitudes; and, under a summer sun and a blue sky, they threaded oftentimes together the mazes of "many a bosky bourne and bushy dell." They chased the fantastic squirrel from bough to bough, and scared the thieving little weasel from the linnet's nest. Under a great tree they would seat themselves, as Bruce read aloud some story of chivalry, romance, or superstition, or soothed the listless hours of the afternoon with the delightful tones of the shepherd's pipe. More happy were they than the story-telling group, each in turn a queen, who, in like manner, flying from the pestilence which afflicted Florence, shut themselves up in its delightful gardens, relating those tales of love which have continued to delight posterity in the glowing pages of Boccaccio.

Under whatever circumstances it is placed, human nature will be human nature still. When the young and the beautiful meet together freely and unreservedly, the cold restraints of custom and formality must be thrown aside; friendship kindles into a warmer feeling, and love is generated. Could it be otherwise with our ramblers in their green solitude?

Between Mary Gray and young Bruce a mutual and understood attachment had long subsisted; indeed they only waited his coming of age to be united in the bonds of wedlock; but the circumstance, for particular reasons, was cautiously concealed within their own bosoms. Even to Beasy Bell, her dearest and most intimate companion, Mary had not revealed it. To disguise his real feelings, Bruce was outwardly less marked in his attention to his betrothed than to her friend; and, in her susceptibility and innocent confidence, Beasy Bell too readily mistook his kind assiduities for marks of affection and proofs of love. A new spirit began to pervade her whole being, almost unknown to herself; she looked on the scenes around her with other eyes; and life changed in the hues it had previously borne to the gaze of her imagination. In the absence of Bruce she became melancholy and abstracted. He seemed to her the being who had been born to render her blessed; and futurity appeared, without his presence, like the melancholy gloom of a November morning.

The physiological doctrine of temperaments we leave to its difficulties; although we confess, that in Beasy Bell and Mary Gray something spoke in the way of illustration.

The countenance of Beasy was one of light and sunshine. Her eyes were blue, her hair flaxen, her complexion florid. She might have sate for a picture of Aurora. Every thing about her spoke of "the innocent brightness of the newborn day." Mary Gray was in many things the reverse of this, although perhaps equally beautiful. Her features were more regular; she was taller, even more elegant in figure; and had in her almost colourless cheeks, lofty pale brow; and raven ringlets, a majesty which nature had denied to her unconscious rival. The one was all buoyancy and smiles; the other subdued passion, deep feeling, and quiet reflection.

Bruce was a person of the finest sense of honour; and, finding that he had unconsciously and unintentionally made an impression on the bosom-friend of his betrothed, became instantly aware that it behoved him to take some step to dispel the unfortunate illusion. Fortunately the time was speedily approaching, which called him to return, for a season, to his military post in France; but the idea of parting from Mary Gray had become doubly painful to his feelings, from the consideration of the circumstances under which he was obliged to leave her. The ravages of death were extending instead of abating; and the general elements themselves seemed to have become tainted with the unwholesomeness. There was an unrefreshing languor in the air; the sky wore a coppery appearance, and over the face of the sun was drawn, as it were, a veil of blood. Imagination might no doubt magnify these things; but victims were falling around on every side; and no Aaron, as in the days of hoary antiquity, now stood between the living and the dead, to bid the plague be stayed.

With a noble resolution Bruce took his departure, and sorrow, like a cloud, brooded over the bower by the Brauchie-burn. Mary sate in a quiet, melancholy abstraction; but ever and anon the tears dropped down the cheeks of Beasy Bell, as her "softer soul in woe dissolved aloud." Love is lynx-eyed, and Mary saw too well what was passing in the mind of her friend; but with a kind consideration, she allowed the lapse of a few days to moderate the turbulence of her feelings ere she ventured to impart the cruel truth. So unlooked for, so unexpected was the disclosure, that for a while she harboured a spirit of unbelief; but conviction at once flashed over her, extinguishing every hope, when she was shown a beautiful necklace of precious stones, which Bruce had presented to his betrothed on the morning of his bidding adieu to the bower of the Brauchie-burn. As it were by magic, a change came over the spirit of Beasy Bell. She dried her tears, hung on the neck of her friend, endeavoured to console her in her separation from him who loved her, and bore up with a heroism seemingly almost incompatible with the gentle softness of her nature. She clasped the chain round the neck of Mary, and, kneeling, implored heaven speedily to restore the giver to her arms.

Fatal had been that gift! It had been purchased by Bruce from a certain Adonijah Baber, a well-known Jewish merchant of Perth, who had amassed considerable riches by traffic. Taking advantage of the distracted state of the times, this man had allowed his thirst after lucre to overcome his better principles, and lead him into lawless dealings with the wretches who went about abstracting valuables from infected or deserted mansions. As a punishment for his rapacity, death was thus in a short time brought to his own household, and he himself perished.

Fatal had been that gift!—In a very little while Mary sickened; and her symptoms were those of the fearful malady afflicting the nation. Bessy Bell was fully aware of the danger; but, with an heroic self-devotion, she became the nurse of her friend; and, when all others kept aloof, administered, though vainly, to her wants. Her noble and generous mind was impressed with the conviction that she owed some reparation for the unintentional wound which she might have inflicted on the feelings of Mary, in having appeared to become her rival in the affections of her betrothed.

As an almost necessary consequence, she was herself seized with the malady of death. The evening heard them singing hymns together—midnight listened to the ravings of delirium—the morning sun shone upon their death.

The tragedy was consummated ere yet Bruce had set sail for France; but the news did not reach him for a considerable time, the communication between the two countries being interrupted. His immediate impulse was to volunteer into the service of the German emperor, by whom he was attached to a squadron sent to assist Sobieski of Poland against the Turks. He never returned; and was supposed to have fallen in battle.

The old Laird of Kinvaid awoke from the paroxysm of his grief to a state of almost dotage, yet occasionally a glimpse of the past would shoot across his mind; for, in wandering vacantly about his dwelling, he would sometimes exclaim, in the spirit so beautifully expressed in the Arabian manuscript, "Where is my child?" and echo answered, "Where?"

The burial vaults of both the Kinvaid and Lynedoch families, who were related, were in the church of Methven; but, according to a wish said to have been expressed by the two young friends, "who were lovely in their lives, and in death were not divided," they were buried near a beautiful bank of the Almond. Several of the poets of Scotland have sung their hapless fate: Lednoch bank has become classic in story; and, during the last century and a half, many thousands of enthusiastic pilgrims have visited the spot, which the late proprietor of Lynedoch has enclosed with pious care.

Of the original ballad only a few lines remain: they are full of nature and simple pathos.

Bessy Bell and Mary Gray
They were two bonny lasses;
They biggit a bower on yon burn brae,
And thae kilt it owre wi' rushes.
They wouldna lie in Methven kirk,
Beside their gentle kin;
But they would lie on Lednoch braes,
To beek them in the sun.

THE FINE ARTS.

BRIGNAL BANKS.

It must be apparent to every reader, that good poetry set to pleasing melody, forms the perfection of vocal music. The question, therefore, why the lyrical pieces of Lord Byron and Sir Walter Scott have not been set to music with more success, has often been asked; whereas the poetry of Moore and of Thomas Haynes Bayley stands embellished and enriched by the beauty of the melodies which have been adapted to it. We think the question capable of an easy solution. Neither Byron nor Scott understood the science of music, although passionately fond of it, consequently they did not feel the necessity of protecting the composer, who might undertake their works, from those difficulties peculiar to the English language, and which a musical poet would undoubtedly avoid, as Moore and Bayley have done, who are both good amateur musicians. The number of consonants, the prevalence of s final, the frequent recurrence of th—obstacles which of themselves interfere with the success of even the most skilful composer—must be obvious to every one who speaks our language; but to foreigners they form a source of great annoyance, and we are sorry to add, too often prove an occasion of vulgar and rude merriment at their expense. Let it not be supposed, however, that to unite the finest English poetry or prose with music is an impossibility; on the contrary, we can boast of instances where the sublimest language and the most scientific music have been delightfully blended; and, strange to say, a German, who spoke English but little, has furnished us with one of the strongest cases in point—we allude to Handel. Examine his Oratorio, the Messiah, which is entirely set to passages in Scripture, either typical of, or directly presaging the Redeemer—a more correct or impassioned adaptation of sense to sound cannot be met with. For a combination of poetry and music, examine the same author's adaptation of Milton's Il Penseroso, or of Gay's Acis and Galatea, and they will be found faultless in accent and expression. But Handels do not arise every day, gifted with the power of grasping any subject, and able to rob the poet of half his glory. At the present time it is an affair of consequence to select poetry abounding with words capable of good musical pronunciation, in setting which the difficulty is considerably lessened—and in this particular Scott and Byron must yield to Bayley and Moore. In short, there is a particular art in writing for musicians which these latter gentlemen possess in perfection. Were we to cite another instance, we should be inclined to fix upon the author of the Sicilian Knight, published in this paper a few weeks since, whose pen appears to us to have a similar facility. Of Byron's productions Nathan has given the best adaptation; of Scott's we must decidedly award the prize to Dr. Clarke, now of Worcester Cathedral, late of Cambridge University, in England, whose setting of "Lady Heron's song," "Constance's song," "The last words of Marmion," &c. have been attended deservedly with success. The present air and chorus of Brignal Banks, from Rokeby, as sung in the opera taken from that poem, is likewise a pleasing and happy effusion by the same author.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

MASTER BURKE has created such a sensation in this city, and so manifest an anxiety to witness a repetition of his charming performances, that the public are already taking seats for his next engagement. When, therefore, they who follow him upon the same boards do not immediately attract full houses, it is not to be ascribed to any want of talent in them, nor diminution of public esteem. Notwithstanding these circumstances, and the continually unfavourable state of the weather, the average receipts on the nights of C. Kean and Miss Clara Fisher have been very fair. Kean has appeared in Hamlet, Shylock, Sir Giles Overreach, Richard, Romeo, &c. and is making his way with a steady progress into the public favour. His playing is full of fine points and beautiful readings, and his attitudes frequently the best we have ever seen. If he has not always acted before an overflowing audience, he has at least delighted those who attended his representations, and elicited from them frequent and warm marks of approbation. No disinterested person of taste can refuse to acknowledge him not only as a performer of the very first promise, but as one who now sustains with admirable skill and effect the most difficult characters.

Miss Fisher has been aptly termed the "universal and enduring" favourite of our stage. Her appearance is always greeted with interest; and we have known sturdy obstinate critics, who, in vindicating the claims of some favourite actress to exclusive superiority, deem it important to depreciate the merit of all others (and such critics, by the by, are no rarities) we have known them go frowningly to witness her spirit-stirring exhibitions, which fairly betrayed them into applause before they knew what they were about. Her lighter efforts have lately been even better than usual.

It is stated that Mr. Forrest will shortly appear in a new tragedy, written expressly for him by R. P. Smith, entitled "Catus Marius." The genius of this admirable tragedian requires no comment at this time, and whoever has seen him needs no critic to point out beauties of the highest order. We are told he has reached a yet loftier grade in the profession which has already led him to such distinction.

We conclude the theatricals in this number with the following communication, from the pen of a gentleman well known to the literary public.

HAMLET—MR. C. KEAN.

Kean's Hamlet on Monday evening was sustained most skilfully. This gentleman is rapidly extending the circle of his admirers. It was one of Macready's remarks, that no man who played Hamlet well, could receive much applause.

There is some truth in the assertion, "behind; and as he rapidly to the multitude." The character of the youth, to his forehead, intellectual. His passions are subdued by habits.

The strong feeling to which, in other parts, the actor is called upon to give vent, are here curbed by reason, interrupted by apt and beautiful moral observations, and chastened throughout by a fine and pensive spirit. Even his madness is either forced, or suddenly corrected, by the recurrence of his accustomed melancholy; and the warmest affections dwell in his bosom, and soften down the desperate imaginations, which the horrors of his situation have conjured up in his mind. From the consummation of his revenge he shrinks with the instinctive hesitation and reluctance natural to a young and highly cultivated disposition, full of generosity and contemplation.

"The time is out of joint; oh, cursed spite,
That ever I was born to set it right."

The excellencies, therefore, of C. Kean's Hamlet, in consistency with those conceptions, are of a quality which the attentive readers of Shakspeare will be more likely to admire than those unaccustomed to study that great poet. They are silent, quiet displays of thought; they consist of grace in attitude, appropriateness of gesture, and impressiveness of reading. The sternness and physical power requisite in Othello, Richard, &c. would be here out of place. Hamlet is a youth—bewildered—wretched—in love—yet called upon by a supernatural power to sacrifice affection for revenge: his hopes have been blasted—his affections disappointed—he is watched by enemies—the father, who had elicited all the love and reverence of his once ardent soul, has been murdered, and the mother who gave him being, is the guilty instrument of his ruin. The elasticity of youth—the springs of hope and of passion, are all broken—and he would fly to the grave as a refuge, if the "Everlasting had not fixed his canon 'gainst self-slaughter."

All this seemed continually present to the mind of the actor. The finest passages were chastely and pensively delivered, as if they came from a dark and weary mind, to which the world no longer afforded any interest or pleasure. His soliloquies were conceived and executed admirably well. The whole part was animated with a fine meaning, which addressed itself to the reason and the heart, and discovered the art of the actor, who keeps out from the philosophical Hamlet the savage energy of Shylock, the more refined but bitter brutality of Sir Giles, and the eagerness and licentious ambition of Richard.

I am convinced that Mr. Kean needs only an impartial examination to ensure him the most brilliant success. His beauties are unobtrusive, but stand the test of strict criticism. He will not so often stir up the souls of the audience, by giving passages with all the force and energy of great physical power; but the philosopher finds a deep meaning in his reading; the painter and sculptor will notice that his attitudes are spirited and picturesque; and the intelligent spectator, who knows nothing of the science of painting or poetry, feels his attention gently drawn towards him, and his mind gradually wrought up to a high pitch of interest. By the by, did not our respected friend, Mr. Foote, die off in the last scene rather more comfortably than people generally perform that unpleasant operation? Sudden repentance would scarcely have carried him through with such delightful nonchalance. Not a single kick—not a shake of the head—he did not even roll up the whites of his eyes—but, very composedly crossing his legs, and reclining gently, and with much dignity, back in his chair, he cast one look towards the quiet dramatis personæ around him, as much as to say, "Good morning, ladies and gentlemen," and off he went.

LITERARY NOTICES.

A Geographical present, &c.—Asia.—Europe—Two duodecimos have just issued from the press of Mr. Burgess, containing a description of those great and ancient continents. They are well calculated to initiate the youthful student into a knowledge of that important branch, geography. When the volumes are completed, the work will form a useful manual for schools.

The London Carcanet.—A quaint title for a neat little volume, containing selections from distinguished writers, such as Bacon, Milton, Hooker, Addison, Pope, Johnson, Shakspeare, Goldsmith, Junius, Byron, Moore, Scott, Webster, Washington Irving, Halleck, &c. &c. It is in a convenient and portable form, and will be an acceptable and rational gift at the present season. It may be had of Mr. Peabody, 129 Broadway.

The Lily; a coloured annual for 1831.—Mr. Schoyer, of this city, has just published an annual with this title. It does not lay claim to competition with the beautiful works of this kind which have heretofore appeared, but is notwithstanding a very pretty volume.

Sir Walter Scott has two new novels in the press—the first, taken from the history of the Lover's Knap, entitled "Robert of Paris;" the other, a new series of "Tales of a Grandfather," taken from the history of France.

ADRIAN. THE SINGING OF THE WRECKED.

The morning broke—the towering cliff
Loom'd dimly through the hazy air;
To heaven their hearts and hands they lift,
In silent, solemn, thankful prayer!
And joyfully the warm tear starts
From weary eyes, with watching pain'd,
For hope and rapture fill those hearts,
Where grief and anguish long have reign'd.

Long had they gazed upon a sea
That, shoreless, seem'd to touch the sky;
Till hope deferr'd and misery
Had drain'd the fount of sorrow dry;
For since their gallant ship was lost,
Many, ah! many a weary day,
And many a night, had they been toss'd
Like lonely sea-birds on the spray!

Many a bright and cloudless noon
Had mock'd their anguish and despair,
And oft the melancholy moon
Had, in her watchings, found them there—
There—on the ocean—void of rest,
Where hope no solace could diffuse,
While o'er each cold and aching breast
Distill'd the nightly chilling dews!

There was the child—the maiden fair—
The father, too, of manly form;
The mother shone more sweetly there,
Like a pale sun-beam in the storm!
Her heart was sad—but still she smiled—
Gazed wistful on the sea and sky—
Then fondly clasped her wond'ring child,
As if she'd found assistance nigh.

And now a little stricken band
Of rescued fugitives they come,
And pause upon that beachy strand,
Houseless and friendless, far from home!
All they possessed of worldly wealth,
The winds and waves have swept away;
With hunger faint, impaired in health,
Weary they watch the opening day.

And wherefore are they joyous now?
Why sparkles every eye with hope,
And why does pleasure light each brow,
As they ascend the grassy slope?
No joyful cry—no shout was heard,
Of welcome, on that lonely strand—
No greeting smile—no tender word,
No ardent pressure of the hand!

The sunny hills, the blooming vales,
The distant village-spire and dome,
The shady wood, the fragrant gales—
All—all awake fond thoughts of home!
For, far away, there are bright eyes—
(And kindred hearts, that daily burn)
Watching the winds, the storms, the skies,
All anxious for that ship's return!

That glorious ship—and where is she?
The mountain wave she rides no more;
A giant martyr to the sea—
Her lofty beauties strew the shore.
Yet they—the loved—in distant land,
Who darkly watch for her in vain—
The voices of that shipwrecked band
Shall glad their sinking hearts again!

OLD LETTERS.

That they have seemed to be together, though absent; shook hands, as over a vast; and embraced, as it were, from the ends of opposed winds.—Winter's Tale.

When the tired boy at his school-desk, and under the watchful eye of his master, is awkwardly toiling to acquire the mystery of pot-hooks and trammels, how little he dreams of the exhaustless source which he is opening for the interest and happiness of future years. Nature has imprisoned the soul of man in a narrow tenement, and denied him the power of omnipresence, and even those facilities of motion by which some of the inferior creation pass safely and swiftly between distant places; but how ingeniously he has broadened his field of operation and enjoyment? I am more than a thousand weary miles from my friend, yet I sit down in the lonely silence of my chamber, and chat to him in a kind of illusion, which, to my imagination, recalls his image, his peculiar ways, and the tones of his voice, with almost the vividness of reality; and here upon my table lies the sheet which has just reached me, freighted with his secret thoughts.

Have you ever, dear reader, been banished by fate from the home where were concentrated all your hopes, attachments, and associations—away off in some secluded, solitary, tedious, country village—where no one cares for you, nothing interests you, and where the mails come only once a-week? Your body, indeed, may wander listlessly along, prying into the secrets of winding brooks, or rusting above the fallen leaves in the silent passages of the woods, but your thoughts fly back and hover around the distant scene, to the incidents of which you are tremblingly alive, yet over which distance has drawn a pall, dark and impenetrable, to your piercing wishes. Your imagination shapes out all sorts of fantastic accidents, (for remarkable events seem always to occur in your absence) till wearied with vain conjectures of the present, the tired mind reposes on the past, and lives over again all its vanished pleasures. Then comes the letter. The simple superscription in its familiar characters swarms with the most lively associations. You cannot yet call them delicious, for sometimes floats across you the fear of some vague evil, darkening your sunny anticipations, as the shadow of a cloud passes over the bosom of a grassy hill. With what eager anxiety you break the seal! and, as the thirsty traveller on a desert, when at last he reaches the spring, gushing and bubbling up in its beautiful and tempting coolness, kneels down and quenches the thirst he has suffered so long, so you drink in sentence after sentence, and allay the fever of your soul.

I never behold a friend receive a letter at a distance from his home, especially if he have a family, without experiencing a kind of reflected anxiety that it may contain nothing to alarm his affections or wound his feelings. No lovely wife sick—no favourite child gone for ever from his once happy household—no lightning-bolt fallen from any quarter upon the verdant spot where all his cherished hopes and feelings have their home. I read his countenance almost as anxiously as he peruses the page, and when his eyes gradually emit brighter sparkles, a glow as of remembered pleasure suffuses his cheeks, and that kind of smile lurks about his lips which marks inward satisfaction, unshared by those around him, I know the hovering hawk has not pounced upon his sheltered nest, and a mountain of heavy fears roll away from my mind.

There is something sacred about a letter. Every scrap which I receive is packed regularly away as a treasure to which each succeeding year will add a value; and I have consequently under lock and key, little mementos of many a friend by whom the trifling offspring of his pen has been forgotten. In early youth I was charmed with this plan, and have imperceptibly accumulated a mass of heterogeneous materials, some of which are closely interwoven with the pleasantest scenes of my life. If I should long enough avoid the unceremonious attack of the grim tyrant which hurls so many various weapons, and lays so many different snares for the poor shrinking mortal who is sure to be his victim at last, I can picture myself, in the loneliness of idle age, with a few silver hairs clothing a brow perhaps doubly seamed with the ravages of time and sorrow, amid the scenes, characters, and events of a new and strange generation, peering silently through my spectacles with many a sad reverie and pensive smile upon these little invaluable relics of by-gone years. Why even now I cannot turn over their worn and faded pages without raking up the embers of forgotten passions, and forcing from their lonely and neglected graves many a merry school-mate, once dearly loved, yet now growing more and more dim in the mists of memory; and who, but for these relics of our brief adventures, (for even so selfish and changeable a thing is that mystery of nature the human heart) might have scarcely ever recurred to my thought.

Sometimes during a rainy idle day, or when I am at a distance from home, I untie a bundle of these papers. Let us see of what this is composed. What have we here? A decent-looking superscription—hand unknown. "Sir—I shall proceed to examine the witnesses in the case of—" bah, business—but signed, E. B. He died ten minutes after in an apoplectic fit. The next. What's this? Small, neat, female hand. Why I do not recollect of any—ah! an invitation. By the graces, that ever I should forget Laura B., although when I danced with her that evening I now remember quoting the declaration of the poor ghost-haunted Hamlet:

"Yes, from the table of my memory
I'll wipe away all trivial fond records,
All saws of books, all forms, all pleasures past
That youth and observation copied there,
And thou, Miser Laura, all alone shalt live
Within the book and volume of my brain
Unmixed with baser matter."

By the mass, what a lovely creature she was—with a face one deemed he could never forget—a voice like the sound of silver in the ears of a miser—a hand which Jupiter might have come down from heaven for the sake of holding, and the prettiest foot in the world. Beautiful Laura. I was gradually sinking into the most delicious passion for her, and like Benedict, was ready to pick tokens of requited love out of her every look and gesture. One morning, before breakfast while indulging in a most formidable gaze over the paper, I caught her name under the head of "married," in company with some more fortunate youth, of whose existence until that moment I had been entirely ignorant. Never a word did I say to any human being, but despatched ten buckwheat cakes, with a corresponding accompaniment of fine sausages, and washing down the whole with one or two extra cups of coffee, I applied myself to the business of the day with a confirmed belief in that veracious and consolatory maxim, "all is vanity and vexation of spirit."

The next is a modest epistle, expressing great confidence in my abilities and inclination, (two materials, by the way, very much at war in my destiny) and winding up with a modest request of five dollars as a loan. The writer married a lady a short time after worth a hundred and eighty thousand dollars, and passes me in the street, the rascal, without a nod.

The next, although of recent date, is the only remnant of a friendship which once promised me much gratification. It is connected with a history which, alas, for life, although perfectly true, is so common as to be devoid of interest, except in the bosoms of those acquainted with the parties. It bore the signature of C. T., who had intended to enter the Columbian army under Bolivar. He received his education in this city, where I became intimately acquainted with him. His temperament, like that of most from Spanish America, was warm, sanguine, and impetuous. Keenly susceptible to the charms of female beauty, every pair of expressive eyes lighted in him the flame of a lively but transient attachment. He loved poetry and music, in which he displayed both taste and genius. Every accomplishment which could render him a dangerous companion for young and kindred spirits of the other sex, was added to a person of marked elegance and grace; nor was he deficient in those qualities which command the respect of men, and promise success in life. His fault was a too passionate admiration of every thing beautiful—a too open and decisive hatred and contempt for every thing mean or contracted, or which interrupted his designs. He was too generous, too confident, too untrammelled in his opinions. He was one of those kind of persons whom every one praises and loves, yet of whom, when in adversity, especially adversity arising from their own errors, people shrug up their shoulders and say—"I always knew he would turn out so."

He became attached to a young girl, very lovely in her person, and full of romance and affection. The preliminary affairs were soon arranged between themselves. Young C. T. of such disposition are not long in discovering each other's minds, and Charles embarked for South America, with the intention of settling his affairs there, seeing his parents, obtaining their sanction to his union, and establishing himself in business here. I saw him step into the little boat, to be conveyed on board the ship which lay off in the bay. The song of the sailors, as they hoisted the sails, came softened to us over the water. The vessel stirred like some stupendous creature, slowly unfurling its giant wings for a long and perilous flight. He spoke no word as he grasped me by the hand, but turned away his face—

"And even then, his eye being big with tears,
Turning his face he put his hand behind him,
And, with affection wondrous sensible,
He wrung Bassanio's hand, and so they parted."

Several months elapsed and no tidings. Then came vague reports of his having been seen at a ball, dancing with a Spanish girl, of great wealth and dazzling beauty—of his serenades—his poetry to her—the gratification of his parents at an alliance so splendid—his attachment—courtship—and, at length, from what every one termed an authentic source, though I could find no one to trace the report to its origin, we heard he was married. There was something so probable in the whole story, something so akin to the frailties of human nature, particularly as displayed in such a character, that gained it universal credit. Even I wrote him a letter, in which I wished him happiness, without upbraiding him with the cruel treachery which was lavished upon him from the lips of all around me. What confirmed my credit in the accounts received of him was his silence towards me and her. Not a line had reached us. He has yielded, I thought, to ambition, to wealth, to beauty, to parental wishes; he has been enervated by all the pleasures of which he was most fond; he has struggled feebly without a single adviser, against a current too powerful for him to resist; he will spend his life in South America or Europe, and is ashamed or afraid to think of the friends of his youth, or the consequences of an attachment cherished without the knowledge of his family, in the ardour and thoughtlessness of boyhood and inexperience. Many an older head has turned giddy without half the temptation. I mourned over the weakness of human nature, but my letter was full of kindness and friendship. The unfortunate object of his former attachment was not so philosophical in her feelings. Ah! how much more coolly we can reason and moralize about the distresses of others than our own! She died. I may not say of a broken heart, for sickness was upon her; but, in the delirium which preceded her dissolution, her secret disappointment and shame crossed her dreams, and her lips murmured wildly the weary and dark thoughts which had long been cherished in her bosom. That beautiful head—the rich hair parted upon that lovely forehead, and falling in bright ringlets over her neck—those crimson lips, whose smile was like a stream of sunshine from her soul, are all laid low, dark and silent in the dust, and here is the first letter from Charles. He has been sick, and nearly to death; but he says his disease at length yields to the careful treatment of his physician, and he is on the eve of embarking for this country, to fulfil the engagement with her whom he has never ceased to love. He says he has written frequently to her and myself, and wonders at our silence, but adds—the country is so unsettled that there is no security for the safe transportation of letters, and does not suffer himself to doubt for a moment her fidelity. He grows gradually warm with anticipations of the meeting, and draws a picture of happiness which, when I reflect on his sensitiveness, his proneness to feel all these terrible bereavements, and even to exaggerate them, makes me tremble.

EPISTOLARY CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTERS FROM RUSSIA,

To a gentleman of this city.

NUMBER NINE.

St. Petersburg, 1830.

HAVING returned to the Nevesky convent for our fourth departure, I shall set you down on the Court-quay. This you will perceive from your map, is (excepting the interruption of the intervening Admiralty, enclosing the river's brink,) but a continuation, with greater splendour, of the English Line I have described to you. It changes its name in honour of the residence of the court, and of the number of palaces that front the beautiful Neva, and form the magnificent street that stretches three half miles or more from our starting point up the left bank. At the head of this noble line, and separated from the Admiralty by a wide street, or rather open space, stands the Winter Palace—the town residence of his imperial majesty. This may be termed a poser, for its dimensions are no less than four hundred and fifty by three hundred and fifty feet, and, as you will see, it is nearly quadrangular. The first stage is of Ionic and the second of Corinthian columns. Numerous statues stud the roof; and, when the emperor is in town, the imperial flag is seen waving from a tall standard, in long and graceful folds, above the crowning turrets. The palace may be said to have two façades, the broad Neva and Court-quay fronting one, and an open square, with the sweeping semi-circle of the Étât-major, the other: with so much open space around, it shows to great advantage; and, notwithstanding its heavy architecture, presents a grand and magnificent aspect. But you must not suppose that the Emperor Nicholas requires any such dimensions as I have stated his palace to possess to turn round in; no, no, he is not so large a man as all that; though he rules sixty millions of subjects, and his dominions stretch across one hemisphere and largely intrude on another, he is quite contented with a suite of rooms in the second story of the south-west corner of this huge pile, from the windows of which he has a delightful view of a clear expanse of water, and the splendid rows that form the town; leaving the rest of the building for his beautiful private chapel, with its glistening spire, the affairs of state, the quarters of officers, and soldiers, and servants, a large carriage depot, and stables for a numerous stud. It is a small city within itself, and I presume to say, that not less than twelve to fifteen hundred persons are constantly lodged here; and it is an every day sight to see whole companies of guards issue from the basement story at the tap of the drum, and pass muster in the large inner court. The hall in which the court masquerades are given is of great length, but that of St. George surpasses it in magnificence. It is in this hall that foreign ambassadors are received, and the imperial crown, the sceptre, and jewels are guarded. The Hermitage is a separate palace, of considerable length, connected to the winter residence by a gallery that arches the intervening street. The riches and treasures of art that are here contained are immense, and a thin quarto would be hardly sufficient to enumerate them. The paintings alone amount to more than four thousand, among which are many of the rare originals of the Italian, Flemish, and Spanish schools, with numerous full-length copies of the chefs d'œuvres of the great masters, by Russian artists, and they certainly show much cleverness on the part of the copyists. The French acknowledge that the Hermitage may well compare with their own boasted Louvre; and an intelligent Italian artist assured me he had visited one room alone every good day for successive weeks with renewed satisfaction, and that the most numerous and best specimens of the Spanish school that he had found out of Spain, were here exhibited. The library contains one hundred and fifteen thousand volumes; and the number of engravings, cameos, gems, and casts of gems, with other curiosities, seemed innumerable. The Raphael Gallery is two hundred and ten feet long, and overspread with the frescos of the Vatican, on the same scale as the originals at Rome; and in another room are the portraits by Dawe, an eminent English artist, of the imperial family, and the general officers of the memorable campaigns of Moscow, Leipsic, and Paris. Wellington being by title a Russian field-marshal, occupies, with his Moscovite uniform and prominent Roman nose, a conspicuous place among these proud warriors. From one of the third stories you issue into a spacious hanging garden, with flowers and plants, gravelled walks, and singing-birds. This was the work of Catherine the second, and rises in imitation of those that flourished some thousand years ago in mighty Babylon. Here it was, in an adjoining hall, that she gave her splendid winter parties. The garden was then lighted up, and thrown open to the astonished visitant, who, notwithstanding a range of twenty to thirty degrees of frost without, could here make his promenade in a moderate summer heat, and among shrubbery and flowers, shaded by the orange and citron: the scene must have been really enchanting.

As we have at last fairly arrived at the residence of the imperial family, you may naturally expect an introduction to its present august inmates, and this I flatter myself I shall be able to give you from having often seen them, and in a variety of situations. The present emperor, Nicholas, is the third son of Paul, and ascended the throne upon the death of Alexander in place of Constantine, who, by his own voluntary act, renounced the crown. He is now about thirty-five years of age, nearly six feet in height, finely formed, and possesses a commanding and martial air. His hair is of a light brown, his eyes blue and penetrating, with manly regular features, that without flattery may be called handsome. His predominant expression is stern severity, which I cannot but think in a great measure assumed, especially when in view of the army, as no one can be more amiable among his friends, or when surrounded by his charming family. His mind is highly cultivated, leaning to the military and more exact sciences; and, in addition to his own, he speaks the English, French, and German languages with great fluency. He has personally visited most of the European kingdoms, and takes care to inform himself accurately of the affairs of the world by a subscription to the leading foreign journals and periodicals, which are carefully marked and perused for his benefit. Nor has he failed to acquire what is of more immediate consequence to him, a complete and thorough knowledge of the resources of his own empire; the full development of which, as fast as circumstances will admit, is the constant aim of his policy. The naval seems a favourite department with him; and you will recollect his having lately purchased a sloop of war and a superb American merchantman, which he pronounced the most beautiful ships he had ever seen, for models, and in addition, sent intelligent officers across the Atlantic, to inspect our ships, and familiarize themselves with our system. The easy amiability of Alexander in his latter years left much to the caprice and negligence of favourites; but, since his accession to the throne, Nicholas has applied himself, with increased exertions, to a more strict and better organization of the empire, and seems to wish that the laws, and not the arbitrary will of the sovereign, should alone rule. He is a munificent patron of literature, science, and the arts, more especially those of the useful kind, and is doing much for the spread of education among his subjects, by the establishment of schools on the Lancasterian plan; indeed, from the means that I have of judging, I should think his measures as liberal as his subjects can at present bear, and I have no doubt but his reign will prove highly beneficial to the empire. Meanwhile he has a difficult task to legislate for a licentious nobility on the one hand, and a slavish barbarous peasantry on the other. His dress is always military, and usually that of a plain general-officer, with the fewest decorations possible—a chapeau-de-bras, with a short black feather, small sword, and high military boots and spurs. He frequently rides out, sometimes on horseback, but more generally in an open barouche with four horses, his only attendant a footman standing up behind; and as he rapidly passes the streets, the people take off their hats, the emperor returning the salutation by lifting his hand to his forehead, in the military style.

The empress is an elegant woman, rather above the middle height, of pleasing regular features, and great amiability of expression. She is the direct patroness of the benevolent institutions of the empire, and personally superintends several that are established within the city and its precincts. She is the daughter of Frederic of Prussia, and must be something younger than the emperor. Possessing the attributes of her angelic mother, much kindness and goodness of heart, she is deservedly beloved and esteemed by all who know her. The imperial couple were early married, as much from mutual affection as policy, and are said to enjoy the greatest conjugal felicity, setting the best example, as husband and wife, to their numerous subjects. They have three children; the eldest, and heir to the throne, the Grand Duke Alexander, must be about twelve years of age. He is a charming boy, of good parts, possesses a fine open countenance, a most generous disposition, and is consequently a great favourite, especially among the soldiers. He is rigidly governed, and corrected of his faults, having no more indulgence than other children, and is receiving a thorough and systematic education. He is already chief of a regiment, and it is really pleasing to see how gallantly he heads his corps, and performs his evolutions. You will also frequently find him abroad in the streets, and as he passes along he salutes, with the greatest kindness and suavity of manner, the people, who crowd around for a gaze at their future sovereign.

For the Mirror.

THE PAST.

BY THYRZA.

THOU land, once ours, which never more
By aught but memory shall be trod,
Whose pilgrim feet still linger o'er
Thy wild and haunted sod—
Oh! let my spirit now recall
Thy scenes which rise in freshness yet,
Live o'er thy vanished hours, and all
The present gloom forget!
Yes, once again in thought I'll tread
Thy world, of dreamy phantoms full;
Gaze on thy sky, with light o'erspread,
And fragrant flow'rets curl—
The flowers that on my desert path
Shall bloom no more—the sunny sky
O'er which the gathering tempest hath
So long frowned heavily.
Oh! let thy mellowed radiance fall,
Like light from painted windows shed,
Upon my darken'd soul, with all
The lustre long since fled!
They come—they rise in beauty yet,
The forms that made thee fairy land;
At every step hath memory met
Some spirit bright and bland—
The lips, whose gentle words were fraught
To me with music sweet and low,
And cheeks, that from my presence caught
A brighter, richer glow—
And eyes, whose glances soft and bright
No more on me their beams shall pour,
And smiles, once mine, whose sunny light
Shall fall on me no more—
And, fraught with friendship's fervency,
Sweet voices, rich and deep and clear,
Whose well-remembered melody
I never more shall hear—
All, all are there!—the gloom, the blight,
Coldness and change, which time hath wrought,
Have vanished now from memory's sight,
From memory's truant thought.
A spell hath riveted my sight
Upon the past—hope vainly turns
To where the future's meteor light
In distant brightness burns.
Oh! who can tell, when time shall raise
The veil which gives the future grace,
If smiles or frowns shall meet his gaze
On her discovered face?
There's nought in dim futurity
To recompense me for the past;
Can she bring joys as dear to me
As those that fled so fast?
Ah, no! though hope may dawn at last,
And though the future promise fair,
Still must I cling unto the past,
My heart—my heart is there!

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

SONG.

If thou shouldst deem thy vow
A fable traced in air,
I will not stoop my brow,
Nor cease to braid my hair:
I will not mourn thy guile
A month, a week, a day;
But on thy folly smile,
And laugh my care away.

When eve is in the west,
And wandering bird and bee
Come weary home to rest,
And none are far but thee,—
There shall not breathe a tone
Of sadness through my lay:
As heedless thou art flown,
I'll sing my care away.

NATURAL DREAD OF DEATH.

BY CHANNING.

It seems to us strange, it seems as if all were wrong, in a world where, from the very constitution of things, death must close every scene of human life, where it hath reigned for ages over all generations, where the very air we breathe and the dust we tread upon was once animated life—it seems to us most strange and wrong, that this most common, necessary expedient, and certain of all events, should bring such horror and desolation with it; that it should bring such tremendous agitation, as if it were some awful and unprecedented phenomenon; that it should be more than death—a shock, a catastrophe, a convulsion: as if nature, instead of holding on its steady course, were falling into irretrievable ruins.

And that which is strange is our strangeness to this event. Call sickness, we repeat, call pain, an approach to death. Call the weariness and failure of the limbs and senses, call decay, dying. It is so; it is a gradual loosening of the cords of life, and a breaking up of its reservoirs and resources. So shall they all, one and another, give way. "I feel"—will the thoughtful man say—"I feel the pang of suffering, as it were, piercing and cutting asunder, one by one, the fine and invisible bonds that hold me to the earth. I feel the gushing current of life within me to be wearing away its own channels. I feel the sharpness of every keen emotion, and of every acute and far penetrating thought, as if it were shortening the moments of the soul's connexion and conflict with the body." So it is, and so it shall be, till at last, "the silver cord is loosened, and the golden bowl is broken, and the pitcher is broken at the fountain, and the wheel is broken at the cistern, and the dust returns to the earth as it was, and the spirit returns unto God who gave it."

No; it is not a strange dispensation. Death is the fellow of all that is earthly; the friend of man alone. It is not an anomaly; it is not a monster in the creation. It is the law, and the lot of nature.

"Not to thy eternal resting-place,
Shalt thou retire alone,
Thou shalt lie down
With patriarchs of the infant world—with kings
The powerful of the earth, the wise, the good,
Fair forms, and hoary seers of ages past,
All in one mighty sepulchre.—The hills
Rock-ribb'd and ancient as the sun,—the vales
Stretching in pensive quietness between;
The venerable woods—rivers that move
In majesty, and the complaining brooks,
That make the meadows green; and pour'd round all,
Old Ocean's gray and melancholy waste,—
Are but the solemn decorations all
Of the great tomb of man."

But of what is it the tomb? Does the spirit die? Do the blest affections of the soul go down into the dark and silent grave? Oh! no. "The narrow house, and pall, and breathless darkness," and funeral train—these belong not to the soul. They proclaim only the body's dissolution. They but celebrate the vanishing away of the shadow of existence. Man does not die, though the forms of popular speech thus announce his exit. He does not die. We bury, not our friend, but only the form, the vehicle in which, for a time, our friend lived. That cold, impassive clay, is not the friend, the parent, the child, the companion, the cherished being. No, it is not; blessed be God that we can say—It is not! It is the material world only that earth claims. It is "dust" only that "descends to dust." The grave! let us break its awful spell, its dread dominion. It is the place where man lays down his weakness, his infirmity, his diseases, and sorrows, that he may rise up to a new and glorious life. It is the place where man ceases—in all that is frail and decaying—ceases to be man, that he may be, in glory and blessedness, an angel.

Why, then, should we fear death, save as the wicked fear, and must fear it? Why dread to lay down this frail body in its resting-place, and this weary aching head on the pillow of its repose? Why tremble at this—that in the long sleep of the tomb, the body shall suffer disease no more, and pain no more, and hear no more the cries of want nor the groans of distress—and far retired from the turmoil of life, that violence and change shall pass lightly over it, and the elements shall beat and the storms shall sigh unheard around its lowly bed? Say, ye aged and infirm, is it the greatest of evils to die? Say, ye children of care and toil! say, ye afflicted and tempted! is it the greatest of evils to die?

Oh! no. Come the last hour, in God's own time—and a good life and a glorious hope shall make it welcome. Come the hour of release—and affliction shall make it welcome. Come the hour of re-union with the loved and lost on earth—and the passionate yearnings of affections, and the strong aspirations of faith, shall bear us to their blessed land. Come death, to this body—this burdened, tempted, frail, failing, dying body—and to the soul, come freedom, light, and joy unceasing—come the immortal life! "He that liveth," saith the conqueror over the devil, "he that liveth and believeth in me shall never die."

THE FIRST OF MAY IN NEW-YORK.

A COMIC ANNUAL.

The chroniclers of England have handed down the doings of the good old times—the by-gone merriments of their May-day. But the antics of antiquity were grave matters, when compared to the joyances of the first day of May in New-York, when the comic annual custom of removing from one dwelling to another takes place.

On that day the maiden queen of an ancient May-day pageant never danced round the May-pole more feateously than a modern matron waltzes round a broom-handle. She then becomes a queen of the chess-board, and the rule of precedent hath conceded to her the privilege of moving into any square or place she pleases, assuming for her the usual prerogative of the sex, whether conceded or usurped, to dictate; and wo to the wedded knight who presumes to check mate!

On that day the parvique Penates, the presiding deities over the goods and chattels of the Manhattoes, bustle about like bees driven out of their hives by smoke, swarming, upon the eve of their migration, to the melody of the poker and frying-pan that sound "the gathering." Day-light scarcely looks upon the city, when mistresses and maids are seen listening laughingly to the stories of the carmen, who, like a bridge-builder, is preparing to drive his piles; and then they think of the Roman prophetess, and pay devotion to the carmen-tales, from the first to the fourth story.

That day is the jolly anniversary of general locomotion; the laughing birthday of domestic mutability; the yearly holiday of the household gods; the carnival of dusty-carpet, which are, like drugs,

"When taken, to be well shaken!"

It is the very festival of furniture, when the lowest deputy of the lowest follower of Day and Martin is liable to be promoted to the charge of some high post-bedstead, and under his management, in the middle of the domestic drama, down goes the curtain. Each chamber becomes a club-room, in which every member takes the chair. On the said first of May, as on the fourth of March, the tables are frequently turned, secretaries are removed from the home department, and cabinets lose their places.

Then window-panes and counter-panes are afflicted with a wet season. It is a day of ups and downs, of pulling, packing, and pinning up; of taking, tearing, and tying down. Chimney-flues and chamber-floors receive their sweeps. Then executions are expected in every house, for the paper in the upper rooms, the pictures in the parlour, the bells in the basement story, are all waiting to be hung, and the cart is at the door.

But before the maiden mansion with its bridal wall dressed in white, to which the white-wash brush has given a carte-blanche, receives company, the overloaded cart-noir is accidentally upset in the street! Momus goes into half-mourning, lots of little ragged rogues celebrate in merry sadness the scene of comic annual mischief, and the injured spirit of one of the Lares seems to shriek out, as a stream of molasses gurgles from a broken bottle, "Ubi lapsus!" which, freely translated, is rendered, "your boy laps us."

Then hogs have their essoin, the cart-horse is thrown upon the curb, and clothes-horses are broken upon the wheel. Old jugs, like old jokes, are cracked at their owners' expense, sofas lose their castors, and castors forsake their cruets, tumblers throw summersets, plates are dished; bellows, like bankrupts, can raise the wind no more, dog-irons go to pot, and pots go to the dogs; spiders are on the fly, a safe is not safe, the deuce is played with the tray, straw-beds are down. It is the spring with cherry-trees, but the fall with cherry tables, for they lose their leaves, and candlesticks their branches. The whole family of the brushes—hearth, hair, hat, clothes, flesh, tooth, nail, crumb, and blacking, are brushing off. Books, like ships, are outward bound; Scott's novels become low works, Old Mortality is in the dust, and Kenilworth is worthless in the kennel. Presidential pamphlets are paving the way for new candidates, medical tracts become treatises on the stone, naval tacticians descend to witness the novelty of American flags having been put down, and the advocates of liberality in thought, word, and deed, is gaining ground. Then wooden ware is everywhere. Pails are without the pale of preservation, and the tale of a tub, at which the washerwoman wrings her hands, in broken accents tells

"Of most disastrous chances,
Of moving accidents by flood and field,
That wind up the travel's history"

of a New-York comic annual celebration.

Comic Annual.

SINGLE BLESSEDNESS.

The following extract from an article in the Edinburgh Literary Journal is worthy the perusal of all, but more especially of the young. It is from the pen of a lady.

"I have met with very few unmarried ladies who have not appeared to me to feel, after the age of thirty, that their existence was thoroughly comfortless and wretched. Many have I heard express it openly, and that such is the fact can very easily be discovered by an accurate observer of the human countenance. It is also certain, that three out of five of the young English ladies of the present day must remain unmarried; because no man can exist on less than two thousand a year, when married; and how few young men there are with two thousand a year, compared with the number of young ladies! Five, six, eight, sometimes, in one family, generally all tolerably pretty, and most of them pleasing and accomplished women—many possessing talents of no ordinary stamp—yet perhaps in our salons these lovely and accomplished beings are completely neglected by the other sex, 'because,' (I must repeat the sentiment I have heard from thousands of young men of fashion,) 'I never talk to girls—I dare not pay any attention to unmarried women, because I am not a marrying man. Mr. — flirted with so and so, and was accused of behaving so—I don't like to excite false hope—I shall never marry, unless I can find a wife with at least two or three thousand a year, because I am much richer, unmarried, with the fortune I have.'"

"It is of no use to quarrel with the state of society as it is at present constituted, for we cannot alter it; but I think it might be beneficial to give a few hints on the education of women, which might, perhaps, be useful in procuring them, in a state of single blessedness, as it is very falsely called, a greater share of happiness, or a less load of misery than they at present appear to possess after the awful age of thirty."

"A girl at thirty is called an old maid; she goes to a ball, and generally sits neglected all the evening, or dances with some gentleman who has been often asked to dine at her father's house, and who perhaps remarks, Miss — is rather passé, a good old girl, and I must do my duty here; and now I shall dance with the beautiful Miss —. My heart always bleeds for the mortifications I see endured by these poor girls continually. There are certainly some single women whose talents have made them as much considered as they ought to be, but then I have generally observed that they have had fortunes, or have had advantages above others to bring them into notice, and to give to the natural ambition of the human species some scope of action."

"I will suppose a case in which there are four girls—a moderate proportion in one family—and two sons; and I will suppose their father possessed of fifteen hundred a year. The estate, of course, goes to the eldest son; the second must be a clergyman if his relations have any preferment, or he must be of some profession: of course he never marries without a large fortune—unless, at the age of forty-five, he has made one for himself. The eldest son having been to Eton and Cambridge, has learnt that fifteen hundred a year is nothing, and, in all probability, determines not to be taken in—not to marry any lovely girl without, at least, forty or fifty thousand pounds. I now come to my four young ladies. I will suppose one very pretty, one tolerably pretty, and the other two rather plain. They have been educated in all probability as the greater proportion of English girls are: first of all, they have a strong orthodox belief in the christian religion—go every Sunday to church—and are, as I conceive all, or nearly all, the class of moderately rich English gentry to be, perfectly honourable, upright, and well principled. It is only for their own happiness that I would propose any change in the education of a class for whom I entertain so high a respect.

"To return to the four young ladies. They have all been brought up with the idea that they will become wives and mothers, and are taught to cherish those natural affections which, if by some remote chance one out of the four ever does marry, make them so amiable and lovely as such. They are allowed to read modern novels, at least all such as are considered to have a moral tendency. Now I maintain that there is scarcely one of these works which does not impress any young woman with the idea that happiness can alone be found in love and marriage. The heroine is very amiable and perfect, surrounded with admirers, all contending for the honour of the slightest notice, but where is the novel which represents four pretty unnoticed girls, who are destined to pass their young years without, perhaps, so much as one admirer amongst them? Year after year passes—their bloom and beauty fade—and my four lovely and accomplished warm-hearted beings, having seen all their youthful castles fall one by one, become listless and unhappy. They have little in life to interest them; one dies; another lives for many years on arrow-root and calf's-foot-jelly, and is enveloped in flannel even in July; a third is under the care of Dr. S.; and perhaps the fourth, who is made of tougher materials, and born with less feeling than the others, or, perhaps, from having something to occupy her mind in preparing the arrow-root for one sister, and ordering the hard dumplings prescribed by Dr. S. for the other—outlives her sorrows and disappointments; and if she takes an interest in her brother's children, or a share in their education, or in something which gives vent to those affections which are implanted by nature in the breast of women, she becomes happy.

"This, then, appears to me to be the secret too much neglected in female education. Teach them by all means that one great source of happiness consists in the indulgence of virtuous affection; but do not teach them that there is no affection capable of producing this happiness, except such as may be felt for a lover or husband. If the heart be properly regulated, it may take a warm and sufficiently engrossing interest in many objects less intimately connected with it. Marriage is a sad lottery, and at the best, is a state full of cares and anxieties. Freedom and independence ought not to be lightly parted with, or set down as possessions of little value."

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

The view of the Bay and Harbour of New-York, taken from the Battery, which was intended to have accompanied this impression, is still in the hands of the artist; and, as we wish it to excel every other engraving published in this journal, we are unwilling to present it to the public until finished to his entire satisfaction. Our subscribers will be the gainers by this arrangement, and we therefore trust it will meet their approbation. The plate will appear in the twenty-eighth number.

Our country.—From every part of our extended and still extending confederacy, we have reiterated accounts of a surprising enlargement of numbers, wealth, and improvements. A rivalry of a most commendable and honourable character appears to have sprung up among the states, and each seems to be contending, with unabated zeal and earnestness, for the great prize of distinction and glory. It is doubtful, if at any period of time there has been a nation, its population and age considered, that combined such strong moral and physical powers, with so ample a theatre on which to display its unchecked energies. Untrammelled by the discouraging and debasing influence of tyranny or priestcraft; with political rights and privileges well defined and understood; enjoying a degree of liberty unknown to any other people in the world; the exclusive occupants of a territory unsurpassed in fertility and beauty, and of almost boundless extent—with such a rare union of advantages, it cannot be considered marvellous that we should move on in our appointed sphere with an impulse which enables us to outstrip every competitor, and leave all useless example and precedent behind us for the imitation of

we are with the details of projects of vast magnitude and utility, and the celerity with which many of them are accomplished, we had a very inadequate knowledge, or even conception, of their number and extent, until they were recently made known to us through the executive communications from the federal and state governments. Upon so comprehensive a scale are many of these plans formed, those especially which relate to canals, rail-roads, highways, aqueducts, tunnels, bridges, &c. all requiring the vigorous exercise of the highest powers of the mind, and the command of funds to the amount of many millions, that we have been astounded at the numerous facts which are spread before the community for their information, either by the general or local authorities. To give a mere sketch of these numerous works would require matter sufficient to fill a volume.

With such rapidity can a traveller now proceed from one point of the republic to another, by the agency of steam and commodious land vehicles, that in his movement he may be almost said to imitate a bird of passage; and when the public exigency calls for it, intelligence is transmitted through every channel of the country with a velocity that would seem to vie with the winds.

But wonderful as all this may appear, it is not more so than the rapid growth and extension of our cities, towns, villages, and new and prosperous settlements. The most indisputable evidences of great and growing riches, are the multiplied improvements and embellishments every where visible. The discovery of large quantities of the precious metals, added to the interrupted contributions from other countries; the opening of valuable mines of various descriptions, which are made subservient to the most useful purposes; the countless benefits accruing to the nation from an unrestrained intercourse between the states, and from the flourishing condition of agriculture, commerce, and the arts, which advance in their successful and bright career, with mutual indications of harmony and joy—are indubitable proofs of strength, vigour, capacity, and skill; and what is of infinite importance both to our character and our happiness, and what may be contemplated too with much complacency, if not with pride, are the number and thriving condition of our colleges, schools, and other seminaries of learning; the consequent dissemination of the light of truth and the advantages of refinement, accompanied with a general diffusion of a knowledge of the sciences, with something like a corresponding reward to men of genius and liberal acquirements.

The progress which, as a nation, we have made in the fulfillment of our allotment, has every where awakened a spirit of eager investigation and inquiry. Having the chief command of one of the divisions of the earth, and having reached that point on the score of numbers which gives us a high rank in the general estimate of mankind, embracing as a natural consequence, all the adequate means to effect any purpose however stupendous or wild; being happily placed at an immense distance from the jarring and conflicting elements of Europe, and holding out the strongest allurements to people of distant countries to seek a residence amongst us; assiduously cultivating the arts of peace, with an almost entire exemption from taxation; reposing in undisturbed tranquillity, and cherishing with zeal and warmth our free institutions—under circumstances so propitious, we have as much cause for gratulation, as we have for thankfulness to a benignant Providence. Nor is it strange that the subjects of other governments, feeling all the privations and cruel exactions emanating from long established authority, confirmed oppression, and the insolence of pride, should cast a wishful eye towards our favoured land, and be disposed to make many sacrifices in order to reach our peaceful shores. These things present the highest imaginable evidence that freedom of thought and action, and protection from wrong and outrage, are considerations outweighing all others; and they furnish a practical illustration of Franklin's noble maxim—"where liberty dwells, there is my country."

Christmas.—Again does the sound of hilarity break in upon the monotonous tones of life—again does the interchange of social feeling animate each countenance, and draw bands of brethren to join in the gay circle before the hospitable hearth. How delightful is the indulgence in such festive reciprocations of delight! How heartless and destructive to the happier impulses of human action the frigid policy which would put an end to their enjoyment! No—let every man, woman, and child improve so hallowed an occasion for innocent recreation, and after rendering up fervent thanks to the Author of all good, for the return of another glad season, participate innocently, but freely and cheerfully, in the general merry-making.

Elegant extract.—In the article from the Christian Examiner, are blended the compositions of two of the first writers which our country has yet produced. The one, as a didactic author, may justly take his rank with the highest names which adorn English literature, and the author of "Thanatopsis" may ensure his fame as coeval with the language in which his chaste and lofty moral aspirations have been poured forth.

Daily Sentinel.—Every day's experience convinces us more and more that the bigotry of infidelity is equally intolerant with that of the most superstitious sectarianism. The newspaper, of which the title precedes this article, is devoted to the advancement of the claims of the so called working men, and is conducted with considerable talent, and great apparent moderation. Yet there are subjects on which its real exclusive spirit will ever and anon break forth in the most strange and unaccountable terms. A public document cannot refer in the remotest degree to the existence of the Deity, or to those religious associations which are more or less identified with the earliest impressions of every well-educated man in the community, but its editors are sure to rail against the dangers of the union of church and state. Lafayette, because he has approved of a popular monarchy, is actually accused of imbecility and dotard submission to prejudice and error. 'The editor of the Mirror took an active and a lively part in the late celebration of the redemption of France—but one of his correspondents has questioned the durability of the revolutionary reformation'—so says the Sentinel—and, forsooth, we must be brought to task for allowing the very idea to be published, and are regularly served up in a communication as a sample of inconsistency! Things have come to a strange pass indeed, when a journalist is to exclude all matter from his columns that does not coincide in every respect, not merely with his own individual opinions, but also with the wishes of all his neighbours! The very charge is puerile—but it is also untenable, and we should not have noticed it, had it not been couched in decorous language—such as is not always used in modern editorial controversy. The Sentinel is mistaken as to our opinions—and, we are inclined to think, it likewise is as to the course most likely to advance the interests of its professed cause. Talents may be wasted on irreligion and heartless atheism, even more than they have ever been on the most destructive fanaticism.

Public dinners once more.—Our late remarks on this subject have been misunderstood in some quarters. We disclaim all particular allusions, and feel both surprise and regret that any one should have deemed them directed against the entertainment given to our respectable and deservedly esteemed fellow-citizen, the collector of this port. This will surely be admitted when we state the simple fact, that one of the articles was written a month before that circumstance took place. The observations were solely of a general nature, and were intended to apply to the publication of the toasts and speeches usually given on these occasions. We should be sorry to use the influence of our press, whatever it may be, for any other purpose than the public good, which was our only object. From a number of communications touching this matter we select the following, and insert it without comment:

To the Editor of the New-York Mirror.

SIR—I agree with you in the remarks in the last Mirror on the subject of public dinners. The publication of toasts and speeches, on ordinary occasions, is a custom "more honoured in the breach than the observance," and should be "reformed altogether." But your censure is not properly directed. It is seldom the fault of the guests, and the full tide of hilarity is often checked in persons who, like myself, are troubled with the unfashionable vice of modesty, by the apprehension that the outbreaks of the evening may stare them in the face the next morning at the breakfast table, amongst the horrid murders and last dying speeches, with which the vitiated taste of the reading public is gratified by those who cater for their amusement.

A good dinner is not a bad thing, and those even who rail against it are not often known to carry their opposition so far as to refuse an invitation to one. But it does not follow, by any means, that all the clever sayings, eloquent speeches, and patriotic discussions of the dinner table should be translated from the sanctum of convivial fellowship into the columns of a newspaper. Nay, if it be true, that "when the wine is in, the wit is out," the custom is fraught with danger to the wisest of us.

The evil you complain of arises from the desire of our editors that the minds of their readers,

"Students of change,
And pleased with novelty, may be instructed."

and as they are generally talented and agreeable gentlemen, you are pretty sure to find some of them at these solemn merry makings. An account of a dinner, with a tolerably long string of volunteer toasts, and the outstretching of an occasional word in Roman capitals, serves marvellously well to fill a column, and save the wear and tear of brains, incidental to the production of an original article of the same length.

MASTER SLENDER.

BRIGNAL BANKS.

AS SUNG IN THE OPERA OF ROKEYBY—WORDS BY SIR WALTER SCOTT—MUSIC BY DR. CLARKE.

Andante quasi Allegretto.

O Brig-nal banks are wild and fair, And Gre-ta woods are green, And you may ga-ther gar-lands there Would grace a sum-mer queen. And as I rode by Dal-ton hall, Be-neath the tur-ret high, A mai-den on the cas-tle wall, Was sing-ing, sing-ing mer-ri-ly, "O Brig-nal banks are fresh and fair, And Gre-ta woods are green; I'd ra-ther range with Ed-mund there, Than reign our Eng-lish queen."

SECOND VERSE.

"If, maiden, thou wouldst wend with me,
To leave both tow'r and town,
Thou first must guess what life lead we,
That dwell by dale and down;
And if thou canst that riddle read,
As read full well you may,
Then to the greenwood shalt thou speed.
As blithe as queen of May."
Yet sung she, "Brignal banks are fair,
And Greta woods are green;
I'd rather range with Edmund there,
Than reign our English queen."

THIRD VERSE.

"I read you by your bugle horn,
And by your palfrey good;
I read you for a ranger sworn,
To keep the king's greenwood."
"A ranger, lady, winds his horn,
And 'tis at peep of light;
His blast is heard at merry morn,
And mine at dead of night."
Yet sung she, "Brignal banks are fair,
And Greta woods are gay;
I would I were with Edmund there,
To reign his queen of May."

FOURTH VERSE.

"With burnish brand and musketoon.
So gallantly you come,
I read you for a bold dragon,
That lists the tuck of drum."
"I list no more the tuck of drum,
No more the trumpet hear;
But when the beetle sounds his hum,
My comrades take the spear.
And O, though Brignal banks be fair,
And Greta woods be gay;
Yet mickle must the maiden dare,
Would reign my queen of May."

FIFTH VERSE.

"Maiden, a nameless life I lead,
A nameless death I'll die,
The fiend, whose lantern lights the mead,
Were better mate than I;
And when I'm with my comrades met
Beneath the greenwood bough,
What once we were, we all forget,
Nor think what we are now.
Yet Brignal banks are fresh and fair,
And Greta woods are green,
And you may gather garlands there,
Would grace a summer queen."

Varieties.

THE ACACIA.—It is said that the Emperor Charles the fifth had four of these beautiful trees transported from America to Europe, in 1670, and planted one in Madrid, one in Vienna, one in Ghent, and one in Brussels. All died except the last, which, it is said, is now a fine tree, fifty feet high, and ten feet three inches in girth.

BEAUTY.—Cardinal Mazarin was an extremely handsome man, and had a very fine face; this he was so anxious to preserve, that, not many days before he died, he gave audience to the foreign ministers with his face painted.

COMPLIMENT TO THE LADIES.—Quin being asked by a lady why it was reported that there were more women in the world than men, he replied, "It is in conformity with the arrangements of nature, madam; we always see more of heaven than earth!"

AN EXPEDIENT.—It is not legal to sentence a Spanish nobleman to punishment for life, therefore the supreme court of Malaga have ordered a young noble, convicted of murder, to work in the galleys for one hundred years and a day.

GEOGRAPHICAL.—A school-boy in North Adams, Massachusetts, who was studying geography, was asked by his teacher whether in going from the Baltic sea to Portugal, he would pass through any straits. "Why, yes, sir," said the rapid student, "I should go as straight as I could."

FRIENDSHIP.—When I see leaves drop from their trees in the beginning of autumn, just such, think I, is the friendship of the world. While the sap of maintenance lasts, my friends swarm in abundance, but, in the winter of my need, they leave me naked. He is a happy man that hath a true friend at his need; but he is more truly happy that hath no need of his friends.

NEW MEDICINE.—It is stated, in a letter from Rome, that the French medical men in that city continue to administer, with great success against intermittent fevers, the bark of the willow. These gentlemen assert that it has more power than Peruvian bark.

TOKAY WINE.—Dr. Von Derchzer says, "I have drunk some Tokay wine that was forty years old, and which, on being poured into the glass, immediately filled the room with an aromatic ethereal odour." This is expressed con amore.

The gods are described by Homer as pledging each other in similar nectar, from golden vessels.

LIVING WITHOUT BRAINS.—As the late professor H. was walking near Edinburgh, he met one of those beings usually called fools. "Pray," said the professor, accosting him, "how long can a person live without brains?" "I dinna ken," replied the fellow, scratching his head; "pray, how long have you lived yourself, sir?"

The last, best fruit, which comes to late perfection, even in the kindest soul, is tenderness towards the hard, forbearance towards the unfortunate, warmth of heart towards the cold, and philanthropy towards the misanthropic.

At an evening party lately a gentleman handed his wife a glass of wine: some one asked her if it was Madeira, to which she replied, "I presume so, for it came from my deary."

KNICKERBOCKER HALL,

OR THE ORIGIN OF THE BAKER'S DOZEN.

[Translated from an ancient Dutch MS.]

LITTLE Brom Boomptie, or Boss Boomptie, as he was commonly called by his apprentices and neighbours, was the first man that ever baked new-year cakes in the good city of New-Amsterdam. It is generally supposed that he was the inventor of those excellent and respectable articles. However this may be, he lived and prospered in the little Dutch house in William-street, called, time out of mind, Knickerbocker Hall, just at the outskirts of the good town of New-Amsterdam.

Boomptie was a fat comfortable creature, with a capital pair of old-fashioned legs; a full, round, good-natured face; a corporation like unto one of his plump loaves; and as much honesty as a Turkish baker, who lives in the fear of having his ears nailed to his own door for retailing bad bread. He wore a low crowned, broad-brimmed beaver; a gray bearskin cloth coat, waistcoat, and breeches, and gray woollen stockings, summer and winter, all the year round. The only language he spoke, understood, or had the least respect for, was Dutch—and the only books he ever read or owned, were a Dutch Bible, with silver clasps and hinges, and a Dutch history of the duke of Alva's bloody wars in the low countries. Boss Boomptie was a pious man, of simple habits and simple character; a believer in "demonology and witchcraft," and as much afraid of spooks as the mother that bred him. It ran in the family to be bewitched, and for three generations the Boompties had been very much pestered with supernatural visitations. But for all this they continued to prosper in the world, inasmuch that Boss Boomptie daily added a piece of wampum or two to his strong box. He was blessed with a good wife, who saved the very pairings of her nails, and three plump boys, after whom he modelled his gingerbread babies, and who were every Sunday zealously instructed never to pass a pin without picking it up and bringing it home to their mother.

It was new-year's eve, in the year 1655, and the good city of New-Amsterdam, then under the special patronage of the blessed St. Nicholas, was as jovial and wanton as hot spiced rum, and long abstinence from fun and frolic could make it. It is worth while to live soberly and mind our business all the rest of the year, if it be only to enjoy the holidays at the end with a true zest. St. Nicholas—thrice blessed soul! was riding up one chimney and down another like a locomotive engine in his little one horse waggon, distributing cakes to the good boys, and whips to the bad ones; and the laugh of the good city, which had been pent up all the year, now burst forth with an explosion that echoed even unto Breuckelen and Communipaw.

Boss Boomptie, who never forgot the main chance, and knew from experience that new-year's eve was a shrewd time for selling cakes, joined profit and pleasure on this occasion. He was one minute in his shop, dealing out cakes to his customers, and the next laughing, and tipping, and jiggling, and frisking it with his wife and children in the little back room, the door of which had a pane of glass that commanded a free view of the shop. Nobody, that is, no genuine disciple of jolly St. Nicholas, ever went to bed on new-year's eve. The Dutch are eminently a sober discreet folk; but some how or other, no people frolic so like the very dickens when they are once let loose, as your very sober and discreet bodies.

By twelve o'clock the spicy beverage, sacred to holidays at that time, began to mount up into Boss Boomptie's head, and he was vociferating a Dutch ditty in praise of St. Nicholas with marvellous discordance, when just as the old clock in one corner of the room struck the hour that ushers in the new-year, a loud knock was heard on the counter, which roused the dormant spirit of trade within his bosom. He went into the shop, where he found a little ugly old thing of a woman, with a sharp chin, resting on a crooked black stick, which had been burnt in the fire and then polished; two high sharp cheek-bones; two sharp black eyes; skinny lips, and a most diabolical pair of leather spectacles on a nose ten times sharper than her chin.

"I want a dozen new-year cookies," screamed she in a voice sharper than her nose.

"Vel den you need'nt speak so loud," replied Boss Boomptie, whose ear being just then attuned to the melody of his own song, was somewhat outraged by this shrill salutation.

"I want a dozen new-year cookies," screamed she again, ten times louder and shriller than ever.

"Duyvel—I ant teaf den," grumbled the worthy man, as he proceeded to count out the cakes, which the other very deliberately counted after him.

"I want a dozen," screamed the little woman; "here is only twelve."

"Vel den, and what de duyvel is twelf put a dozen," said Boomptie.

"I tell you I want one more," screamed she in a voice that roused Mrs. Boomptie in the back room, who came and peeped through the pane of glass, as she often did when she heard the boss talking to the ladies.

Boss Boomptie waxed wroth, for he had a reasonable quantity of hot spiced rum in his noddle, which predisposed a man to valour.

"Vel den," said he, "you may co to de duyvel and get anoder, for you won't get it here."

Boomptie was not a stingy man; on the contrary, he was very generous to the pretty young damsels who came to buy cakes, and often gave them two or three extra for a smack, which made Mrs. Boomptie peevish sometimes, and caused her to watch at the little pane of glass when she ought to have been minding her business like an honest woman.

But this old hag was as ugly as sin, and the little baker never in his whole life could find in his heart to be generous to an ugly woman, old or young.

"In my country they always give thirteen to the dozen," screamed the ugly old woman in the leather spectacles.

"And where de duyvel is your gountry?" asked Boomptie.

"It is nobody's business," screeched the old woman. "But will you give me another cake, once for all?"

"Not if it would save me and all my chineration from peeing pewitched and pedemonologized time out of mind," cried he in a great passion.

What put it into his head to talk in this way I don't know, but he might better have held his tongue. The old woman gave him three stivers for his cakes, and went away, grumbling something about "living to repent it," which Boss Boomptie did not understand or care a fig about. He was chock full of Dutch courage, and defied all the ugly old women in christendom. He put his three stivers in the till and shut up his shop, determined to enjoy the rest of the night without further molestation.

While he was sitting smoking his pipe, and now and then sipping his beverage, all at once he heard a terrible jingling of money in his shop, whereupon he thought some local caitiff was busy with his little till. Accordingly, priming himself with another reinforcement of Dutch courage, he took a pine knot, for he was too economical to burn candles at that late hour, and proceeded to investigate. His money was all safe, and the till appeared not to have been disturbed.

"Duyvel," quoth the little baker man, "I believe mine trouw and I have bote cot a zinging in our heads."

He had hardly turned his back when the same jingling began again, so much to the surprise of Boss Boomptie, that had it not been for his invincible Dutch courage he would, as it were, have been a little frightened. But he was not in the least; and again went and unlocked the till, when what was his astonishment to see the three diabolical stivers, received from the old woman, dancing and kicking up a dust among the coppers and wampum, with wonderful agility.

"Haggens Von Swoschagin!" exclaimed he, sorely perplexed, "de old duyvel has cot into dat old sinner's stivers, I tink." He had a great mind to throw them away, but he thought it a pity to waste so much money; so he kept them locked up all night, enjoining them to good behaviour, with a design to spend them the next day in another jollification. But the next day they were gone, and so was the broomstick, with which it was the custom to sweep out the shop every morning. Some of the neighbours coming home late the night before, on being informed of the "abduction" of the broomstick, deposed and said, they had seen an old woman, riding through the air upon just such another, right over the top of the little bake-house; whereat Boss Boomptie, putting these odds and ends together, did tremble in his heart, and he wished to himself that he had given the ugly old woman thirteen to the dozen.

Nothing particular came to pass the next day, except that now and then the little Boompties complained of having pins stuck in their backs, and that their cookies were snatched away by some one unknown. On examination it was found that no marks of the pins were to be seen; and as to the cookies, the old black woman of the kitchen declared she saw an invisible hand, just as one of the children lost his commodity.

"Den I am pewitched, sure enough!" cried Boomptie, in despair, for he had had too much of "demonology and witchcraft" in the family not to know when he saw them, just as well as he did his own face in the Collect.

On the second day of the year, the 'prentice boys all returned to their business, and Boomptie once more solaced himself with the baking of the staff of life. The reader must know that it is the custom of bakers to knead a great batch at a time, in a mighty bread-tray, into which they throw two or three little apprentice boys to paddle about, like ducks in a mill pond, whereby it is speedily amalgamated, and set to rising in due time. When the little caitiffs began their gambols in this matter they one and all stuck fast in the dough, as though it had been so much pitch, and, to the utter dismay of honest Boomptie, behold the whole batch rose up in a mighty mass, with the boys sticking fast on the top of it!

"Der dapperheed updragon!" exclaimed little Boomptie, as he witnessed this catastrophe; "de duyvel ish got into de yeast dis time, I tink."

The bread continued to rise till it lifted the roof off the bake-house, with the little 'prentice boys on the top, and the bread-tray following after. Boss Boomptie and his wife watched this wonderful rising of the bread in dismay, and in proof of the poor woman being bewitched, it was afterwards recollected that she uttered not a single word on this extraordinary occasion. The bread rose and rose, until it finally disappeared, boys and all, behind the Jersey hills. If such things had been known of at that time it would have been taken for a balloon; as it was, the people of Bergen and Communipaw thought that it was a water-spout.

Little Boss Boomptie was disconsolate at the loss of his bread and his 'prentice boys, who he never expected to see again. However, he was a stirring body, and set himself to work to prepare another batch, seeing his customers must be supplied in spite of "witchcraft or demonology." To guard against such another rebellious rising, he determined to go through the process down in the cellar, and turn his bread-tray upside down. The bread instead of rising began to sink into the earth so fast, that Boss Boomptie had just time to jump off before it entirely disappeared in the ground, which opened and shut just like a snuff-box.

"Myt de stamme van dam!" exclaimed he, out of breath, "my bread rises to-wards dis time, I tink. My customers must go without to-day."

By and by his customers came for hot rolls and muffins, but some of them had gone up and some down, as little Boss Boomptie related after the manner just described. What is very remarkable, nobody believed him; and doubtless if there had been any rival baker in New-Amsterdam, the boss would have lost all his customers. Among those that called on this occasion was the ugly old woman with the sharp eyes, nose, chin, voice, and leather spectacles.

"I want a dozen new-year cookies!" screamed she as before.

"De Geude Schiwyer Torgouldigit beest!" muttered he, as he counted out the twelve cakes.

"I want one more!" screamed she.

"Den you may co to de duyvel and kit it, I say, for not anoder shall you have here, I tell you."

So the old woman took her twelve cakes, and went out, grumbling as before. All the time she staid Boomptie's old dog, who followed him wherever he went, growled and whined, as it were, to himself, and seemed mightily relieved when she went away. That very night, as the little baker was going to see one of his old neighbours at the Maiden's Valley, then a little way out of town, walking, as he always did, with his hands behind him, every now and then he felt something as cold as death against them, which he could never account for, seeing there was not a soul with him but his old dog. Moreover, Mrs. Boomptie having bought half a pound of tea at a grocery-store, and put it into her pocket, did feel a twitching and jerking of the paper of tea in her pocket every step she went. The faster she ran the quicker and stronger was the twitching and jerking, so that when the good woman got home she was nigh fainting away. On her recovery she took courage, and pulled the tea out of her pocket, and laid it on the table, when behold it began to move by fits and starts, jumped off the table, hopped out of doors, all alone by itself, and jugged away to the place from whence it came. The grocer brought it back again, but Madame Boomptie looked upon the whole as a judgment for her extravagance, in laying out so much money for tea, and refused to receive it again. The grocer assured her that the strange capers of the bundle were owing to his having forgot to cut the twine with which he had tied it; but the good woman looked upon this as an ingenious subterfuge, and would take nothing but her money. When the husband and wife came to compare notes, they both agreed they were certainly bewitched. Had there been any doubt of the matter, subsequent events would soon have put it to rest.

That very night Mrs. Boomptie was taken after a strange way. Sometimes she would laugh about nothing, and then she would cry about nothing; then she would set to work and talk about nothing for a whole hour without stopping, in a language nobody could understand; and then all at once her tongue would cleave to the roof of her mouth so that it was impossible to force it away. When this fit was over she would get up and dance double-trouble, till she tired herself out, when she fell asleep, and waked up quite rational. It was particularly noticed that when she talked loudest and fastest her lips remained perfectly closed, and without motion, or her mouth wide open, so that the words seemed to come from down her throat. Her principal talk was railing against Dominie Laidlie, the good pastor of Garden-street church, whence every body concluded she was possessed by a devil. Sometimes she got hold of a pen, and though she had never learned to write, would scratch and scrawl certain mysterious and diabolical figures, that nobody could understand, and every body said must mean something.

As for little Boss Boomptie he was worse off than his wife. He was haunted by an invisible hand, which played him all sorts of scurvy tricks. Standing one morning at his counter, talking to one of the neighbours, he received a great box on the ear, wherest being exceedingly wroth, he returned it with such interest on the cheek of his neighbour, that he laid him flat on the floor. His friend hereupon took the law of him, and proved to the satisfaction of the court that he had both hands in his breeches pockets at the time Boss Boomptie said he gave him the box on the ear. The magistrate not being able to come at the truth of the matter, fined them each twenty-five guilders for the use of the dominie.

A dried codfish was one day thrown at his head, and the next minute his walking-stick fell to beating him, though nobody seemed to have hold of it. A chair danced about the room, and at last lighted on the dinner-table, and began to eat with such a good appetite, that had not the children snatched some of the dinner away, there would have been none left. The old cow one night jumped over the moon, and a pewter dish ran fairly off with a horn spoon, which seized a cat by the tail, and away they all went together, as merry as crickets. Sometimes, when Boss Boomptie had money, or cakes, or perhaps a loaf of bread in his hand, instead of putting them in their proper places, he would throw them into the fire, in spite of his teeth, and then the invisible hand would beat him with a bag of flour, till he was as white as a miller. As for keeping his accounts, that was out of the question; whenever he sat himself down to write his ink-horn was snatched away by the invisible hand, and by-and-by it would come tumbling down the chimney. Sometimes an old dish-cloth would be pinned to the skirt of his coat, and then a great diabolical laugh heard under the floor. At night he had a pretty time of it. His night-cap was torn off his head, his hair pulled out by handfuls, his face scratched, and his ears pinched as if with a red hot pincers. If he went out in the yard at night, he was pelted with brickbats, sticks, stones, and all sorts of filthy missives; and if he staid at home, the ashes were blown upon his supper; and old shoes, instead of plates, seen on the table. One of the frying-pans rang every night of itself for a whole hour, and a three-pronged fork stuck itself voluntarily into Boss Boomptie's back, without hurting him in the least. But what astonished the neighbours more than all, the little man, all at once, took to speaking in a barbarous and unknown jargon, which was afterwards found out to be English.

These matters frightened some of the neighbours and scandalized others, until at length poor Boomptie's shop was almost deserted. People were jealous of eating his bread, for fear of being bewitched. Nay, more than one little urchin complained grievously of horrible, out-of-the-way pains in the stomach, after eating two or three dozen of his new-year cookies.

Things went on in this way until Christmas-eve came round again, when Boss Boomptie was sitting behind his counter, which was wont to be thronged with customers on this occasion, but was now quite deserted. While thinking on his present miserable state and future prospects, all of a sudden the little ugly old woman, with a sharp nose, sharp chin, sharp eyes, sharp voice, and leather spectacles, again stood before him, leaning on her crooked black cane.

"De Philistynster Onweotende!" exclaimed Boss Boomptie, "what too you want now?"

"I want a dozen new-year cookies!" screamed the old creature.

The little man counted out twelve as before.

"I want one more?" screamed she louder than ever.

"Opgeblaazen Tynelschildknaap!" cried the boss, in a rage; "den want will pe your master."

She offered him three stivers, which he indignantly rejected, saying,

"I want none of your duyvel's stuyvers—begone, Versch-vikt Huysvrouw!"

The old woman went her way, mumbling and grumbling as usual.

"By Saint Johannes de Dooper," quoth Boss Boomptie, "put she's a peauty!"

That night, and all the week after, the brickbats flew about Knickerbocker Hall like hail, insomuch that Boss Boomptie marvelled where they could all come from, until one morning, after a terrible shower of bricks, he found, to his great grief and dismay, that his oven had disappeared; next went the top of his chimney, and when that was gone, these diabolical sinners began at the extreme point of the gable end, and so went on picking at the two edges downwards, until they looked just like the teeth of a saw, as may be still seen by people curious enough to look at the engraving.

"Gesprengkelde! Gespikkelde! on Geplecktevee!" cried Boss Boomptie, "put it's too pad to have my prains peat out wid my own brickpats."

About the same time a sober respectable cat, that for years had done nothing but sit purring in the chimney-corner, all at once got the duyvel in her, and after scratching the poor man half to death, jumped out of the chimney and disappeared. A Whitehall boatman afterwards saw her in Buttermilk-channel, with nothing but the tail left, swimming against the tide as easy as kiss your hand. Poor Mrs. Boomptie had no peace of her life, what with pinchings, stickings of needles, and talking without opening her mouth. But the climax of the malice of the demon which beset her was in at last tying up her tongue, so that she could not speak at all, but did nothing but sit crying and wringing her hands in the chimney-corner.

These carryings on brought round new-year's-eve again, when Boss Boomptie thought he would have a frolic, "in spite of the duyvel," as he said, which saying was, somehow or other, afterwards applied to the creek at Kingsbridge. So he commanded his wife to prepare him a swinging mug of hot spiced rum, to keep up his courage against the assaults of the brickbats. But what was the dismay of the little man when he found that every time he put the beverage to his lips he received a great box on the ear, the mug was snatched away by an invisible hand, and every single drop drunk out of it before it came to Boss Boomptie's turn. Then, as if it was an excellent joke, he heard a most diabolical laugh down in the cellar.

"Saint Nicholas and Saint Johannes de Dooper!" exclaimed the little man in despair. This was attacking him in the very intrenchments of his heart. It was worse than the brickbats.

"Saint Nicholas! Saint Nicholas! what will become of me—what sal Ich doon, mynheer?"

Scarcely had he uttered this pathetic appeal, when there was a sound of horses' hoofs in the chimney, and presently a little wagon, drawn by a little, fat, gray 'Sopus pony, came trundling into the room, loaded with all sorts of knick-knacks. It was driven by a jolly, fat, little rogue of a fellow, with a round sparkling eye, and a mouth which would certainly have been laughing had it not been for a glorious Meerschchaum pipe, which would have chanced to fall out in that case. The little rascal had on a three-corner cocked hat, decked with old gold lace; a blue Dutch sort of a short pea-jacket, red waistcoat, breeks of the same colour, yellow stockings, and honest thick-soled shoes, ornamented with a pair of skates. Altogether he was a queer figure—but there was something so irresistibly jolly and good-natured in his face, that Boss Boomptie knew him for the good Saint Nicholas as soon as he saw him.

"Orange Boven!" cried the good saint, pulling off his cocked hat, and making a low bow to Mrs. Boomptie, who sat tongue-tied in the chimney corner.

"Wonderdadjige Geboote!" said Boss Boomptie, speaking for his wife, which made the good woman very angry, that he should take the words out of her mouth.

"You called on St. Nicholas. Here am I," quoth the jolly little saint. "In one word—for I am a saint of few words, and have my hands full of business to-night—in one word, tell me what you want?"

"I am pewitched," quoth Boss Boomptie. "The duyvel is in me, my house, my wife, my new-year cookies, and my children. What shall I do?"

"When you count a dozen, you must count thirteen," answered the wagon-driver, at the same time cracking his whip, and clattering up the chimney, more like a little duyvel than a little saint.

"Der dapperheid updragon!" muttered Boss Boomptie. "When you count a dozen, you must count thirteen! Twern-dertigduysend destrooergender! I never heard of such counting. By Saint Johannes de Dooper, but Saint Nicholas is a great blockhead!"

Just as he uttered this blasphemy against the excellent Saint Nicholas, he saw through the pane of glass, in the door leading from the spare room to the shop, the little, ugly, old woman, with the sharp eyes, sharp nose, sharp chin, sharp voice, and leather spectacles, lighting from a broomstick, at the street-door.

"Dere is the duyvel's kint come again," quoth he, in one of his cross humours, which was aggravated by his getting just then a great box on the ear from the invisible hand. However, he went grumbling into the shop, for it was part of his religion never to neglect a customer, let the occasion be what it might.

"I want a dozen new-year cookies," screamed the old beauty, as usual, and as usual Boss Boomptie counted out twelve.

"I want another one," screamed she still louder.

"Ah hah!" thought Boss Boomptie, doubtless inspired by the jolly little caitiff, Saint Nicholas. "Ah hah! In opper-hoofd en Bevelheffer—when you count twelf, you must count thirteen.—Hah! hah! ho! ho! ho!" And he counted out the thirteenth cookie like a brave fellow.

The old woman made him a low curtsy, and laughed till she might have shown her teeth, if she had had any.

"Friend Boomptie," said she, in a voice exhibiting the perfection of a nicely modulated scream—"friend Boomptie, I love such generous little fellows as you, in my heart. I salute you," and she advanced to kiss him. Boss Boomptie did not at all like the proposition; but, doubtless, inspired by Saint Nicholas, he submitted with indescribable grace.

At that moment, an explosion was heard inside the little glass pane, and the voice of Mrs. Boomptie crying out,

"You false-hearted villain, have I found out your tricks at last!"

"De Philistynen Onweetende!" cried Boss Boomptie. "She's come to her speech at last!"

"The spell is broken!" screamed the old woman with the sharp eyes, nose, chin, and voice.—"The spell is broken, and henceforward a dozen is thirteen, and thirteen is a dozen! There shall be thirteen new-year cookies to the dozen, as a type of the thirteen mighty states that are to arise out of the ruins of the government of Faderland!"

Thereupon she took a new-year cake bearing the effigy of the blessed St. Nicholas, and caused Boss Boomptie to swear upon it, that for ever afterwards twelve should be thirteen, and thirteen should be twelve. After which, she mounted her broomstick and disappeared, just as the little old Dutch clock struck twelve. From that time forward, the spell that hung over Knickerbocker Hall, was broken; and ever since it has been illustrious for baking the most glorious new-year cookies in our country. Every thing became as before: the little 'prentice boys returned, mounted on the batch of bread, and their adventures may, peradventure, be told some other time. Finally, from that day forward no baker of New Amsterdam was ever bewitched, at least by an ugly old woman, and a baker's dozen has been always counted as thirteen. B.

ARTS AND SCIENCES.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF SIGHT.

CHESLENDEN, the celebrated surgeon and oculist, gives some very curious particulars respecting a boy, who was couched by him in his thirteenth year: his narrative is the more interesting, as it seems to determine the question so long and so hotly contested by philosophers, whether a person blind from his birth, upon being made to see, could, by sight alone, distinguish a cube from a globe? Most persons would, probably, answer in the affirmative, notwithstanding the many theoretical arguments which might be brought against it; at least until they have such facts as the operation of couching discloses, which are of too stubborn a nature to be easily evaded.

It is previously remarked by Cheselden, that though we speak of persons afflicted with cataracts, as blind, yet they are never so blind from that cause, but that they can distinguish day from night; and for the most part, in a strong light, distinguish black, white, scarlet, and other glaring colours; but they cannot distinguish the shape of any thing. And he gives the following reason for his remark: the light coming from external objects being let in through the matter of cataract, which disposes and refracts the rays; these do not, as they ought, converge to a focus on the retina or black part of the eye, so as to form a picture of the objects there; the person afflicted is, consequently, in the same state as a man of sound sight, looking through a thin jelly. Hence, the shape of an object cannot be at all discerned, though the colour may. And this was the case with the boy couched by the operator. Before couching, he could distinguish colours in a strong light, but afterwards, the faint ideas he had previously acquired of them, were not sufficient for him to recollect them by, and he did not know them to be the same that he had seen dimly, when he was enabled to see them perfectly. Scarlet, he now thought to be the most beautiful, and of others, the gayest were the most pleasing: black, the first time he saw it perfectly, gave him great uneasiness, but after a little time, he became more reconciled to it; he, however, always associated some unpleasant idea with it, being struck with great horror at the sight of a negro woman, whom he met some months afterwards.

When he first saw, he was so far from making any right judgment about distance, that he thought all objects whatever touched his eyes, (so he expressed it) as what he felt did his skin. He thought no objects so agreeable as those which were smooth and regular, though he could form no judgment of their shape, nor guess what it was in any object that pleased him. He did not know any one thing from another, however different in shape or size; but upon being told what things those were whose form he knew before from feeling, he would carefully observe, that he might know them again. Having often forgot which was the cat, or which was the dog, he was ashamed to ask, but catching the cat (which he knew by feeling) he looked at her steadfastly, and then putting her down, "So, puss," said he, "I shall know you another time." He was very much surprised that those things which he had liked best when blind, did not appear most agreeable to his eyes, expecting those persons whom he loved most, would appear most beautiful; and such things most agreeable to his sight, were so to his taste. His friends at first thought he even knew what pictures represented, but found afterwards they were mistaken; for about two months after he was couched, he discovered that they represented solid bodies, at first taking them for party-coloured planes or surfaces diversified with a variety of paint; but even then, he was surprised that the pictures did not feel like the things they represented, and was amazed when he found that those parts of pictures which, by their light and shade appeared prominent, and uneven to his sight, felt equally flat with the rest. On this latter occasion, he pertinently inquired, which was the lying sense, feeling or seeing?

Being shown his father's picture in a locket at his mother's watch, he acknowledged the likeness, but was very much astonished, asking how it could be that a large face could be compressed in so little room, and saying that it should have seemed as impossible to him as to put a bushel of any thing into a pint.

At first he could bear but very little light, and the things he saw he thought extremely large; but upon seeing things larger, those first seen he conceived to be less than they had appeared before, never being able to imagine any figures or lines beyond the bounds he saw; the room he was in he said he knew to be but part of the house, yet he could not conceive that the whole house could look bigger. Before he was couched he expected little advantage from seeing worth undergoing an operation for, except reading and writing; for he said he thought he could have no more pleasure in walking abroad than he had in the garden at present, which he could do safely and readily. And even blindness, he said, had this advantage, that he could go any where in the dark much better than those who could see. After he was enabled to see he did not soon lose this faculty, nor desire a light to go about the house in darkness. He said every new object was a new delight, and the pleasure was so great, that he wanted words to express it; but his gratitude to the operator was extreme, never seeing him for some time without shedding tears; and if he did not happen to come at the time he was expected, the boy could not forbear crying at the disappointment. A year after his first seeing, being carried to Epsoom Downs, he was exceedingly delighted with the largeness of the prospect, and called it a new kind of seeing. He was afterwards couched of the other eye, and found that objects appeared large to this eye, but not so large as they did at first to the other; looking upon the same object with both eyes, he thought it appeared about twice as large as to the first couched eye only; but it did not appear double.

Mr. Cheselden performed the operation of couching on several other persons, who all gave nearly the same account of their learning to see as the preceding. They all had this curious defect after couching, in common, that never having had occasion to move their eyes, they knew not how to do it, and at first could not direct them to any particular object, but had to move the whole head, till by slow degrees they acquired the faculty of shifting the eye-balls in their sockets.

Several philosophical inferences may be deduced from the above cited experiment. First, it is evident that the eye is not a judge of direct, though it may be of transverse distance, i. e. that it cannot estimate the distance between two trees, for example, nearly in a line with itself, though it may, if they are at equal lengths from it, but not in the same line with it. Hence, when we look at a chair standing against the wall of our chamber, we really do not see that the fore legs stand out upon the carpet; we see both them and all parts of the chair painted as it were, (projected is the philosophical word,) on the wall. It is only by having felt that they do stand out from the wall, that we judge them so to do, when we merely see them exhibiting the same appearances they had when we felt them before.

Secondly, as it appears that the boy could not tell a cat from a dog until he had felt them, it is plain that neither could he tell a cube from a globe. It is to be observed, however, that although at first, all distinctions of shape were unperceived, yet experience would shortly have taught him to distinguish, by sight alone, a cat from a dog, a cube from a globe.

Thirdly, the above-mentioned experiment appears to suggest a doubt of the truth of that philosophical distinction which has usually been put between reason and instinct. If it is by an exertion of judgment, that a man coming into a room where there is a real chair, and one ill painted on the wall, will sit down upon the former and neglect the latter, it is certainly by an exertion of a similar faculty, that a cat coming into a room where there is a real mouse and an ill painted one, will spring upon the former and neglect the latter. And from the same principle it is, that the man will attempt sitting down on a well painted chair, and a cat will attempt catching a well painted mouse; neither discovering their error till they come near enough either to see the defects of the painting, or to feel the delusive objects, and thus correct the mistake of their judgment acting upon the information of sight alone. For it is to be remembered that, in this case, it is not their sight which deceives them, but their judgment; sight informs them that certain colours, lights, and shades, appear before them, and its information is true; whilst judgment tells them that these colours, lights, and shades, indicate a massive substance, (viz. a chair or mouse) which is false. From this it would appear, that instinct has no more to do with a cat mouse-catching, than with a man hare-hunting; and similar considerations may perhaps teach us, that brute animals approach much nearer to us in faculties, than philosophers are generally disposed to allow.

Lastly, it may be inferred, that the staring and vacant expression of the countenance, which is to be seen in children and idiots, proceeds rather from an inability to move their own eyes, than from a want of thought at the time. For the motion of his eyes is consequent upon an act of his will so to move them, and he can have no will to move them from the object at which he first looks, because he knows as yet of no other object existing, and could therefore have no motive to excite his will to action.

There are many other inferences which might be drawn from this curious experiment, but I will leave them to the reader's own sagacity and fancy. London Magazine.

LITERARY NOTICES.

THE ARMENIANS.

The author of this tale has taken the idea from "Anastasis." The descriptions are interesting; but the plot is simple. "The son of a Greek Hospodar became enamoured of the daughter of an Armenian banker at Constantinople. They met—loved—married—and were parted." Many could invent a more complicated story, but the fine eastern pictures are evidently from the pen of one who has regarded the actual scenery which he delineates, with a penetrating observation, and felt them with the ardour of a poet. The work is entertaining, both from the subjects which it embraces, and the animated style of the writer. These volumes, like all others from the press of Carey and Lea, are characterized by typographical neatness.

THE LITTLE FRENCHMAN AND HIS BANK NOTES.

Have any of our friends a pamphlet bearing the above title. written, we believe, by Mr. Paulding, and published some years ago in Philadelphia? We are anxious to purchase it. But if that is not possible, we should esteem the loan of it a favour.

THE CULPRIT FAY.

The late Dr. Drake, the friend of Mr. Halleck, and his associate in the authorship of the "Croakers," left behind him a MS. poem, entitled "The Culprit Fay." Several years ago, we ventured to inquire respecting the destiny of this charming production, and to insert a few extracts from a copy which was then and still is in our possession. There are numerous other unpublished effusions of Dr. Drake's pen, which ought to be given to the world. Why are they concealed? They would, assuredly, meet with a very extensive sale, and afford much gratification to every admirer of genuine poetry, and especially to the many friends of their lamented author.

CHILDREN'S BOOKS.

The responsibility of recommending books for the use of children is an important one. Much trash is brought into the market intended for that purpose, and is sometimes praised from the courtesy of editors to publishers and authors, without a careful examination. But although these little volumes appear trifling to a reviewer, their influence upon the youthful mind may produce very serious consequences. Among a number of works of this kind placed in our hands for notice, we have found time to look over "A Geographical Present," "Parables and Parabolic Stories," and the "Bible Story Book," which we deem worthy the attention of parents.

For the Mirror.

THE DIRGE OF LUCY.*

"'Tis said the soul, upborn on music's wings,
Soars to a region, where eternal bliss
Brings all discordant things to harmony."

For her languid couch she sat, yet lovely in decay,
The gentle and the beautiful, whom death had doom'd his prey:
Her eye no more with pleasure beam'd, she sigh'd but for repose,
And on her young and sunken cheek appeared the insidious rose:
Ah! how unlike the sprightly nymph of other, happier hours,
When time, on tiptoe, danced along, and strew'd her path with flowers;
And, arm in arm with joy entwined, she knew nor care nor fear,
Nor deemed that in the May of life should end her glad career.

Alas! how oft the vernal sky's wrapped in instant gloom,
And nature, mid the withering blast, despoiled of her bloom!
How oft the human blossom, too, exposed to breath as rude,
Falls, (as its charms are just revealed,) with precious tears bedewed!
And so, in sooth, young maiden fair! ere thy sweet spirit fled,
Around thy dying couch, for thee, full many a tear was shed; [knee,
And prayers, though unavailing prayers, were breathed on bended
And all a mother's quenchless love was lavished upon thee.

O what were then thy thoughts, dear one! when thou, about to part,
Didst feel the oppressive hand of death lie heavy at thy heart?
Didst thou on thy young frolic hours reflect then with a sigh,
And, wishing they could be restored, regret that thou must die?
Or did some glorious messenger, departed from above,—
Unveil for thee far other scenes of happiness and love;
And, softly whispering peace to thee, thy trembling ear attune
To that immortal harmony which thou shouldst list so soon?

He did! and thou, with brightening eye, as in a mirror clear,
Didst view the place of bliss prepared for suffering virtue here,
Where myriad seraphs spread their wings, (so dazzling to behold,)
And, bowing 'neath the throne of God, off sweep their harps of gold:
And thou didst hear the concord sweet, and soothed by the strain,
With smile angelic upward look'st to hear it once again;
But ah, o'erpowered by the sounds, and weary of delay,
Thou gav'st thy spirit pure to heaven, and breath'st thy life away!

EPISTOLARY CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTERS FROM RUSSIA,

To a gentleman of this city.

NUMBER TEN.

St. Petersburg, 1830.

In the third square above the Hermitage, as you ascend the Court-quay, stands the palace of Constantine. It was erected by Prince Gregory Orloff, a favourite of Catherine's, purchased at his death by his sovereign, and made the prison-house of Stanislaus of Poland. Its dimensions are ample; and being in the antique style and of dark marble, it has a most gloomy and sombre aspect, in perfect keeping with the iniquitous use that has been made of it. I can never pass this way without having my feelings harrowed up by the recollection of the basest deed that modern history records; and sentiments excited in my bosom towards the Russian government, that at this day ought not to be allowed. Yet, how can it be otherwise with an American, whose breast glows with the grateful remembrance of the gallant deeds of a Pulaski and a Kosciuszko, in the dark days of his country's struggle for its freedom? They crossed the wide Atlantic to the land of the stranger, with the generous oblation of their blood, to the foot of that tree of liberty which a tyrant's arms sought to root up and scatter in utter desolation. One gallantly died before Savannah; and the other on our glorious triumph returned to his country, boldly and unceasingly renewing his efforts in the same holy cause, till himself was wounded and made prisoner. Warsaw sacked and pillaged by that bloody fiend Suwarof, and the land of his birth divided among the ruthless invaders, had annihilated his hopes and proved his heroic struggles unavailing. Dining a few days since at a table d'hôte, I noticed a Polish attaché nearly opposite me; I spoke to him of Poland—of Pulaski—and of Kosciuszko. Being doubtful who I might be, and perhaps fearful of some eaves-dropping police, he was short and guarded in his replies; but upon learning that I was an American, he instantly became very communicative, and was equally inquisitive in return. His kinsmen had fought with Kosciuszko throughout his noble struggle: and he spoke of his defeat, the partition of his country, and the cruel blasting of their later hopes by Napoleon, with an agony of feeling that it is impossible for me to describe. On learning that we had erected monuments in gratitude for the services of his countrymen, he was much affected, and shaking me by the hand, he said, "On a noblement agi—comme je voudrais bien aller en Amérique." But I have sadly wandered from my subject.

Although the property, and bearing the name of Constantine, I am not sure that he ever occupied this palace. Certain it is, he has not for many years; for since his marriage with a Polish countess, under the nominal title of Vice Roy of Poland, he has lived quite retired, in the vicinity of Warsaw;

*This young lady died of a consumption. A moment before her death, as if just awakened from a pleasing dream, she looked up at her mother, and asked with some degree of earnestness, if she had heard the music! But the words had scarcely escaped from her lips, when she sank in her mother's arms and expired.
†You have nobly done. How much I should like to go to America.

popular and esteemed for his philosophic and domestic habits. When in active service, in the army, he was distinguished by his bravery, has repeatedly headed his regiment in desperate charges against the enemy, and won the affection of the troops, no less by his reckless daring than by his generous largesses among them. From this point spreads out the Field of Mars, an open space completely levelled, and Macadamized for the manœuvres of the emperor's troops. It is bounded on the north and west by splendid rows of high barracks, and on the south and east by the Moika canal and summer gardens. In figure, it is not unlike a right-angled trapezium, and I should think its extreme length not less than one-third of a mile. I have seen it present a highly animated and exciting aspect at the grand review of the Imperial Guard, a body of nearly fifty thousand of the finest infantry and cavalry that Europe can boast—but of this I shall speak hereafter. At the extremity nearest the Neva, stands the colossal statue of Suwarof. It is on a raised pedestal of three steps, in ancient armour, and holds a menacing attitude, well becoming his daring reputation. He shields three crowns with his buckler, and presents his sword as if in bold defiance of the world. The summer garden is a parallelogram, something longer than the Field of Mars, and is very tastefully laid out. I give our worthy corporation great credit for their late neat arrangement of our charming Battery, and yet I wish they were here for half an hour's promenade; they would return home to our good city—forbid the intrusion of basking vagrants—the vile smoke of the cigar, and make the walks and grass-plots as inviting as the unsurpassed and lovely beauty of the scenery that surrounds them. Here a carriage way makes a circuit within the iron palisades, wide avenues extend the whole length, the thick branches of the towering Linden interlocking at the top, and forming a shady esplanade. Circling and intersected walks, and the divided grass-plots fenced with neat painted lattices, up whose sides creeping vines and thick flowering shrubbery are trained, make each patch a sequestered nook by itself. It is here you will see groups of children dancing in a hey-day frolic to the simple air of a strolling musician, and talking infancy delighted at its escape from its nurse's arms. It is the grand promenade of the citizens, and is consequently much frequented, especially on Sunday afternoon.

A very elegant hanging iron bridge is thrown over the wide Fontanka, at the head of the garden, much ornamented with Siberian gold; and just above, on the opposite side of the Moika canal, stands the palace of St. Michael, the favourite residence of Paul, and where he closed his mad career. The room pointed out to me as the scene of this warning tragedy, is in the second story, and overlooks the canal and gardens. In his time the palace was surrounded by a deep ditch and high wall, and was capable of making a good defence. The wall is now removed, and the open space adorned with a grass-plot and shady trees, and the wide fosse is changed to a limpid canal. About the centre of the square in front stands a second equestrian statue of Peter the Great, which though a fine cast, is not to be compared with the one that so nobly adorns the Isaac-square. The building is quadrangular, a high steeple crowns the roof, and it is now occupied as a military seminary.

On the opposite side of the street commences the garden and grounds to the Grand Duke Michael's palace. They are considerably less in extent than those of the summer gardens, yet not less tastefully arranged, bordering the Moika, on the north end, with a limpid fish-pond near the centre. The palace fronts a street running at right angles to the one in which you are now placed, and before it a splendid opening has lately been made through a wide square to the Neva's Perspective. This palace was finished in 1826; its proportions are beautiful, and of similar architecture to the city-hall, having at least twice its dimensions. The iron palisades that form the front court are superb, fifteen feet in height, and sport from the top of the centre gate the double-headed Russian eagle, with outspread wings. The furnishing and decorations within are of the most sumptuous kind; the floors of several of the apartments are inlaid with rosewood and mahogany, and highly polished, while the richest carpets over-spread others. Costly hangings and mirrors of great magnitude adorn the walls, the ceilings are beautifully painted, and the long hall is decorated with scenes in fresco from the Iliad and Odyssey. There were tables of jasper, and the cut glass and services of plate and furniture throughout were tastefully plain and showy, and all the work of native artists, exhibiting much greater taste and perfection in the arts than I had previously believed the Russians to have attained. Michael is the fourth and youngest son of Paul, and holds a distinguished rank in the army. His figure is shorter than that of Nicholas, inclining to the en bon point, with a little stoop of the shoulders, and rather a heavy expression of countenance. He is termed a very good fellow, and known as a brave and tolerably efficient man. He married a beautiful princess, from some one of the German electorates.

Still coasting the Neva for a mile or more above the summer-gardens, and arriving in the suburbs of the town, you will find the Tauride palace. This was built by Potemkin, and is of one story, of a height of fifty-five feet, with projecting wings. The body within forms an immense saloon, of great length, and sixty feet in width, and is adorned with glass lustres, mirrors of enormous magnitude, and numerous statues, among which that of Laocoon, in writhing agony, stands pre-eminent. A conservatory forms a part of the saloon, rustic chairs are placed around it, gravel walks run along, and a great variety of exotic plants and flowers were flourishing in fine perfection. The grounds in the rear of the palace are of considerable extent, with beautiful walks, artificial rivulets, fish ponds, and cascades; splendid fêtes are frequently given here, but it derives its greatest celebrity from the magnificent banquet that Potemkin, in the pride of his glory, gave to his imperial mistress. The records of eastern luxury may be searched in vain for as gorgeous a display as was then exhibited here. But I am absolutely satiated with palaces; and, though there may be at least a good half dozen more in the surrounding precincts to talk about, and some of them quite magnificent, it is very doubtful whether you get a description of them from me; and I shall merely observe, by way of closing a period, that a little above this stands the convent for the education of the daughters of the nobility. I found a stout porter, in gaudy livery, with fierce mustachios, and an enormous golden-headed cane to boot, holding a dragon's watch at the gate. As well as I could understand from him, visitors were only admitted to the convent at the annual exhibition and examination of the fair inmates. At any rate, he stoutly resisted a bribe and all my attempts to get in, so I gave a half wheel, determining at least to circumnavigate its high walls. I had not proceeded far, however, when I found a thick narrow gate ajar in the wall. I stepped through, and just across the intervening space was a wide open door in the convent. I cannot tell how or wherefore, but certain it is, it immediately became crowded with a variety of pretty faces from the fine blonde to a deep brunette; yet I shall have no romantic déroulement to record in consequence of this, for I had barely time to look about when I spied a gruff sentry making towards me, so I lifted my hat, with one of my best bows, to the fair gazers, which they universally returned, with a smiling short curtsy. I beat a hasty retreat, a charming miss crying out in perfect French, and most condoling accents, "Neus sommes bien fâchées que monsieur n'est pas permis d'entrer." Here the Neva takes a broad curve; a raft of birch-wood was floating down on one side and a flat shallop beating up on the other, while on the opposite bank stood a neat village, the houses of which shone forth in a dark yellow.

"THE CURE IS BITTERER STILL."

BY ISOLANTE.

"Who loves, raves—'tis youth's frenzy—but the cure
Is bitterer still."—Byron.

Oh for one hour, one blissful hour
Like those my young heart knew,
When all my dreams of future joy
From love their colouring drew;
I deemed affection then might be
The very life of life to me,
Alas, 'twas source of every ill,
And yet—the cure is bitterer still!

I loved—oh, fearful is the strength
Of woman's love combined
With all the spirit's high-wrought powers,
The energies of mind:
Such deep devotedness as feels
The Indian when he humbly kneels
Before his idol's car, to meet
A death of rapture at his feet,
Such love was mine—though fraught with ill—
The cure, the cure is bitterer still.

Oh grief beyond all other griefs!
To feel the slow decay
Of love and hope within the heart,
Ere youth be past away—
To know that life must henceforth be
A voyage o'er a tideless sea,
No ebb nor flow of hopes and fears,
To vary the dull waste of years:
Oh love may be life's chiefest ill,
Yet ah! the cure is bitterer still.

We are very sorry the gentleman is not at home.

TYRREL, AT THE BIER OF CLARA MOWERAY.*

BY WILLIS G. CLARK.

The love, where death has set his seal,
Nor age can chill, nor rival steal,
Nor falsehood disavow.—Byron.

"And art thou dead?"—thus wept a lone
And stricken lover, by the bier—
"A soft and sunny vision flown—
"A star that faded from its sphere,
"Whose light illumed my wandering here—
"Whose trembling lustre now is o'er,
"For ah! in many a coming year
"Thy smile will cheer my heart no more.
"And while I linger by thy rest—
"Thy pure and sainted spirit fled,
"Looks down, from mansions of the blest,
"On me—a watcher by the dead!
"Whose heart-drops on thy brow are shed—
"On me—a pilgrim midst his race,
"Who hath a weary way to tread
"To death's unconscious dwelling-place!
"And gazing on the folded lid
"Which shrouds that changed and rayless eye,
"Where all life's sweetest lights are hid,
"What countless memories hurry by!
"Mild as the summer's azure sky
"Its placid beams have streamed on me,
"Like sunbursts from the zenith high,
"When mid-day glories wander free.
"Oh! on that pale unmoving lip
"How oft thy stainless soul would dwell!
"There truth and balm held fellowship,
"And songs in richest music fell—
"Awakening love I joyed to tell,
"Till guiltless kisses stopped the lay
"Which from thy rosy mouth would swell
"Like chant of birds in early May!
"Yet, thou art dead! and in thy breast
"No thrill of love or rapture springs,
"And, brooding o'er thy sacred rest,
"Pale silence spreads her funeral wings,
"And clouds my brightest imagings!
"Yet let my spirit not repine:
"Though hallowed grief my bosom wrings,
"Soon shall thy lowly bed be mine!"

REVIEWS.

HEAVEN bless Walter Scott. There is almost a universal feeling in the reflection that the warmest wish of an obscure scribbler like myself is utterly valueless to one who has so often been near me, like a guardian spirit, in sickness, weariness, and despondency, and shed such cheerful light across some of the loneliest and dreariest passages of my life. I am without any companion in a strange and crowded city. My hotel is swarming with new faces. I hear laughter and music, and the rustling of a silk gown, and a half open door discovers a finely furnished parlour, and a groupe of graceful girls, one of whom is running her hand lightly over the keys of a piano. But I am excluded from their merry company, and now the closed door hides them from my sight. I had roamed around the city: to the reading-room—to the book-stores—the museum, at which latter receptacle of wonders, I was edified by the same eternal monotony of stuffed pelicans and ostriches, great bears and lions glaring on me with their bright glass eyes, snakes, autographs, monkeys smoking cigars, overgrown oystershells, and turtles with two heads. I had snatched a glance at the theatre, and mused on the bridge—I had read the directory and the almanac, and subjected myself to the operations of my polite friend the barber, with the laudable design of surmounting so much time. He had powdered my chin, and fixed my hair according to the uninterrupted dictates of his own fancy. My shoes were polished—my clothes brushed. I had stolen a single glance at my insignificant self, in a full-length mirror, which adorns the drawing-room of the G. hotel, and was just stretching myself, with the indolent ennui of a fashionable lady, upon a sofa, by the fire, when an old torn volume, full of dog's ears, met my eye behind the clock, and was immediately seized with the hungry avidity of a shark. Some friendly spirit had, very opportunely, supplied me with what turned out to be "Woodstock," by that magnificent fellow—that exhaustless fountain of literary pleasure—that princely author and honest man, Walter Scott. That I had read it several times before, which, in reference to most books, would have arrested all further proceeding in that way, was precisely the reason why I should read it again; so, without further ado, in I plunged, and the heavy hours, which had hitherto grated so harshly across my soul, floated by like light and silent clouds. Late in the afternoon I looked up to find the sky all reddening with the sunset. During the evening I forgot all the bustle and solitariness of a great hotel, and at length I closed the second volume; when the last pages were dimly seen through the gathering moisture of my eyes. This sprang not from sickly sentimentality, but from the glowing excitement with which I followed this potent enchanter through the living and thrilling scenes of human life.

What an admirable production it is! With what a strong and vivid reality Wildrake stands out from the canvases? How individual, yet how natural! Pierson and Cromwell, by a few masterly outlines, are perfectly distinct and impressive—and over even old Bevis the author has shed such a colouring, that the noble beast shares the interest of the reader. Is not such a book a glorious wonder? A few marks upon paper, borne about in the pocket, and which to many would be a mystery, a mere blank, yet what a magical influence it possesses. Suppose an intelligent savage, unacquainted with the beautiful art by which we convey thought from realm to realm, should behold a more enlightened being availing himself of this refined source of amusement; when the apparently useless object is opened, and the eyes rest on it, mark it arrest their light and wandering flashes. Hour after hour the gaze is fastened on the silent pages—they shut the ear to surrounding sounds—they change the flow of thought—make the heart beat—the eyes moisten—the system glow—the countenance lighten with sudden mirth, or reflect the dark emotions which pass visibly before the mind's eye, on the little space of a single page.

Think of the beast's monotonous life, and what a fine and subtle joy has man here in comparison. How it verges towards the borders of a higher existence. How utterly and immeasurably it is beyond their comprehension. If then we are gifted with a capacity so elevated, so extraordinary, so intellectual, and yet of which millions even of our own fellow-creatures have been totally ignorant, by a discovery at once so simple and easy, of the resources and treasures which lie sometimes hidden within the reach of man, what glorious secrets in a yet higher life the beneficent hand of nature may unlock to the human soul? At what other wonderful fountains may she not suffer us to quench our thirst for knowledge and bliss—fountains which, perchance, are even now flowing beautifully around us, yet all unseen and unsuspected. Woodstock, by Walter Scott, may hereafter lay open to our understanding.

It is curious to contemplate the symmetrical gradations by which the principle of life, as connected with inert matter, rises in beauty and approaches perfection. How it branches up from the dark coarse earth into new, more refined, and wonderful forms and qualities of being. The spirit ranges nearer and nearer the sublime mystery of all life, and at each successive stage increases its power, its knowledge, and its capacities. The system resembles a tree, which at first seems an obscure and apparently worthless seed, buried in the dust; then the rough-barked trunk strikes its gnarled roots into the soil; from this which, although containing the invisible essence and machinery of life, presents little by which the eye can distinguish it from dead matter, behold the smooth and tapering branches spread abroad, and the green leaves burst forth; then flowers of fine colouring, and enriching the air with their balmy breath, and to crown the perfection of this common piece of nature's handiwork, fruit, lovely to the eye, soft and pleasant to the touch, cool and delicious to the taste, hangs clustering among the verdant foliage, drinking life and rich sweetness and crimson beauty from the distant sun, and destined to supply a purpose to beings more immeasurably and inconceivably superior to itself in the scale of creation than it is above the meanest particle of dust which floats around it in the air. This study of nature's plan—this conviction of man's capacities to go on and fit himself for a higher existence, combined with the instinctive imperishable tenacity with which the mind clings to the consciousness of its immortality, make atheism and disbelief in a future state an impossibility: not but that there are thousands who think they are skeptical, and who in the moment suffer no doubt of their annihilation to intrude upon them; but it is my opinion, that when brought directly in the face of death they are conscious of a change. This is not the effects of fear or of early associations; it is the voice of nature whispering consolation to her creature, trembling in the agony of the most awful crisis. The mind cannot conceive the idea of its own destruction.

I found another volume, which struck very well in with my train of thought—Arthur Austin's "Lights and Shadows of Scottish Life." The style of this writer is rich and sometimes thrilling. He combines, in a very extraordinary degree, simplicity and strength. Such pictures of pastoral life—such breathing, bright visible creatures his young females are, that reading his little volume is like wandering actually away among the green sunny hills, or into the quiet humble cottages, or among the drifting snow-banks, and there holding communion with the young and the aged, the blind, the sick, and the dying. In such hands as his, religion is full of poetry as well as of truth and nature; he divests it of every harsh and repulsive feature. All his pictures are embued with it, and have, consequently, the same superior beauty which glows over a lovely landscape, when bathed in the streams of a golden sunset. There are occasionally sprinkled throughout these pages touches of pathos as eloquent and as exquisite as the best efforts of the poets. The author has evidently read Ossian. The splendid sentimentousness of the blind bard frequently appears, although free from plagiarism or tame imitation, and yet this young man died in early youth, and these glowing and melting pictures "were found among his papers." While the world are dwelling upon their soothing charms, while manly hearts acknowledge the touch of the master, and beautiful eyes are bending over them, the hand that drew them, the lips that murmured them over in silence and solitude, the heart that felt all these mysterious and kindling beauties of life and nature, are mouldering away in the grave.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

A DAY AMONG THE HIGHLANDS.

Fishkill—December.—Rose at half-past eight—confoundedly dull, from having sat up till three the night previous, to continue my essay "On the evils of retiring late, and the benefits of rising early." Eyes felt as if they were a couple of heated grape-shot; looked like—but my fancy is too stupid to search for resemblances. Query—Have not late hours been the chief cause of spoiling my beauty? Mem. To read Burke on the Beautiful forthwith. Breakfast at nine—appetite a good deal less keen than the wit of our Boniface, or the air of his parlour. Left the table unsurfited, and mentally committed a pun as I withdrew—videlicet, thought my constitution would break fast if I did not mend my habits. To retire to bed for the future before one—except when engaged on a sonnet. Nine o'clock—set off on a ramble among the highlands with my country cousin, Hal Burton. By the way, Hal has become a dashing fellow,—the glass of fashion and laureate of his native village. Passed the neat but quaint dwellings of many a Van Cressus, each of whom my companion assured me, had a brace or two of pretty daughters. "Good! excellent!" said I, as I looked abroad over their fertile and extensive domains. "But," returned he, "they have all of them a brother or so, to stand between them and the fee-simple of their paternal acres." "Horrible! barbarous! a brother indeed, say you? Humph—what right has a rich Dutchman to have more than one child—and that an only daughter?"

I am astonished there is not a law to take cognizance of such injustice—such downright, perpendicular trespass on the feelings of all kindly and disinterested fortune-seekers like myself. Resolved, not to visit one of the Misses Van Cressus because they have brothers. Ten—reached the shore opposite Polypell Island. Wished I could cleave the air around it, as deftly as the white gull that swept in graceful evolutions before me. Grew a little metaphysical, and wondered if birds have a perception of the picturesque and the sublime. Concluded that, at all events, they understood the poetry of motion as thoroughly as Vestris herself, and accordingly took a half-hour's lesson in callisthenics of the graceful sea-bird. Mem.—To ask Mons. Berault if he observes any improvement in my next cotillon. Continued to gaze at the little island for another half hour. Fancied it the occidental twin of the Cycladian Delos. Wished the corporation might discover the analogy, and, in the utilitarian spirit of the age, make it the refuge of their persecuted Latonas—the jail and bridewell of disquieted memory. Eleven.—Turned away in the direction of a very unequivocal noise, which issued from a deep gorge in the mountains behind us. Took our way joyously along the rocky margin of a tumultuous stream, that came leaping and shouting through the thick hemlocks and pines which gloomily overarched it, till the white flash of a beautiful cascade broke suddenly upon us. We sprang forward, and in a moment stood fascinated before it. No vision of fairy-land could surpass in splendour the amphitheatre around us. In front was the snowy sheet; below, the foaming and transparent basin bordered with frosted pebbles; and on every side, a mossy wall of perpendicular rocks, over which leaned many a tall and graceful cedar as if to gaze on the scene beneath. On each hand, and at comparatively regular distances, arose pilasters of solid ice to the very verge of the surrounding precipice, displaying the most exquisite chisellings, and reflecting the glance of the playful waters as brightly as mirrors of diamond. "Beautiful!" murmured my companion as it were instinctively. "Beautiful!" returned I, with the hurried precision of an echo.

"'Tis a glorious subject for Inman's pencil."

"'Tis a glorious spot," returned he, "for the revelations and outpourings of poesy! Have you a leaf of unwritten paper about you?"

"I shall forestall your revelations," laughed I, as I drew from an inner pocket my uncle Ben's scrap-book, and read aloud his own youthful lines, written on the spot some years before.

TO THE HIGHLAND BROOK AT WINTER.

Sweep on thy sounding course, wild stream,
To yonder still retreat,
Where Hudson waits, with sunny gleam,
His mountain child to meet.

Ah, hold not dalliance with the trout
That cleaves thy crystal wave,
Nor pause to list thy joyous shout
From echo's woodland cave.

No more, as erst in summer hours,
When forest walks were green,
The angler seeks the mossy bowers,
Enamoured of the scene.

Thy polished wave reflects not now
The redbird's flashing wings—
Forsaken on the leafless bough,
His lonely hammock swings.

A change has passed o'er mount and glade,
Since here the orchid died,
And mournfully the maple laid
Her crimson robes aside.

The hoary tyrant of the year
Resumes his icy reign,
His clarion march of winds I hear
Amid thy wilds again.

Though nursed in freedom's mountain keeps,
He hath a chain for thee!
As in the pride of storms he sweeps
O'er earth and sounding sea.

Then speed thee on, glad brook, nor rest
Along the sylvan wild—
Lo, Hudson waits with open breast
To clasp his highland child.

Haply—as whispering fancies teach—
When many a fall is passed,
And wintry hour, my lifeless reach
A peaceful rest at last.

"No more of that an thou lovest me," muttered the discomfited poet, as he put up his silver pencil-case, evidently a little piqued by my uncle's anticipation: "'tis quaint, fanciful; and yet, after all, I like those two lines descriptive of the hanging birds-nest." "They are so so," I returned, and replacing the manuscript, I sprang away round the extremity of the rocky enclosure, and soon reached the brink of the miniature Niagara. Took out my watch—half-past twelve. Thought I might calculate the height of the fall by tossing a pebble I had brought with me for that purpose, into the basin below. In my excitement, pitched, not the pebble, but the watch! Was over time so carelessly thrown away before? Query—What would Sam Patch have done in such a predicament? Felt very much like throwing myself down, not for the watch, but the novelty of the circumstance. Don't know why it is, but the noise of rushing waters plays the deuce with one's usual discretion. Assuredly there is something inspiring in wild tumultuous sounds. I have known those who shrunk from the brow of a low precipice in the stillness of forest scenery, bend fearlessly, nay, rashly over the brink of a lofty cataract. Often has my brain played a whirling while looking from the low tower of a country church; and yet I have sprung wildly along the very edge of Table Rock, and felt a reckless indescribable inclination to leap into the abyss below. In such situations, what is it but the rude and deep thunderings, that dispel the instinctive apprehension of danger, and render one wild and inconsiderate as a maniac? It is then that the hidden energies of a prouder nature are awakened within us, and we mock at terrors which at other times and places would shake us like a convulsion. I very much doubt if the hero of Patterson would have jumped from the mast-head of an ordinary vessel, into the stiller waters of the Wallabout. Query—Was ever a drummer known to be coward? Two—Winding up the stream, leaping from rock to rock, and passing carelessly from bank to bank, not "On the unsteady footing of a spear," but the huge trunks of prostrate trees, which the tempest had cast athwart the rushing waters. One continued succession of cascades skirted with the most gorgeous decorations of ice. Nature does such things admirably. Her resources are unlimited; her regalia magnificent beyond description, replete with radiant accumulations of beauty and of grandeur. In her exhibitions there is no stintedness—no lack of embellishment; but all is pomp and kingly profusion. Wish the good citizens of the metropolis would study her chaste munificence of ornament a little more practically: in that case, at least one fountain or statue, perhaps, might be found within their suburbs before the close of the present century. Brilliant crystallizations of ice on all sides. Sorry Sir Humphrey Davy did not strike upon some simple process to preserve them at all temperatures. Milkmaids might have worn diamonds then, that would outlustre the duchess of Devonshire's eyes. Climbed a precipice to examine a beautiful specimen of frost-work—foot slipped, and I tumbled sheer in the direction of the stream—caught a hemlock bough, and hung suspended over the roaring torrent. Thought of honest Sancho clinging desperately to a projection of the cave into which he had fallen, when he might have reached the bottom. Rather more dangerously situated than the worthy squire. Recovered terra firma, however, by an effort which would have immortalized Herr Cline, after losing my cap and one skirt of my coat. Half-past three—reached the pinnacle of the North Beacon—the highest peak of the Highlands. Glorious prospect from its lofty summit, whose rocky and bare scalp might shame "the bald of the first Cæsar." Felt somewhat exalted as I looked down on mountains and hills, groves and villages which encompassed me, and entered fully into the emotions of the man, who, once standing on a similar eminence, broke forth thus imperially, "Kingdoms and nations, to the right wheel, march!" Verily it is worth some exertion now and then to get literally, as well as figuratively, above the world; that one may send a glance abroad over the magnificence of nature. But then one feels a little humiliated as he surveys the dwindled and microscopic monuments of human industry, and reflects that the puny bipeds he sees crawling below, "showing scarce so gross as beetles," are his own brothers in insignificance. Mem. Never to be seen in a valley by a friend on the mountain: one looks so unimportant when thus viewed—no greater agrarian leveller than a valley, and no prouder aristocrat than a mountain.—Saw a steamboat on the river—puzzled to tell whether or not it was moving—thought of the wag, who, having asked his sluggish neighbour if he ever saw a snail, and being answered in the affirmative, returned, "Then you must have met it, sir!" Wind rather too familiar with my ears—prepared to descend. Wished I were an avalanche for ten minutes. Five—Reached an open meadow with a small pond near the centre, along whose polished surface swept in graceful curvatures, about thirty boys in uniform, glancing wildly in every direction, and waking the echoes of the neighbouring forests with the sound of ringing akates and shouts of holiday merriment. Wished I were a boy again, as I remembered the hilarious days when I too,

"Stained the swift skateler to my practised heel,
And whirled and gambolled on the giddy steel."

Drew near, stimulated by thrilling associations and attracted by the novelty of the scene. Happily met an old friend, the principal of the Highland Grove Gymnasium. Learned that these were his pupils on their Saturday-afternoon airing. My companion and myself warmly invited to take tea with him. Accordingly accompanied him to his elegant mansion near the Hudson. The building new, spacious, and commodious, standing amidst fruit and forest trees of every description, and surrounded by meadows, groves, and pasture-fields, and overlooking the northern entrance of the Highlands. Tea at seven—Charming sight to see thirty animated rosy-cheeked boys at the same table, mutually polite and attentive; and manifesting throughout all the ease and decorum of accomplished gentlemen. From eight till nine in the reading-room. Pleased to find my old city crony, the Mirror, amidst half-a-dozen of his metropolitan brethren. Read the president's message—thought he had better have seen the proof-sheet before it was issued from the Exchange. Ten—retired for the night—mused of Captain Basil Hall and Loo Choo. Eleven—fell asleep and dreamed I was—the Wandering Jew. PROTEUS.

We perceive by one of our late papers that the National Guards of Paris and the departments, are raising a subscription to present a monumental vase to General La Fayette. There seems to be no termination to the romantic interest of the life of this uniform patriot and veteran soldier. The incidents of his recent career have added much to his glory. Should the rumour of war between Russia and France prove to be correct, it is impossible to conjecture whither his strange destinies may lead him. The hero who fought in the western wilds by the side of Washington, may yet conduct an army through the snows of Russia.

THE DRAMA.

CRITICS AND CRITICISM.

To indite a theatrical criticism is a most ungracious task. The reputed dangers of Scylla and Charybdis, or Hell-gate without a pilot, with a rock on one side and a whirlpool on the other, are merely cases of parallel difficulty. Some suppose, that the chance of escape in either instance is improved by possessing a knowledge of the affair you attempt to handle, whether it be a pen or a rudder: in one case, an acquaintance with the branch of the art you criticise, is thought essential; in the other, a knowledge of local navigation. This, however, is the conclusion of an inexperienced calculator. It may be correct as regards that fickle element, the sea; but it seems to be contradicted in respect to any branch of the drama. There we are met by a vast array of appalling difficulties, not contemplated by the tyro who sits down in the simplicity of his heart to describe things as they are.

Unless we allow managers to be all perfect in their arrangements; tragedians, comedians, singers, "et id genus omne," so many unrivalled and dazzling meteors in the theatrical horizon, we are blind, or if not blind, we wilfully close our eyes and are partial. The fact is, that theatrical criticism has become so much the right (a right established by usage alone) of certain box-lobby loungers, that any person who attempts to use discrimination, and who does not either deal in wholesale praise or personal abuse, throws a censure upon the daily productions of the press, and as Gay says of the courtiers of his day,

"If you mention vice or bribe,
'Tis so pat to all the tribe,
Each cries, that was levelled at me."

This abuse at present has become a serious evil. What! may we not admire the delineations of Forrest, without admitting that he is possessed of all the graces and perfections attributed to the admirable Creighton? May we not think his representation of an Indian chief extremely forcible and faithful to nature, without being tied down to extol the blank verse of Metamora? May we not give every credit to the polished manner of young Kean, the classic correctness of his readings, and the studied beauty of his attitudes, without venturing to compare him with his father? May we not admire the softness and grace of Mrs. Hilson, without calling her "tragedy's favoured child"? May we not admire Madame Feron's execution, without praising her quality of voice, and "sympathetic graces of form"? May we not express our approbation of Mrs. Austin in Mandane and Ariel, and yet omit to praise her for Pasta-like pathos? May we not think Clara Fisher's personation of eccentric juvenility, beautifully graphic, and yet not be esteemed a Diogenes because we cannot cause our lachrymal fountains to overflow at her representation of Juliet, nor the waters of our soul to gush forth like the rock of Hebron at her vocal efforts? May we not also give every credit to the band of the Park theatre for the general performance of its duty, without being constrained to praise those old tunes to which they are so wonderfully addicted? May we not delight in the blazing Liverpool coal fires, the snug carpeting, the soft rose colour of the boxes, with their chaste ornaments, and the general elegance of the Park theatre, and then be allowed to express our unrestrained disgust at the barn-like, squalid appearance of the exterior? May we not think Master Burke a very wonderful instance of precocity, highly delightful in farce, without being compelled to acknowledge his pretensions to the representation of adult characters in the regular drama, otherwise than as a pleasing curiosity? and may we not compliment his performance on the violin, as charming for his years, without allowing that he has a right to be marvelled at for the gross puff of leading a band in the overtures of Rossini and Grétry, when we have proved that the music written by those composers has not been played? Certainly not.

Such is the interposing veto of sundry sage dramatic critics. Not that these gentlemen assail our positions, or prostrate us with a logical club. No. The argumentum ad rem is not their weapon; they have a prudent preference for the argumentum ad hominem. Attacking the motive of a writer, serves as a poor sort of apology for inability to assail his theory. But it saves a vast deal of trouble, and is much the safest course, for "Qui ambulat in tenebris, nescit quo vadit," i.e. "He that roams in the dark, may chance to fall down the back stairs."

Before quitting the ground, we must be allowed to level our critical weapon at a highly respected contemporary editor, but we hardly need add, with no very murderous purpose; for it is but truth to assert, that nothing personal, or that is not creditable to the gentlemanlike character of his journal, ever finds room in its pages. Having thus premised, let us ask, whether the worthy editor really believes that his comparison is a happy one, between the running a foot-race and the playing a concerto on the violin? He gravely assures us, that Captain Barclay, a celebrated pedestrian, actually made smooth the course on which he was to walk a gigantic match, by levelling mountains and filling up valleys, and yet no one detracted from the merit of the performance; then, adds our logician, why should any reasonable being quarrel with Master Burke, if he cut out all the difficult, and play only the smooth passages? his merit is equal to that of Captain Barclay—"Questio exemplum dedit." We have nothing to reply; such logic is unanswerable. But by way of corollary, allow us to quote an anecdote stated in a late biography: The oratorio of the Creation having been got up under the superintendence of the parish clerk of a small village in England, the singer of psalms, on being asked how his choir could surmount the obstacles of such scientific music, exclaimed, "We performed the oratorio excellently well; our organist cut out all the flats and sharps, and we sung all the naturals swimmingly!"

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

We are pleased to be enabled to promise the readers of this paper frequent communications from the writer of the article on the first page. Those acquainted with the popular literature of this country, will easily discover in "Knickerbocker Hall" the style of one of our most distinguished authors. So valuable a contributor cannot fail to add much to the interest of the Mirror.

The New Year.—Old time has at length brought us another new-year-day. We pause awhile in the toils of life—survey the scene, and share the general merriment. It is in truth a pleasant holiday—people should be happy if it were only for the sake of fashion. It is not in our power to cheer the multitude with substantial eatables and strong potations, but in common with our brother editors, we are willing to deal out for their gratuitous use any quantity of useful instruction. But perhaps they will excuse us from the customary recapitulation of past events or conjectures as to the future, while the actual present affords so many themes for reflection. If this agreeable festival cannot carry hilarity into every family—if they who bend over the bed of sickness of death—or who miss from among them some dear voice, without which mirth only moves to tears; if there (as there must be) such sufferers under the various calamities of life, who keep mournfully aloof from the rejoicing crowd, even they ought to participate in the general congratulation that while the world around us is convulsed with political revolutions, we are blessed with peaceful prosperity. Let us hope, however, that there are many who improve the opportunity uninterrupted by any sorrow. Besides the moral delight received by these from the didactic treasures delivered to them by editors and grave friends, they derive additional pleasure from their familiarity with the gracious sirloin of beef and the princely plum pudding. It would go against our feelings to break in upon the happiness of the many convivial parties assembled on this occasion, for the purpose of indulging themselves in good cheer and good fellowship, with any sad recollections of the past or croaking predictions of the future. Happy they who can disperse painful memories, and persuade hope to cast the rays of her cheerful torch upon the untrodden paths which lie dimly before them. There are sentimentalists who hear the popping of a champagne cork and cry, "thus pass away the hopes of man;" while others view the sparkling foam with eyes as bright, inhale it and are happy.

England.—We do not feel ourselves called upon at this time to give any account of the revolutions and rumours of revolutions in Europe, nor any surmises respecting their consequences. For these the public will naturally refer to the numerous daily papers, whose columns are crowded with such matters. But, as our London correspondent has furnished us with a communication, by the recent arrivals, which takes a new view of the late disturbances in England, we publish it verbatim, with this only comment, that we do not acknowledge the justice of any rule by which we are compelled to adopt the opinions of all who write for this publication. An editor should be held responsible for personal abuse, slander, and remarks calculated to wound the feelings of private individuals, published under his direction; but to exclude from his columns an interesting essay, temperately written, merely because it contains sentiments not exactly in accordance with his own, would be a species of illiberality, inconsistent with the spirit and freedom of the American press, and which we have always carefully avoided. We make this observation in reply to one in an evening journal, and not with any especial allusion to the following letter.

POLITICS—KING'S REFUSAL TO VISIT THE MAYOR—MOBS—RIOTS—NEW POLICE—REFORM—REVOLUTION—MOONSHINE—CARICATURES, ETC.

London, November 16, 1830.

It was my intention not to have troubled you with politics for some time to come, but I am at present labouring under a severe political attack, and the disorder must have its course. A man cannot reside any length of time in a lunatic asylum without being liable to become touched; neither can he breathe a tainted atmosphere without being subjected to the disorders which it engenders. A political fever, of a very virulent character, is at present raging in London—I have caught it, and already my best friends would scarcely know me. The time has been when I could discourse of literature, theatricals, and similar light and elegant topics of conversation, but that is all over, and now "from morn till noon—from noon to dewy eve," with a shameless indifference to person, time, or place, I canvass government measures and favour individuals in my immediate vicinity with perspective speculations on the prospects of society.

The packet-ship which brings this letter to your shores, will also bring files of English papers, the early portions of which will be filled with most portentous rumours and conjectures, very alarming and mysterious in appearance, and in substance signifying—nothing. The principal cause of these is the very unexpected refusal of the king to dine with the lord mayor on the ninth instant. Great preparations had been made—the lives of many turtles had been sacrificed—houses were to have been illuminated along the whole line of the procession—scaffoldings had been erected, and some apartments were already let for the day, for more than their rent for the year, when lo! the day preceding the day, his majesty sent word that by the advice of his ministers, he declined dining at the east-end on account of anticipated disturbances. This was enough—away went the stocks, and never stopped until they had tumbled down a distance of three per cent.—outlines of plots and dire conspiracies were whispered about, shops were shut before their time, and, as nothing elevates the spirit of a Londoner so much as the prospect of a disturbance, whether for good or for evil, people's faces brightened with pleasurable anticipations, though, at the same time, they were extremely anxious to avoid each other. "I am afraid we shall have bad work." After the mountain had been in labour for some time, the mouse at length crept forth in the shape of a letter from alderman Key to the duke of Wellington, informing him that he, as lord mayor elect, could not take upon himself to answer for the peace of the city the next day, unless a strong military detachment was in attendance. For this piece of zealous indiscretion, the worthy alderman has been most severely reprimanded by his brethren; and it must be truly gratifying to his feelings as he walks along the street to see himself already caricatured in every possible way. He is for the most part represented as an alderman with a mule's head, frightening Wellington and Peel into fits by his braying; underneath is written, "Don—Key, (donkey) or an English alderman rewarded for his services by a Spanish title." In the house of lords the next evening, and in the papers, the duke of Wellington was very severely handled for what was termed his "causeless" alarm. Whether it was causeless or not, it is hard to say. Certainly, if he thought that any general political disturbance would have taken place, he was never further mistaken in his life; but if he merely apprehended a simple riot, then I think his apprehensions would have been verified.

About ten o'clock on the evening of the day on which the procession was to have taken place, I thought I would walk to that part of the city through which it would have passed, to see the "rows" which it was anticipated would by that hour be in a state of great forwardness. I first, however, took the precaution of arraying myself in apparel of an uninviting appearance, knowing full well that a decent coat would attract more attention than was exactly agreeable; a very ancient one was therefore resuscitated for the occasion, and a hat put on proof against further injury; my pockets I emptied with the exception of a handkerchief, knowing that they would be emptied for me, and then walked forth. On my way thither, the usually crowded streets were almost deserted, and for a mile and a half not a single police-man was to be seen. On arriving at the Strand, this was sufficiently explained. For a line of about two miles, the streets were crowded with a succession of mobs, through some of which, on account of their density, it was almost impossible to make way. The police were drawn up at different places in bodies of two and three hundred, though unarmed, except with their short staves. They and the different mobs were standing eyeing each other. Several affrays had already taken place as windows had been wantonly broken, and all attempts to take the offenders into custody were strenuously resisted by people armed with bludgeons, &c. Not any one, to use a favourite expression of Sir Walter Scott, had been "done to death," though broken heads, and simple and compound fractures were no rarity.

There is something frightful and appalling in a "rush" of one of these heavy mobs, as the thousands of respectable lookers-on are immediately swept away by the current, and mingled indiscriminately with the mass of baser matter, of which it is principally composed. I was lucky enough to gain the shelter of a door-way, and see the tide rush by me; and in good faith, the yells and shouts of the ringleaders, and the shrieks and unavailing cries of the fallen and helpless, were not at all pleasing or composing. Those who sit quietly by their peaceable firesides, and chat complacently of the "great moral lessons taught by revolutions," ought to witness a few affrays of this kind. Not that bit this, and a thousand times as much, ought to be risked rather than submit to oppression; but really a revolution for fashion's sake, and to be like one's neighbours, is any thing but desirable. Such an event here too would be a very different affair from that in France. There the middle classes joined in it—here they would be unanimously opposed to it; there all classes of society were animated with a consuming hatred of their government, which swallowed up all minor considerations—here even the worst have not, I believe, any particular dislike to or interest in what is going on, with the exception of the organization of the new police, which touches them nearly, as it is injuring their business in a way that is not to be borne; they would, therefore, look at a revolution in a cool and professional point of view, and only rejoice in it so far as it afforded glorious opportunities for burglary on an extensive scale. I can scarcely give you an idea of the staple commodity of which a grand metropolitan mob is formed; but imagine all the inhabitants of your most filthy districts congregated together, and then suppose all those multiplied by ten or twelve, and you will have some notion (though New-York must yield to London in accomplished and desperate villains) of no small portion of those who bellow "reform," which, heaven knows, they stand very much in need of. In saying this, I do not by any means wish to insinuate that even the majority of those who call themselves "reformers" are of this description of character. Thousands of worthy and industrious men, misled by the declamations of Hunt, Cobbett, Carlile, and other orators of a similar description, and of great local fame, join in the cry. Now the country certainly wants reform, though not such as they mean, and must have it; for many parts of the British constitution are the creations of an age of comparative darkness, and having outlived the manners and habits of the times which rendered them necessary, are now unsuited to a more enlightened state of society. But to uproot the whole of a system which contains so much of what is really good and admirable, because some parts are defective, would be about as wise as to pull down a fine house because the chimney smoked. But there is no fear of this. I am more firmly convinced than ever that there will be no revolution; and if any transatlantic friend of mine differs from me in opinion, and is willing to bet a thousand dollars that there will be one in a twelvemonth, as Falstaff says, "let him lend me the money and have at him."

It may be interesting to you to know that my pocket was picked of the handkerchief before alluded to. As I fully expected this, I should have been much disappointed if it had not been the case. I put it into my pocket as a free-will offering, because I thought it would be wrong to go and see the sight without contributing my mite towards rewarding those who were so zealous in contributing towards it. C.

Public outrages.—The brutal assaults continually offered to females in the streets of this city, are of a nature calculated to inflame the public mind. It must be acknowledged that our community contains a class of ruffians, so corrupt and insolent as to perpetrate these repeated and atrocious outrages in an organized system of action, or to what cause are we to ascribe the frequent occurrence of abuses fitting the barbarity of a gothic age, or the anarchy of a people involved in the horrors of war and revolution? The watchmen should redouble their vigilance, and the mayor and police spare no exertions to bring these wretches to the severest punishment. Upon this subject there prevails a general feeling of curiosity, alarm, and indignation.

A POPULAR BALLAD—WRITTEN BY THOMAS MOORE, ESQ.

ALLEGRETTO.

Come, May, with all thy flow - ers, Thy sweet - ly scent - ed thorn, Thy cool - ing ev'n - ing show - ers, Thy fra - grant breath at morn; When May - flies - haunt - the will - low, When

May - buds tempt the bee, Then o'er the shin - ing bil - low My love will come to me.

SECOND VERSE.

From eastern isles she's winging
Through wa'ry wilds her way,
And on her cheek is bringing
The bright sun's orient ray;
Oh! come and court her hither,
Ye breezes mild and warm,
One winter's gale would wither
So soft, so pure a form.

THIRD VERSE.

The fields where she was straying,
Are blest with endless light,
With zephyrs always playing
Through gardens always bright;
Then now, oh! May, be sweeter
Than e'er thou'st been before,
Let sighs from roses meet her,
When she comes near our shore.

HYPERCRITICISM.

Is Dr. Johnson's remarks upon Shakspeare's play of the "Two Gentlemen of Verona," there is an instance of unjust censure, rather curious in that penetrating observer and habitual critic. He complains that the poet "makes Proteus, after an interview with Sylvia, say, he has only seen her picture," and regards the play as a "strange mixture of care and negligence." There may be other inconsistencies in the piece, but surely this is not one. So far from being the result of negligence, I esteem it a very apt and forcible figure, by which Proteus endeavours to express his consciousness of Sylvia's power over his feelings. He visits the duke's palace at Milan, where he sees his friend Valentine, and, for the first time, beholds his beautiful mistress. Although he had previously been enamoured of Julia at Verona, the charms of Sylvia immediately inspire him with a new and more enthusiastic passion. On being left alone after the first interview, the briefness of which scarcely enabled them to exchange a word, he thus soliloquizes, in language which would suit the lips of many more modern youths:

"Even as one heat another heat expels,
Or as one nail by strength drives out another,
So the remembrance of my former love
Is by a newer object quite forgotten.
Is it mine eye, or Valentine's praise,
That makes me, reasonless, to reason thus?
She's fair, and so is Julia that I love;—
That I did love, for now my love is thawed;
Which like a waxen image 'gainst the fire,
Bears no impression of the thing it was.
Methinks my zeal to Valentine is cold,
And that I love him not as I was wont;
Oh! but I love his lady too, too much;
How shall I dote on her with more advice
That thus without advice begin to love her?
'Tis but her picture I have yet beheld,
And that hath dazzled my reason's light;

But when I look on her perfections,
There is no reason but I shall be blind."

There is no inconsistency here. Proteus does not mean to say literally that he has not seen Sylvia, and that he has beheld a painting of her, but rather that his short interview amounted to little more. The gentleman was, I presume, one of those warm-hearted youths, who, from the frequent recurrence of similar emotions, might be supposed to have acquired some experience upon the subject. He knew that a very lovely girl may possess mental powers of fascination, not perceptible at a glance; may be able to deepen, by the displays of a warm affectionate disposition, the impression which her beauty had made, and he reasoned thus very justly: "If from one look her personal charms have so fastened my fancy upon her, what will become of me when I shall hereafter be delivered to the influence of those nameless and endearing graces, which give an engaging female every moment an increasing power over her lover? I have not yet encountered any of these. I have merely seen her face, and that is no more than to have seen her picture."

I am ignorant how that part of Dr. Samuel Johnson's metaphysical system was constructed, which lights up so mean a material as dust with such heavenly fires; but Shakspeare understood the matter better. Many fresh and living pictures, painted by "nature's own sweet and cunning hand," strike my eye, amid the crowds which swarm around us, and pass away; and even before I discovered the fountains of pleasure demurely folded up under the various stereotype editions of William Shakspeare, I used to think,

How shall I dote on her with more advice,
That thus without advice begin to love her—
'Tis but her picture I have yet beheld,
And that, &c.

A PARODY.

'Tis the last log of fuel,*
Left blazing alone;
All its mates of the cellar
Have vanished and gone.
No branch of its kindred
Beside it I mark,
To reflect back its brilliance,
Or give spark for spark.

I'll not leave thee, thou lone one,
Let who will condemn;
Though the household are sleeping,
I'll sleep not with them,
Till sadly I've scatter'd
Thy ashes about,
And seen the last glimmer
Go suddenly out.

hensoon will I follow,
For why should I stay,
When the rest of the fam'ly
Are sleeping away?
When the embers have faded,
And the last spark has flown,
Oh, who would inhabit
This cold room alone?

THE CHANGELING.

BY MISS E. BOGERT.

Away then, to thy pleasures!—thou hast sacrificed thy heart
To the cold, selfish world, with all its treachery and art:
And thou hast worshipped at the shrine of flattery, far and wide,
Till all thy former self is lost in vanity and pride.

Away then!—I have loved thee far too truly and too well,
I would not call those feelings back within my heart to dwell.
No, lady, no—in bitterness I gather up again
The dead affections wasted long upon a thing so vain.

Go, listen while thy beauty lasts, to adulation's voice:
Go seek the idle multitude, the hydra of thy choice;
But think not when the dark days come, as come they must to all,
That thou canst thy neglected friend again to thee recall.

Love's dying embers may not be re-lighted with a breath,
The heart's allegiance broken once, is broken until death:
It may forgive, but ne'er can feel again as once it felt,
Although returning kindness strive its ice-bound streams to melt.

Away, away!—oh, tempt me not with that bland smile of thine,
To dream I have once more thy love, and grieve thou hast not mine.
Go cast thy spells round other hearts; for severed is the chain,
Which being but too closely bound, the sooner snapped in twain.

Go, with the lesson on thy mind, that thy own constancy
Must be the talisman to keep another true to thee.

Away, while fashion's vot'ries wait to follow in thy train,
And if among them, one be dear, that one at least retain.

The world thou lovest may bow awhile to thy unrivalled powers,
And o'er life's thorny path may hang a coronal of flowers;
But it will wither on thy brow, as time moves fleetly on,
And life can have no second spring when its first bloom is gone.

ORIGINAL MORAL TALES.

THE OUTWITTED.

BY MRS. E. MUSSET.

ALL who knew Simon Shuffle wondered how he came to burthen himself with the charge of supporting an orphan child. It was true the boy had nobody else to take care of him, and people wondered the more on that account; for Simon was seldom known to befriend the unfortunate. It was given out that the boy was left penniless, and that story was generally credited; for none would believe that a child who inherited any property, would have been consigned to the sole guardianship of old Shuffle. People, however, differed in opinion, as they will do on every subject, and many were the cross-questionings and catechisms little Harry Franks had to undergo, from those whose curiosity or benevolence led them to wish to know something of his history. All that Harry could tell them was, that "he used to live a great way off, in a place called London, with a sweet pretty mamma," and that "one day his papa and mamma and he went into a large ship, and sailed many days, and that at last poor mamma got sick, and could not speak to him, and that she died, and they put her in a box, and threw her in the water, and he cried a great deal, and poor papa cried, and the sailors could hardly keep him from jumping into the water after mamma; and then the ship stopped, and papa carried him to the house of a good friend, as he said, and then papa got sick and died too." This artless recital was often repeated, and Simon's only child, little Rosamond, used to throw her white chubby arms round Harry's neck, as soon as he began it, for she knew that he would cry before he had finished. The grief of childhood is evanescent. Harry would go to play with Rosamond, and soon forget the tears his own simple eloquence had called forth. Sometimes he helped her to dress her doll, and sometimes she rode behind him on his cane horse.

Mr. Shuffle's wife had died before his daughter was a year old, and her place in the family was supplied by a distant relation, who demanded but a moderate compensation for her services, and she consequently suited him very well; added to this, she agreed so easily to his plans of frugality, (for Simon, though immensely rich, was excessively parsimonious,) that he believed in her he had acquired a real treasure. In truth, the good woman was so devotedly fond of Rosamond, that she would have made almost any personal sacrifice to retain her situation. She readily admitted Harry to the family circle, and extended to him the maternal cares she bestowed on her darling, for her heart was "full of the milk of human kindness," and she pitied, and consequently loved the little orphan, who had been deprived in so short a space of both parents, and left to the mercy of a stranger. This good lady had her doubts as to the reality of Simon's statement respecting the child's destitute situation, but she took care to conceal them, as she had no proof to support her suspicions.

"Aunt Becky," for so the good housekeeper was called in the family, was not without her share of female ingenuity, and as she always exerted it with good motives, it was certainly excusable. She did every thing in her power to create in Harry's patron an interest in his favour; she carefully concealed from him all his infant misdemeanors, at the same time correcting them herself, with the gentleness of a mother. She knew that Mr. Shuffle prized a saving disposition above every thing else, so she frequently gave the boy a penny, charging him to keep it in his pocket, and at some propitious moment she would exhibit the hoarded treasure, boasting how long the little boy had kept it. Harry soon learned, that after his penny had been shown to his protector, he was at liberty to do as he chose with it; and after every exhibition he always flew to the cake-shop, and shared his purchase with his playmate.

As Henry grew older, however, these occurrences became less frequent, and were at length wholly discontinued; for Mrs. Becky could not but perceive by the arch looks of the boy, he was aware of their motive, and she was too conscientious to encourage him in artifice.

One day, in the midst of his play, Harry suddenly broke off, saying,

"I have not had a penny this long while! I wish I had some of those pretty yellow pennies my own papa gave my new papa to keep for me."

Mrs. Becky started, but asked, as quietly as she could,

"Were there a great many, Harry?"

"O, yes! aunt Becky," answered he, "two big bags full."

This was confirmation of the housekeeper's surmises, and while she sat looking with intense interest at the child, she pondered in her mind the circumstances which corroborated her suspicions. She knew that Harry's father had resided in England many years; she had heard him say that he had undertaken the voyage to his native country, in the hope of bettering his health, which was declining; and she knew that during the period which intervened between the time of his arrival and that of his death, which occurred four days after, he had seen only his son, Mr. Shuffle, and herself; that a short time before his death, which was sudden, she had heard him desire Mr. Shuffle to send for a notary, and twice he expressed some impatience at his not having arrived, though she had no knowledge of Mr. Shuffle's having attended to his request. Now what could the dying man want of a notary, unless to draw up a will? and why leave a will, if he had nothing to bequeath?

These thoughts had often puzzled the worthy woman, but she dared not give utterance to them, for she knew that if she offended Simon Shuffle, she must relinquish her situation in his family, and consequently be separated from Rosamond; a new tie now bound her to her present home, and that new tie was the orphan Harry Franks. Could she bear to leave the destitute child in the power of a stranger, who would, perhaps, use him ill? and what would her mere surmises weigh against the assertions of her employer? The boy's testimony might, however, go far.

Mrs. Becky was in a state of complete bewilderment; her cogitations had never so puzzled her in the whole course of her life. She had heard Mr. Franks say that he had no relations, and she concluded that his friendship with Mr. Shuffle had commenced in early life, and that in consequence of his long residence abroad, he was unacquainted with the disposition and character of the man to whose care he had, from necessity, consigned his son.

Mrs. Becky was a simple-minded woman, but truth and nature speak no less forcibly to the simple heart than to the more refined. The boy acquired new claims upon her in consequence of her suspicions of the injury intended him, and she resolved to watch over and befriend him to the extent of her power.

The orphan had also another warm friend in the family—this was James Upton, a youth employed by Mr. Shuffle as clerk. James was of a mild and obliging temper, and of steady habits, which constituted him a great favourite with the worthy housekeeper, who made it a point to show him all the favour and indulgence in her power. The young clerk was fond of reading, and it was even whispered among his companions that he was sometimes guilty of composing verses; be that as it may, the fact is certain, that he not unfrequently applied to Mrs. Becky for a stray sheet of writing paper, which might haply escape the vigilant eye of Mr. Simon Shuffle, who would have considered such an appropriation as little less than sinful prodigality.

It so happened, a few days after the death of Harry's father, that the young scribbler, as usual, asked his friend to supply him with some paper. Mrs. Becky desired him to seek it in the drawer of a table which had been in the sick man's room, undisturbed, since his death; a few sheets had been procured for him, but it was supposed he had never been able to use them. James found the paper, and conveyed it to his own room, where, on removing a part of it, he saw a leaf on which something was written. In common with all romantic minds, James had a sort of superstitious reverence for any thing which had belonged to the dead; he therefore looked with a feeling of awe upon the characters traced by a person whom he had seen a few hours previous to his decease, and who from his severe calamity in the loss of his wife, and from his own death among almost total strangers, had awakened a great degree of interest in his heart. As his eye almost unconsciously rested on the manuscript, he perceived that it was a letter—ending abruptly, evidently unfinished, and without superscription. The name of Arthur Franks, however, appeared on the page which commenced with the words "Dear Freeman." Then followed a brief and hurried account of the death of the writer's wife, and his arrival in America. He mentioned that, feeling the rapid advances of severe illness, he had repaired, immediately on landing, to the house of Mr. Shuffle, the only person with whom he had kept up any correspondence in this part of the Union. He further expressed his fear of leaving his infant son to the mercy of strangers, whose kindness, perhaps, even the liberal provision he had been enabled to make for him, might not ensure. Here the writing broke off. The name was scrawled, evidently with a failing hand.

James Upton pondered upon this subject, and remembered that he had several times heard his employer remark that "the poor, penniless little boy would be an incumbrance upon him," but that "he would take care of him while he was so young, for his father's sake."

The astonished clerk resolved to preserve the paper with the utmost care, and for this purpose he placed it in a box, and confided it to the charge of his mother, who was a widow, and supported herself by keeping a school for small children. The daughter of Simon Shuffle went to this school, and there also Mrs. Becky managed to persuade him to send Harry, as Mr. Shuffle gravely remarked, "it was a pity the boy should not be taught to read, poor as he was."

Upon the little favourite of her son, the worthy school-mistress bestowed her utmost care and kindness; under her wise and gentle discipline, the good seed which nature had implanted in his heart grew and flourished, and thus, though a destitute orphan, the early years of our hero glided away in happy unconsciousness. Every body smiled on, and spoke kindly to him—every body except his protector, Mr. Simon Shuffle.

It is one of the worst traits of human nature to dislike those whom we have injured, and as Mr. Shuffle was not slow in discovering faults in his protégé which no other person could perceive, it is no wonder that Harry avoided the presence of his surly guardian as much as was in his power. But to his youthful playmate, Rosamond, his young heart clung with the most intense fondness; in all their little school debates he was her champion; he carried her satchel, untied her bonnet, smoothed her flaxen curls, and led her into the presence of "the mistress" with as much apparent pride as if already conscious that her beauty and sweetness reflected lustre upon himself.

Time wore away, and Harry Franks grew a handsome, high-spirited boy, whose abilities far outstripped the means of instruction which were allowed him, though James Upton studied with unwearied diligence in order that he might employ the information thus gained for the benefit of his favourite, and long after Harry was considered too old to attend

Mrs. Upton's school, all the leisure hours of her son were devoted to his instruction.

Mr. Shuffle now began to talk of the propriety of binding Harry apprentice to some business, but a secret cause seemed to withhold him from putting the design in execution. He at length spoke to James Upton upon the subject, whose importance in the family, time had much increased, for he was no longer considered as "the boy," but was advanced to the station of head clerk in Mr. Shuffle's establishment. James objected to the plan of apprenticeship, stating that the lad's acquirements fitted him for the situation of clerk in some mercantile house. Mr. Shuffle was surprised, and evidently not pleased with this information; he had of late become more sour and morose than usual, and the presence of the orphan really seemed to give him pain. He frequently chid Mrs. Becky for her foolish indulgence, as he called it, to the "proud fellow, who seemed to receive every mark of favour as a right," and forbade his daughter the society of her companion.

This prohibition, however, had little effect besides that of stimulating the young people to invent means to escape his vigilance; for Rosamond, though meek and tractable on every other, seemed endowed with most determined obstinacy on this occasion.

At length Mr. Shuffle's treatment of Harry became so unkind, that his high spirit found it difficult to submit to it; and after consulting with his friend, the clerk, he informed his patron that it was his wish to seek employment and a home elsewhere. Mr. Shuffle harshly told him, "he might go where he pleased."

At this answer the youth, summoning all his courage, at the same time repressing his rising choler, said,

"Sir, has the money my father left in your charge for my use been expended on my board and education, or may I expect that enough remains to enable me to begin the world for myself?"

Old Shuffle was confounded. He had no idea that Harry knew or remembered any thing of the deposit, which had tempted his cupidity. He knew the boy was playing in a corner of the room when he held the last conversation with his dying father; but the thought that a child of five years old might have noticed the circumstance and treasured it in his memory, had never entered his mind. There was, however, no proof, and Simon Shuffle, repressing his agitation, replied that "the very trifling sum that his poor father had to leave, had been expended long ago;" and that "as it amounted to barely a few guineas, he could know but little of the value of money to ask so foolish a question."

Harry was silenced, but not convinced. He acquainted his friend Upton with the result of their conversation, and as they sat in solemn conclave, with Mrs. Becky at their head, the subject of their debate, in the person of Mr. Shuffle, entered, and informed Harry that "a friend of his, a merchant, wanted a clerk, and that he might go as soon as he chose."

Harry waited for no second intimation, but forthwith packed up his clothes, which, thanks to Simon Shuffle's parsimony, were not very heavy, dashed off the moisture from his eye with the back of his hand, as he bade good-by to Mrs. Becky, kissed a tear from the red cheek of Rosamond, which liberty, although turned of fourteen, the young lady did not resent, passed his arm through that of his friend Upton, and set off for the counting-house of the merchant.

It so happened that Harry's employer could not accommodate him with board in his family, so he took up his abode in the house of Mrs. Upton, and there he lived as happily as a prince, for his friend James spent most of his evenings with his mother.

Rosamond often visited her former school-mistress, and Mrs. Becky sometimes took her knitting and spent the evening with them, so that Simon Shuffle achieved no great exploit when he turned Harry out of his house.

For four years matters went on tolerably well; but as our young hero grew older, it was observed that his pen was often stuck behind his ear, while he sat in a musing attitude, as if there were something in his ledger which puzzled him extremely. The fact was, that Mr. Shuffle had discovered his frequent meetings with his daughter; and, determining, if possible, to break off all intercourse between them, had sent her into the country; and though the youth, like his kingly namesake of old, possessed a clue to the "bower" of his "fair Rosamond," he was often at a loss how to escape from his tasks long enough to avail himself of it.

Just after Harry had completed his twenty-first year, Mrs. Becky came one evening to tell him that a stranger, who called himself Freeman, had been to inquire of Mr. Shuffle concerning him; she could not say what information the gentleman had received, but she heard him mention where he lodged, and had carefully noted the direction.

James and Harry instantly set out to find the stranger; and the latter, after making himself known, asked how it happened that now, for the first time, a friend of his deceased father inquired concerning his welfare?

Mr. Freeman briefly told him, that "he had sailed for England probably about the time of his father's arrival in America—that the news of his mother's death, and also that of his father, had reached their friends in England through the medium of the captain of the ship in which they sailed, who said he had been worth a large fortune, but what became of it he did not know; one thing, however, he had ascertained, and that was that the safety of the child was left to the guardianship of a Mr. Shuffle; to him, therefore, a friend of Mr. Franks had written, and received for answer, that Harry was consigned to his care by his father; further than this they knew nothing; and as neither of the deceased parents had any relatives, no more inquiries into the situation of their child were ever made." Mr. Freeman added, that "he had remained in England from that period until he sailed for this country, and that soon after his arrival here, he proceeded to ascertain the fate of the son of his old friend. From Mr. Shuffle he had learned that the trifling sum left by Harry's father being expended on his education, he had placed him with a worthy merchant, with a view to his future benefit. Mr. Freeman was somewhat surprised to learn that Mr. Franks had left his affairs in so impoverished a state, and resolved to see his son the next day, and aid him with his counsel, and his purse, if necessary."

Mr. Shuffle's fraud was soon made manifest to all three; but how to obtain restitution was a matter for serious consideration.

Harry, however, had his own thoughts upon the matter, and this was about the time when he had anticipated paying a visit to his banished fair one. He told Mr. Freeman that "he was obliged to be absent for a day or two, and they would proceed to take the necessary steps on his return." In the mean time Mr. Freeman intended to seek some of the letters of his deceased friend, that by comparing the writing with that discovered by James, and producing other proofs in his possession, the fact of Mr. Franks having left property might be the more manifest. Harry paid his proposed visit, and it is quite probable that he communicated its result to Mrs. Becky and James, for they both looked as if they were in possession of some secret which they should like to communicate if they dared.

Mr. Shuffle had now brought one of his own plans to maturity, and little suspecting our hero's visit to the country, he sent for his daughter home a few days after Harry's return, and after some circumlocution informed her that she must prepare to be married.

Seeing her father was serious, Rosamond began to weep, but every now and then she was forced to laugh. This conduct exasperated Mr. Shuffle, who was never remarkable for the placidity of his temper, and at length he said, stamping tremendously, at the same time,

"Leave off your airs, miss, or it shall be the worse for you! I am determined, and I will not be teased in this manner! Have you got the hysterics that you won't listen to me? I tell you that next week you are to be married to my friend Mr. John Smith! Do you hear now?"

"Yes, my dear father," sobbed the frightened girl, "I do hear, and I am very sorry you are determined—very sorry to disappoint you—but I cannot be married next week to Mr. John Smith, for I was married last week to Mr. Harry Franks!"

Simon Shuffle stood aghast, the personification of enraged surprise. Luckily for Rosamond, Mrs. Becky, who was in the next room, had overheard the whole conference; she now ran in to prevent mischief, and before Mr. Shuffle could find breath to speak, a loud knock at the door announced a visitor.

Simon Shuffle shuffled his daughter and his housekeeper out of the room, while he admitted the person who had arrived so mal-apropos for the prosecution of the design which he conceived before he could find words to speak it. Mrs. Becky hurried her charge through the back door, and conveyed her to the house of Mrs. Upton, "for," said she, "where can a wife be so safe as under the protection of her own husband?" The visitor who disarranged Mr. Shuffle's plan, was no other than Mr. Freeman, accompanied by James Upton.

I never heard exactly how they managed it; but after a pretty long conference, old Simon came to the conclusion that, bad as matters were, it was not worth while to do any thing to make them worse; and, after the adjustment of some few preliminaries, Harry Franks became possessed of a capital to begin business in a very respectable style; and Mr. Shuffle, thinking it best to hush up matters, and not wishing to exasperate people who were so determined, consented to forgive his daughter and make his son-in-law his sole heir—a promise which he kept at his death, and Harry Franks is now one of the wealthiest and happiest fellows in the city. James Upton and he still live on terms of the most affectionate friendship. Mrs. Becky always finds a snug corner at their fire-side, and while she plies her knitting, sometimes smiles, when she happens to think how Simon Shuffle was outwitted.

"KILLING, NO MURDER."

A TRUE STORY.

I AM a sober, middle-aged, married gentleman, of a moderate size; with moderate wishes; moderate means; a moderate family; and every thing moderate about me, except my house, which is too large for my means, or my family. It is however, or rather, alas! it was, an old family mansion, full of old things of no value but to the owner, as connected with early associations and ancient friends, and I did not like the idea of converting it into a tavern or boarding-house, as is the fashion with the young heirs of the present day. Such as it was, however, although I sometimes felt a little like the ambitious snail, who once crept into a lobster's shell and came near perishing in a hard winter, I managed for ten or twelve years to live in it very comfortably, and to make both ends meet. My furniture to be sure was a little out of fashion, and here and there a little out at the elbows; but I always persuaded myself that it was respectable to be out of fashion, and that new things smacked of new men, and were therefore rather vulgar. Under this impression, I lived in my old house, with my old fashioned furniture; moderate sized family and moderate means, envying nobody and indebted to no one in the world. I had neither gilded furniture, nor grand mantel glasses, nor superb chandeliers; but then I had a few fine pictures and busts, and flattered myself they were much more genteel than gilded furniture, grand mantel glasses, and superb chandeliers. In truth, I looked down with contempt not only on these, but on all those who did not agree with me in opinion. I never asked a person to dinner a second time who did not admire my busts and pictures, considering him a vulgar genius and an admirer of gilded trumpery.

But let no man presume, after reading my story, to flatter himself he is out of the reach of the infection of fashion and fashionable opinions. He may hold out for a certain time, perhaps, but human nature can't stand for ever on the defensive. The example of all around us is irresistible, sooner or later. The first shock given to my attachment to respectable old fashioned furniture and a respectable old four-square double house, was received from the elbow of a modern worthy, who had grown rich, nobody knew how, by presiding over the drawing of lotteries, and who came and built himself a narrow four-story house right at the side of my honest four-square double mansion. It had white marble steps; white marble door and window-sills; folding doors and marble mantel pieces, and was as fine as a fiddle, in doors and out. It put my rusty old mansion quite out of countenance, as every body told me, though I assure my readers, I thought it excessively tawdry and in bad taste.

But, alas! such is the stupidity of mankind—I could get nobody to agree with me.

"What has come over your house lately?" cried one good-natured visitor; "somehow or other it don't look as it used to do."

"What makes your house look so rusty and old fashioned?" said another good-natured visitor.

"Mr. Blankprize has taken the shine off of you," said Mrs. Sowerby; "HE HAS KILLED YOUR HOUSE!"

Hereupon the spirit moved me to go out and reconnoitre the venerable mansion. It certainly did look a little like a chubby, rusty old fashioned quaker by the side of a first-rate dandy. I picked a quarrel with it outright, which by the way was a very unlucky quarrel. I was not rich enough to pull it down and build a new one; and it is great folly to quarrel with an old house until you can get a better. But if I can't build, I can paint—thought I, and put at least as good a face on the matter as this opulent lottery man, my next-door neighbour. Accordingly I consulted my wife on the subject, who, whether from a spirit of contradiction, or, to do her justice, I believe from a correct and rational view of the subject, discouraged my project. I was only the more determined. So I caused my honest old house to be painted a bright cream colour, that it might hold up its head against the scurvy lottery man.

"Bless me!" quoth Mrs. Smith—"What is the matter with this room—It don't look as it used to do?"

"Why, what under the sun have you done to this room?" cried Mrs. Brown.

"Protect me!" exclaimed Mrs. White—"Why, I seem to have got into a strange room. What is the matter?"

"You've killed the inside of your house," said Mrs. Sowerby, "by painting the outside such a bright colour."

It was too true; this was my first crime. Would I had stopped here!—but destiny determined otherwise. It happened unfortunately that my front parlour carpet was of a yellow ground. It was to be sure somewhat faded by time and use; but it comported very well with the unpretending sobriety of the outside of my house, under the old régime. But the case was altered now, and the bright cream colour of the outside "killed" the dingy yellow carpet within. So I bought a new carpet, of a fine orange ground, determined that this should not be killed. It looked very fine, and I was satisfied. I had done the business effectually.

"Bless my soul!" cried Mrs. Smith—"What a sweet pretty carpet!"

"Save us!" exclaimed Mrs. Brown—"Why, you look as fine as twopence!"

"Protect us!" cried Mrs. Sowerby—"What a fashionable affair!" Then casting a knowing look around the room, she added, in a tone of hesitating candour—"But don't you think, somehow or other, it kills the curtains?"

Another murder! thought I—wretch that I am, what have I done? What is done cannot be undone; but I can remedy the affair. So I bought a new suit of yellow curtains. I'll twig Mrs. Sowerby now.

Mrs. Sowerby came the very next day. "Well, I declare now this is charming! I never saw more tasty curtains. But, my dear Mr. Sobersides, somehow or other, don't you think they kill the walls?"

Murder again! four stone walls killed at a blow! But I'll get the better of Mrs. Sowerby yet. So I got the walls coloured as bright as the curtains, and bade her defiance in my heart the next time she came.

Mrs. Sowerby came as usual. Her whole life was spent in visiting about every where, and putting people out of conceit with themselves.

She threw up her eyes and hands. "Well, I declare, Mr. Sobersides, you have done wonders. This is the real French white"—which by the way, my readers unlearned should know is yellow—"But," continued this pestilent woman—"don't you think that these bright coloured walls kill the chairs?"

Worse and worse! here was twelve innocent old arm-chairs, with yellow satin bottoms and backs, murdered in cold blood, by four unfeeling French-white stone walls! But there is a remedy for all things but death. I forthwith procured a new set of chairs as yellow as custard, and snapt my fingers in triumph at Mrs. Sowerby the next time she came.

But, alas! what are all the towering hopes of man! Dust, ashes, emptiness, nothing. Mrs. Sowerby was not yet satisfied. She thought the chairs beautiful. "But then, my dear friend," said she, after a solemn and appalling pause—"my dear friend, these bright yellow satin chairs have killed the picture frames."

And so they had, as dead as Julius Cæsar; the picture frames looked like old lumber in the midst of all my improvements. There was no help for it, and away went the pictures to Messrs. Parker & Clover. In good time they came back, "redeemed, regenerated, and disenthralled." I was so satisfied now that there was nothing left in my parlour to be killed, that I could hardly sleep that night, so impatient was I to see Mrs. Sowerby.

That pestilent woman, when she came next day, looked round in evident disappointment, but exclaimed with great appearance of cordiality,

"Well, now I declare, it's all perfect; there is not a handsomer room in town."

Thank heaven! thought I—I have committed no more murders. But I reckoned without my host. I was destined to go on murdering in spite of me. The spring was now coming on and the weather being mild, the folding doors had been thrown open between the front and back parlours. This latter was furnished with green, somewhat faded I confess. I had heretofore considered it the sanctum sanctorum of the establishment. It was only used on extraordinary occasions, such as Christmas and new-year days, when all the family dined with me, bringing their little children with them to gormandize themselves sick. The room looked very well by itself; but, alas! the moment Mrs. Sowerby caught sight of it, her eye brightened—fatal omen!

"Why, my dear Mr. Sobersides, what has got into your back parlour? It used to be so genteel and smart—Why, I believe I'm losing my eyesight—the green carpet and curtains look quite yellow I think—O, I see it now—THE FRONT PARLOUR HAS KILLED THE BACK ONE!"

The d—!—here was another pretty piece of business. I must either keep the door shut all summer and be roasted, or be charged with killing a whole parlour, carpet, curtains, chairs, sofas, walls and all!

It would be but a mere repetition to relate how this wicked woman again led me on from one murder to another. First the new carpet "killed" the curtains; then the new curtains "killed" the walls; the new painted walls "killed" the old satin chairs—and so by little and little all my honest old green furniture went the way of the honest old yellow.

"The spell is broke at last," cried I, rubbing my hands in ecstacy. Neither my front or back parlour can commit any more assassinations. Elated with the idea, I was waiting on Mrs. Sowerby to the front door, when suddenly she stopped short at the foot of the old fashioned winding staircase, the carpet of which, I confess, was here and there infested with that modern abomination—a darn. It was moreover rather dingy and faded.

"Your back parlour has killed your hall," said Mrs. Sowerby. And so it had. Coming out of the splendour of the former, the latter had the same effect on the beholder as a bad set of teeth in a fine face, or an old rusty iron grate in a fine room.

I began to be desperate. I had been accessory to so many cruel murders that my conscience became seared, and I went on, led by the wiles of this pestilent woman, to murder my way from the ground floor to the cockloft, without sparing a single soul. Nothing escaped but the garret, which having been for half a century the depository of all our broken or banished household gods, resembled Hogarth's picture of the "End of the world," and defied the arts of that mischievous woman, Mrs. Sowerby.

My house was now fairly revolutionized, or rather reformed, after the old French mode, by a process of indiscriminate destruction.

I did not, like Alexander, after having thus conquered one world sigh for another to conquer. I sat down to enjoy my victory under the shade of my laurels. But, alas! disappointment ever follows at the heels of fruition. It is pleasant to dance until we come to pay the piper. By the time custom had familiarized me to my new glories, and they had become somewhat indifferent, bills came pouring in by dozens, and it was impossible to kill my duns as I had done my old furniture, except by paying them, a mode of destroying these troublesome vermin not always convenient or agreeable. From the period of commencing housekeeping until now, I had never a single occasion to put off the payment of a bill. I prided myself on always paying ready money for every thing, and it was an honest pride. I can hardly express the mortification I felt at being now occasionally under the necessity of giving excuses instead of money. I had a miserable invention at this sort of works of imagination, and sometimes, when more than usually barren, I got into a passion, as people often do when they don't know what else to do. More than once I found myself suddenly turning a corner in a great hurry, or planting myself before the window of a picture shop, studying it very attentively in order not to see certain persons, the very sight of whom is always painful to people of nice sensibility.

Not being hardened to such like trifles by long use, I felt rather sore and irritable. Under the old régime it had always been a pleasure to me to hear a ring at the door, because it was the signal for an agreeable visitor; but now it excited disagreeable apprehensions, and sounded like the knell of a dun. In short I grew crusty and fidgety by degrees, inasmuch that Mrs. Sowerby often exclaimed,

"Why what has come over you, Mr. Sobersides? Why I declare somehow or other you don't seem the same man you used to be?"

I could have answered, "the new Mr. Sobersides has killed the old Mr. Sobersides." But I said nothing, and only wished her up in the garret, among the old furniture.

My system of reform produced another source of worrying. Hitherto my old furniture and myself had been so long acquainted, that I could take all sorts of liberties with it. I could recline on the sofas of an evening; or sit on one of the old chairs, and cross my legs on another, without the least ceremony. But now, forsooth! it is as much as I dare do to sit down upon one of my new acquaintance; and as for a lounge on the sofa, which was the Cleopatra for which I would have lost the world; I should as soon think of taking a nap in a fine lady's sleeve. As to my little rantipole boys, who had hitherto feared neither carpet, chair, or sofa, they have at length been schooled into such awe of finery that they walk about the parlour on tiptoe; sit on the edge of a chair with trepidation, and contemplate the sofas at a distance with the most profound veneration, as unapproachable divinities. To cap the climax of my system of reform, my easy-old-shoe-friends, who came to see me without ceremony, because they felt comfortable and welcome, have gradually become shy of my new chairs and sofas; and the last of them was the other evening fairly looked out of the house by a certain person, for spitting accidentally upon a new brass fender, that shone like the sun at noon-day.

I might hope that in the course of time these evils would be mitigated by the furniture growing old and sociable by degrees, but there is little prospect of this, because it is too fine for common use. The carpet is always protected by an old crumb cloth, full of holes and stains; the sofa and chairs are in dingy cover-sluts, except on extraordinary occasions, and I fear they will last for ever—at least longer than I shall. I sometimes solace myself with the anticipation that my children may live long enough to sit on the sofa with impunity, and walk on the carpet without going on tiptoe.

There would be some consolation in the midst of these sore evils if I could only blame my wife for all this. Many philosophers are of opinion, that this single privilege of matrimony is more than equivalent to all the rubs and disappointments of life; and I have heard a very wise person affirm, that he would not mind being ruined at all, if he could only blame his wife for it. But I must do mine the justice to say, that she combated Mrs. Sowerby gallantly, and threw every obstacle in the way of my system of reform; advocating the cause of every piece of old furniture with a zeal worthy of better success. I alone am to blame in having yielded to the temptations of that wicked woman, Mrs. Sowerby; and as a man, who has ruined himself by his own imprudence, is the better qualified for giving good advice, I have written this sketch of my history to caution all honest, sober, discreet people against commencing a system of reform in their household. LET THEM BEWARE OF THE FIRST MURDER! b.

LITERARY NOTICES.

THE AMERICAN QUARTERLY REVIEW.—The last number of this admirable work exceeds in interest many of its predecessors. The articles are written with point, and come recommended by undoubted talent. There is one more especially on which we should be pleased to dwell, and perhaps we may do so at further leisure—it is that touching the question of absolute abstinence from all vinous and fermented liquors, which has so long been agitated between the conductors of the Journal of Health and the editor of the National Gazette. The contest has been a very unequal one, the intellectual forces of the two parties being widely different; and even if the native strength of the experienced and learned critic were not so immeasurably superior to the combined powers of his antagonists, the admirable skill and dexterity with which he uses his weapons of attack and defence, give him decided advantages. The ultra doctrines broached, and, perhaps, over-zealously supported in the Journal, are, however, fashionable and popular. The editor of the Gazette has been censured by some writers who really are so intolerant that they can bear no opposition, and listen to no argumentation; but certainly the candid and the temperate (in opinion we mean) will admire the fearlessness, honesty, and ingenuity with which he defends his peculiar notions. We recommend the article as a curious collection of interesting literary information, not fearing it can possibly have a tendency to weaken a firm adherence to all sensible rules of temperance.

LIFE OF BYRON.—The second and last volume of Moore's Life of Byron will be published next week by the Harpers. The interest of the literary world respecting this work has been greatly excited. "However universally the genius of the noble poet may have been acknowledged, so many various opinions of his moral character have gone abroad, that the general curiosity in regard to it is both intense and natural. Few can peruse the glowing and lofty productions of the "warrior bard," and follow him through the closing scenes of his life, without being conscious of a strong wish to place the most favourable construction upon his actions.

VOYAGES OF DISCOVERY OF THE COMPANIONS OF COLUMBUS.—Washington Irving has taken out a copyright for this new work, and it may be soon expected from the press.

NEW-YORK ANNUAL REGISTER FOR 1831.—Mr. Williams will publish this useful volume about the first of February.

TO HER WHO IS FAR O'ER THE SEA.

BY ALPHA.

To her who is far o'er the sea,
How fondly my memory turns,
When no sounds in the solitude be,
And the night-star uncloudedly burns;
When the lonely reality yields
To the spell of the magical night,
And I wander once more through the fields
Which I trod when my bosom was light.

Then I see her in beauty the same,
And I feel all the truth of her sighs;
But ah! when I call on her name,
No answering fondness replies.
I start from that shadowy sleep,
And silence and solitude say,
"Well—well may the wanderer weep,
When the loved of his soul is away!"

RURAL TRANQUILLITY—THE ROCK MOUNTAIN.

IN the interior of the state of Georgia is a mountain composed entirely of naked granite, which on the map is set down as the Rock mountain. Finding myself once, in the course of my wanderings, within a day's ride of this curiosity, I exerted my influence to obtain a waggon, a horse, and a friend, and was soon jogging along a road which wound through almost endless forests, over dead leaves, into deep valleys, across rugged hills, and through the branches of streams which, although at this spot easily fordable with the aid of a horse, broaden gradually into wide rivers, and empty their waters into the Atlantic. At the foot of this extraordinary rock is a log hut, which the folks thereabout call a house of entertainment. Here we arrived some time after dusk. A long ride through these forests, where driving required considerable skill and constant attention, had overcome me with a feeling of drowsy fatigue. A cup of melancholy beverage, which passed under the appellation of coffee, was swallowed, without any material injury, and after basking a little time in the red light of a blazing fire, which they make here of light dry pine-knots, nearly as combustible as powder, and caressing two or three fine large dogs, which rested in the capacious fire-place, we retired to rest. My chamber was fashioned of logs, several inches from each other, and various openings appeared in the roof. I was soon deposited in a bed, rude but scrupulously clean, and began to lose myself in that delicious dreaminess, which makes sleep so welcome to the weary, when the sudden bark of a dog startled me. He was answered by about ten or fifteen others, in all the notes of the gamut. They growled, barked, howled, and yelped, and uttered all the sounds of which dog's language is capable; then came trampling of horses' feet, the crack of several whips, the report of a gun, and the footsteps of the hounds patting across the entry, which was entirely exposed to the air. I started up, and putting my head through an aperture in the wall, where neither glass nor shutter offered any opposition, I perceived that a party of hunters had arrived, fully equipped for the pursuit of deer, and intended to rest at the "house of entertainment" till day-break enabled them to resume their sports. It was now late; a starry sky stretched broad and clear over head, but the air was chilly, and I was feign to bid good night even to the yellow moon, just rising above the forest trees. Casting, therefore, a hasty glance at her spotted disk, her shadowy vales, her bright deserts and lofty mountains, and another at the quiet night scene, the dim dark woods, the old fences and rude log-huts, faintly silvered over with the pale moonlight, and the glorious track of vast blue distance which canopied that silent solitude, with its flashing gems, I left poetry and prose to take care of themselves, and murmuring a sleepy "beautiful!" once more laid down to rest. Again the world of reality faded into indistinctness, a thought of my distant home crossed my mind, and pleasant faces appeared floating around me in the darkness; then I remember catching the flash of a star through the roof, and gravely debating to myself by what mismanagement among the heavenly bodies it had descended into my chamber. Yet although eleven or twelve hundred miles distant from the thundering of carts and the shuffling of feet which had so often broken my meditations in the city of Manhattan, I discovered that rural felicity had its own characteristic tumults. My slumber was destined to be again broken. The dogs growled and snapped as if in sudden fight, then after a brief silence, during which I closed my leaden lids, a little scoundrel of a puppy set up a scream, and a deep-mouthed bay from some old veteran of a bull-dog struck in like a line on the bass-viol. The whole pack were roused. Their feet patted briskly across the entry floor, then suddenly stopped with a snarl and a snap; I could almost see their lips curl, their tails and ears start up erect; then they patted off again. I might, however, have slumbered after a little time, even had the whole canine pack opened the cry at my ear, for one becomes accustomed to any particular and uniform confusion. A sailor's rest is not broken by the stormy violence which thunders upon deck, and it is said that many soldiers under Sir John Moore enjoyed the benefit of sleep while actually engaged in marching. I was about following their example when my enemies received a reinforcement from all the awakened population of the plantation. The horse neighed, the oxen bellowed, the geese scudded across the road, flapping their clumsy wings, and improving the concert with a general gabble, chickens cackled, a guinea-hen and a peacock exclaimed aloud, and a rooster joined the chorus with a crow, so triumphantly impertinent that I leaped out upon the floor, decidedly angry. Almost giddy with the want of sleep, I looked out of the window; the dogs were all collected beneath it, yelling most furiously. By the light of the moon, which shone into the room, I descried a large horsewhip in the corner. With a sudden exertion of my strength and skill, I proceeded to an immediate application, which struck the assembly of industrious quadrupeds with considerable astonishment, and bating a few expressive yelps, as an acknowledgment of some of my most judiciously-aimed strokes, a general silence ensued. The dogs sneaked off to nameless holes and corners; the cows, with their serious countenances, stood looking on, with grave and silent approbation; the horse poked his head through a hole in his dilapidated log-stable, and gazed quietly around to see what was going on; the geese formed a small platoon in the farthest corner of the yard, with faces expressive of conscious guilt; and the saucy rooster, strutting off with a vain effort to preserve his importance, fairly yielded fame to safety, and like a prudent politician after the defeat of his party, awaited beneath the shadow of an old waggon, till the vicissitudes of fortune should again call him into action. Having thus routed my numerous foes, I indulged myself with a sleepy glance through one eye upon their discomfited forces, and once more stretched myself on the downy couch. Again my lids closed, with the sweet feeling which nature has caused to spring as a necessary consequence out of toil and privation; and again the fairy wonders of imagination began to displace the homeliness of reality. But ah! as the moralists say, "the fallacy of human hopes;" the hunters came into my room, and occupied the bedstead which stood in the other corner, and their hoarse heavy snores soon announced their situation. My previous proceedings had also disturbed the slumbers of a child, who had been reposing in the next room with its mother. His cries reduced the affectionate author of its being to the necessity of putting in practice the various conciliatory arts usual on such occasions, and these proving unsuccessful, she proceeded forthwith to execute a brief process, often resorted to for the benefit of young travellers over the flowery path of youth, and which, such is the unhappy destiny of human nature, few, alas! have altogether escaped. This raised matters to a climax. The child screamed till the house rung. The hunters turned in their creaking bed, and grumbled hoarse fragments of angry oaths; again the shrill impudent voice of the puppy set the tune, and the broad-faced bull-dog bayed in answer; again the geese flapped across the road, the chickens cackled, and the guinea-hen screamed, and, "to crown the enchantment of the scene," in the midst of all the noises elicited upon the occasion, the persevering rooster, perched upon the wheel of the cart, beneath which before he had slunk in disgrace, beat his side with his wings, and gave a crow, which in my sleepiness I almost thought was intended as an insult. I ruminated a moment upon the proper course to be pursued, when nature, overcoming all opposition, asserted her rights, and I was awakened by the glorious beams of the rising sun shining through a wall, which might have enacted a part in "Pyramus and Thisbe." Eager to gain a morning view, we equipped ourselves with goodly oaken sticks, partly to defend us from improper familiarity with the rattle-snakes, which are said to abound there, and partly to assist us in climbing the steep. A sudden change of the weather, however, enveloped us in a fog, as we reached the foot of the rock, or stone mountain. It is a bare mass of granite, between two and three thousand feet high. The appearance of similar elevations, composed of ordinary earth, and clothed with verdure, fails to impress the mind with the idea of solidity and durability, which it conceives from the contemplation of this gigantic rock, heaved upward in the form of a stupendous billow. A gradual descent of the surrounding country towards its base forms a circular basin of several miles in circumference, of which it is the centre; and the apparently interminable forests, which wave around it, strike the eye in a strong contrast with its bleak and desolate nakedness. From the gradual ascent of one side the curious passenger approaches the brink of an immense and almost perpendicular precipice. On reaching the "perilous edge" of this abrupt declivity, the giddy view broke suddenly upon me. Mere description conveys but feebly any idea of the effect of such a scene upon the imagination. I had so limited a knowledge of the localities of the place, that I advanced much nearer the precipice than was necessary or agreeable. As I tremblingly measured the depths of the distance, I felt that the least breath of air, almost the agitation of my own thoughts, would have precipitated me down the abyss. Yet a fearful fascination riveted my eyes upon the scene, till I became conscious of a sensation of giddiness; scarcely I dared make the motion necessary for turning; instinctively I stooped, although the broad slab afforded nothing for me to grasp, and my readers had nearly escaped much injudicious scribbling, when I recollected an anecdote, headed, "Look aloft, you lubber," and cast my eyes towards the summit. There stood my companion, rather surprised at my quadruped propensities, and I hastened to follow his example in admiring the sublime productions of nature at a greater distance.

A hermit, disgusted with the world, and anxious to try the experiment of solitude upon his disposition, should choose this very spot. Nothing can be farther separated from all the associations of human life. Neither gloomy cave, nor uninhabited island, nor secluded forest, could so perfectly assure him a dreary and dismal loneliness. On earth some object would remind him of home or friends; some warbling bird would awaken a softened feeling; some opening flower or clinging vine would call up thoughts of beauty and love. The common goings on of nature's sweet operations would send gleanings of human joys and wishes through the dark and broken passages of the most ruined heart. But this grand and silent mountain, striking its foundations, fancy cannot conjecture how deep, into the bosom of our planet, would conjure up in his mind only thoughts of other ages—of the primitive convulsions which gave it birth—of the ephemeral nature of all human events, when compared with this durable monument of nature's caprices—of the limitless time during which it may thus defy the storms of heaven, or of the awful shock by which its adamantean bosom may be rent asunder. FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTERS FROM LONDON,

To the Editor of the New-York Mirror.

NUMBER EIGHT.

London, September 12.

I MADE a promise in a former letter that I would, in the absence of other subjects, give you some idea of the various works of art and other curiosities in and around London: I shall, however, confine myself to the more modern wonders of the metropolis, amongst the most conspicuous of which stands or, as the classical cockneys at first christened it, the Coliseum, simply, it is to be supposed, because it was as unlike as possible, in every respect, that celebrated work of antiquity. However, the extreme ridiculousness of erecting a building after the model of the Pantheon, and then calling it the Coliseum, soon caused this title to be changed, and it was re-baptized the Colosseum on account of its colossal dimensions. It certainly is, in many respects, one of the most astonishing works of the age. The exterior is severely plain and noble. On entering you pass into a grand saloon (the largest in London) filled with statues, many of them by the most eminent men in England. The plan by which this saloon is supplied with works of art is excellent, and mutually advantageous to the proprietors and artists generally, who are allowed to use it as a place of exhibition for their labours. As the different figures are purchased by visitors and removed, their places are speedily filled again, and thus a continual variety is presented. After you have tired yourself with Venuses, Dianas, Joves, Apollos, and the rest of the mythology, you either walk up a long spiral staircase or enter what is called the "Ascending Room," and the room walks up stairs for you; at least you take your seat very much at your ease on the ground floor, and without any further motion on your part, find yourself in the space of five minutes nearly in the attic! This is indeed a luxurious and labour-saving age, when men can no longer be at the trouble of walking from room to room, but require to have a room move to different parts of the building instead of them. About a dozen people can ascend at once, and there are books and pamphlets provided to amuse them until the room stops! When you step out of the gallery, London seems to lie beneath. The effect is almost magical, and you begin to entertain doubts concerning the state of your optics. To use moderate language, the scene before you is perfectly wonderful. The mere idea of drawing with scrupulous exactness the city of London—a city in which you can travel a distance of twenty miles and three quarters nearly in a straight line through an almost unbroken range of houses—seems monstrous. Yet here it is—every square, crescent, street, court, alley, public building, and private dwelling, as they appear on a clear summer morning from the top of St. Paul's before the smoke rises, are depicted with map-like accuracy. The busy Thames, covered with boats and shipping, is seen winding through the midst; its banks rich in noble hospitals, capacious docks, and antique towers, and its stream crossed by the finest bridges in the world, until it stretches far beyond the smoky limits of the city to the old splendours of Hampton court and the rural beauties of Richmond. The whole surrounding and highly picturesque country, dotted with villages and suburban villas, for thirty or forty miles in every direction, is faithfully delineated, the distances being skillfully and carefully preserved. Such is the lilliputian minuteness of this brooding picture, that hundreds of natives can stand and point out their own houses, and amuse themselves by tracing the windings and turnings of well known streets for miles. The picture covers forty thousand square feet, or nearly an acre of canvass, about one-fourth the size of your Park; and the supposed circumference of the horizon from the point of view is one hundred and thirty miles.

This immense work was projected by Mr. Horner (an American, I believe) and the whole of the sketches made by him. This indefatigable man used to get out of his bed at two and three o'clock, and was to be seen every morning perched on the ball of St. Paul's, waiting for the sun rising in order to get forward with his labours before the fires were lighted and the local clouds, which daily take their station over London, mustered together. The sketches alone occupied two thousand sheets of paper, and then the work was, as it were, only commenced. The whole had to be combined and transferred to canvass; and as no one individual could accomplish such an undertaking in a sufficiently short period, several artists were necessarily employed. Now, as painters are proverbially perverse and self-opinated, each of those gentlemen had his own peculiar style and notions, which of course he would not depart from, and Mr. E. G. Paria, the principal painter, had to go over the whole himself, retouching different parts and reducing it to perfect harmony. One of the greatest difficulties was to preserve the true perspective from so elevated a point of view on curved canvass, as by the closing in of the dome of the building, that portion of the picture on which the greatest distance is represented is, in fact, the nearest to the spectator. All difficulties, however, gave way before money, perseverance, and ingenuity, and the illusion is complete.

The Swiss Cottage, and the attempted imitation of Swiss scenery in the rear of the building, which the papers made such a noise about, is, I think, a failure. The cottage is a curious piece of workmanship, but the prospect from the window falls a little short of what one paper described it, "consisting," as it said it did, "of terrific rocks and caverns, amongst which a cascade dashes from an immense height into a lake which spreads beneath the windows." There certainly are rough stones and darkish holes for "terrific" rocks and caverns, and a cascade of a few gallons as certainly comes splashing into a pool about two feet deep beneath, but all this does not give exactly a full idea of the scenery of Switzerland. Much taste and ingenuity have certainly been displayed in the management of limited means, but the whole is puerile and insignificant compared with the other portions of the exhibition.

ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.

After leaving the Colosseum, five minutes walk brings you to the gardens of the Zoological Society, which, if not as wonderful as the place you have quitted, are, upon the whole, even more interesting and agreeable. No American, unless he has been out of America, ever saw a tolerable collection of wild and strange animals; for those dirty little affairs occasionally to be met with in Chatham-street, where a man stands at the door with a trumpet and composes his own music extempore, as he has occasion for it, are not to be taken into account. In this country there are very large menageries, maintained at an enormous expense, containing rare and curious birds and quadrupeds from every portion of the globe; but as inferior as the most miserable monkey-show is to the best of those, so is the best of those to the animals in the Zoological Gardens; not so much in number and variety, as in the perfect state of health and natural beauty in which they are preserved by judicious treatment and an accurate knowledge of their several habits and modes of living. These delightful gardens are formed out of a portion of the Regent's Park, under the superintendence of a society of gentlemen who have devoted much of their fortune, time, and attention to the study of zoology, and who have here gathered together an unequalled collection of nature's works. The grounds are laid out with consummate skill, and without any apparent regard to the expense. They are beautifully diversified with hill and dale, and so planted with choice trees and evergreens, that the eye can at no one point embrace the whole prospect. The trim gravel walks keep "winding with sinuities along" around gay parterres, and by the side of banks covered with the most brilliant and delicate flowers, and ever and anon bring you to some snug little valley with a tiny lake of pure clear water in the middle of it, on which are sporting an hundred or two varieties of water-fowl; some of the most elegant shape and gorgeous plumage, from all parts of the globe, living and feeding amicably together, and enjoying themselves by waddling on the soft green grass, which is so thick, and kept clipped so uniformly close, as to resemble a velvet carpet—or else swimming around their nests, which are formed on an island in the centre of the lakelet—or taking the benefit of a shower bath from a fountain which springs up in the midst of them. Flocks of pigeons, of various choice kinds, who have their residence hard by, keep wheeling and floating above the place, and add much to the beauty and harmony of the scene, by alighting from time to time on the green, and mingling sociably with their amphibious neighbours. As you pass hence along fragrant walks, in the midst of nature's sweets, you come unexpectedly upon perhaps a den of ferocious wolves, who have a large space in the open air allotted for them to walk around in, but secured by strong, though light and elegant iron-work. Indeed, this is the case with nearly all the cages, being formed in the shape of an arch, and constructed of iron or wire grating according to the strength or ferocity of the prisoners. Most of the brutes have their withdrawing-rooms to retreat to when fatigued with seeing too much company. Some idea may be formed of the quantity of ground occupied, when a space equal to a couple of moderate sized rooms is allotted to two Indian pheasants.

The leading object throughout is to make the dwellings of the various animals correspond as much as possible with what they have been used to in their native state. Thus the residences of lions, tigers, leopards, and the other inhabitants of the torrid zone are heated by stoves to a certain temperature, indicated by the thermometers placed around; while an extensive square-flagged court, sunk twenty feet in the ground, is the place allotted for the Norwegian and other bears. The great polar bear has a large reservoir of water wherein to cool himself when he waxes warm, and which, if not cold enough to remind him of his "regions of thick-ribbed ice," is at least sufficiently so to preserve him in health and spirits. In another part you will see the mountain-goat bounding up a pile of rocks to his lofty habitation, and beneath the Brahmin bull and the lama of Thibet grazing indolently on the verdant meadow. Here the majestic lion, stalking sullenly to and fro—the savage tiger, grinding his teeth in impotent rage—the fierce, beautiful, and restless leopard, beating against his prison-bars—and there the peaceful varieties of the deer kind—the red and fallow deer, the gazelle, the antelope, and the roebuck—animals that have supplied the poets with a thousand similes—moving around with the grace and elegance peculiar to their nature. Here again a "wilderness of monkeys" playing all sorts of fantastic tricks—and there a flock of birds from the tropics, whose rich plumage, as they fly, glittering around in the sun, almost dazzle the sight, and impart an air of enchantment to the scene. In a large circle, separated from each other, are the birds of prey—eagles, vultures, falcons, hawks, kites, &c. and not far distant larks, linnets, goldfinches, and the other peaceful warblers of the woods.

No description of scenery is perfect without water. No other element imparts such ideas of grandeur, sublimity, and resistless force, of animated cheerfulness, or calm dreamy tranquillity. Its artificial introduction here, though necessarily on a small scale, is much greater than could have been anticipated, and is so managed as not to have the appearance of having been so introduced. It is conveyed by means of pipes laid under ground from a canal hard by; and as it can be heightened, lowered, and changed at pleasure, is always clear and pure. The spaces allotted for water-fowl are such, that in each, hundreds of all sorts and sizes may swim together without jostling each other; and the amphibious animals have by no means a niggard supply. Their places of habitation are generally built on a little island in the middle of the water, and are constructed with much taste, judgment, and a skilful eye to picturesque effect, being formed, for the most part, of rough flint stones and shells, irregularly disposed, and overgrown with moss; in the crevices and on the top mould and seeds have been thrown, and thence have sprung out grass and hardy flowers and shrubs. Underneath, the lazy seal, the industrious beaver, and the thievish otter, live very much at their ease; excepting that the poor beavers have been deprived of sight, as it is the nature of those animals not to reside in any place not fashioned by themselves, and, could they see what they were about, they would speedily destroy their dwelling. The otter has always a large concourse of people watching his manœuvres, as every hour or so he goes a fishing for something to eat. It is quite an animating sight to see this "tyrant of the finny race" pursuing his prey, which he never fails to secure in five or ten minutes. After he has brought his fish to land, he seats himself at the entrance of his cabin, and taking hold of his struggling victim by the tail with his fore-paws, he holds it up on end, commences at the head, devours regularly downwards, and half the poor thing is swallowed before the other half is defunct. Of all animals I think an otter and a rat have the most cruel, treacherous, and villainous looking eyes. But if I were to go on and dilate in this way, I might fill a volume. One of the most interesting parts of the exhibition is a collection of dogs, amongst which are two beautiful Spanish mastiffs from the island of Cuba, such as are used to hunt the runaway slaves—two still more beautiful Italian wolf-dogs, an Esquimaux dog, brought by Captain Parry; &c.

Though the Society is yet in its infancy, it has already filled up the ground it originally possessed, and has succeeded in obtaining a grant of about twice as much more. The expense must be enormous; for, to say nothing of the food and attendance such an immense number of animals require, a number of men are constantly employed in laying out the new grounds and constructing habitations. Another large establishment has also to be maintained where animals are kept until places are provided for them in the gardens. Yet the whole is liberally thrown open to the public gratis, or at least nearly so, only one shilling each being required. This shilling, I presume, was at first intended to defray in part the expense of servants, &c., but such are the numbers of people, independent of members and their families, who visit these gardens, that this trifle from each has amounted, in two years, to within a fraction of the very considerable sum of sixteen thousand pounds sterling, or nearly forty thousand dollars a year.

Notices are posted up requesting visitors not to give money to any person connected with the establishment, and you are perfectly free from any solicitations of the kind. There is one rule, however, that is never departed from. No person can be admitted without a ticket, but all that is required to obtain this is that the applicant be of a decent and respectable appearance, and as it is presumed that such a person will not wish to be seen with any but decent and respectable people, he is allowed to bring as many of his friends and acquaintances with him as he pleases. As the gardens are situated at the extremity of the west end, they are quite a place of fashionable resort, and their distance from the heart of the city prevents a very great influx of the sight-seeing cocknies, except on holidays! There are always, however, some genuine ones present. I heard one lady, who just came up as the polar bear was taking his cold bath, exclaim to her husband—"O la! does that 'bear grow in the water?' to which he responded—"No, love, it grows on the hicc!" (see.)

When you add to the other attractions of the Zoological Gardens that on a fine day hundreds of graceful and beautiful women are to be seen sauntering along the shady walks, or fluttering like butterflies from sight to sight, it may easily be imagined that there are more unpleasant places wherein to spend an hour or two.

C.

* From Brentford town, "a town of mud," to Hyde Park corner, is thirteen and three-quarter miles, and from thence to the end of Shadwell nine more. With the exception of one quarter of a mile, I am informed there is a continued line of houses on each side of the way, and the greater part of the journey is certainly through a dense population extending for miles on each side.

BUT—"But" is to me a more detestable combination of letters than "No" itself. No is a surly honest fellow, speaks his mind rough and round at once. But is a sneaking, evasive, half-bred, exceptionous sort of a conjunction, which comes to pull away the cup just when it is at your lips.

THE FINE ARTS.

THE AMERICAN LANDSCAPE.

THE first number of this work is among the annuals offered to the public at the commencement of the present year; it is published in the quarto form, and contains six views, viz. Weehawken, Catskill Mountains, Fort Putnam, Delaware Water Gap, Falls of the Sawkill, and Winnepesaukee Lake, engraved by Durand from paintings of distinguished artists. Accompanying each of these is a description, either written by Mr. William C. Bryant, or furnished by friends familiar with the beautiful scenes here presented to the public.

The subjects are chosen with great taste, and represented with beauty and effect. The descriptions are drawn up in a style of singular richness, yet without departing from the simplicity becoming a lover of nature, who is all grace and simplicity. We should expect no less from Mr. Bryant, who, both as a poet and a writer of prose, has, we might almost say, no equal in this country in the former, and no superior in the latter. The engravings will bear a comparison with those of any of the annuals, either foreign or domestic, that we have seen, and furnish ample demonstration that the arts only require sufficient encouragement to reach a point of perfection here such as ages alone have produced in the old world. To those who are fond of the charms of nature in all her grandeur, loneliness, and magnificence, as well as in her softer features; to those who feel their hearts warm and expand at the contemplation of American scenery, pictured by American artists, and embellished by American writers, we warmly recommend this production. It would reflect disgrace on the taste as well as the patriotism of our countrymen were it to fall to the ground for want of patronage.

Were we to find any fault with these pieces, it would be with the clouds, which are somewhat stiff, heavy, and opaque. This, we conceive, is the fault of all, with the exception of perhaps one. They want that lightness, softness, and transparency which would enable them to rest on the bosom of the air, and seem too heavy for the medium in which they are suspended. Such ponderous matter would sink to the earth any where except in a picture.

While on this subject we will take occasion to observe, that this density and opacity of clouds is a fault too common among our artists. Mr. Cole, with all his high merit in landscape, falls in his clouds; and we may make the same observation generally of most of our landscape painters. It is a grievous fault, and spoils many an otherwise beautiful picture. It is not impossible to mend, and it deserves to be mended. The work is for sale by E. Bliss, Broadway.

THE CENSOR.

THE LITTLE GENIUS.
No. 101.

It was late at night. I sat alone before my fading fire. The tempest raged without. The flame of my lamp shot up with a momentary gleam and expired. Silence and shadow reigned in the solitary chamber, and thoughts of sadness came over me. Then a soft hand was in mine, and a gentle voice woke a feeling of joy that trembled in my heart like a chord of music on a harp, for the Little Genius was with me.

"Welcome, sweet spirit," broke from my lips. "My soul was dark, and thine influence comes down through its still and secret recesses as summer light steals in among the gloomy passages of melancholy dungeons, and paints the rugged walls with rosy softness."

"I know thy mind," he said; "thy wish is natural—thy fears are just; let me show thee beautiful nature, and behold the destiny of man."

Spread out before me in the mirror, stood a forest. Giant oaks shadowed the green fresh grass of a lovely valley with broad and verdant branches. The blue violet and unfolding rose grew around, tangled vines in blossom were clinging together, and shining through the arches of an ancient bridge, a stream led my eyes along its sloping banks—a white-barked maple bent across it as if to view itself in the glassy water. No sound was heard, but sometimes a leaf came rustling down, or an acorn dropped heavily, or a bull-frog splashed into the smooth brook, wrinkling all its silver surface, and breaking into trembling fragments the silent forms in its fairy world.

A youth approached—health and pleasure were in his countenance—strength appeared graceful in his manly limbs. Upon his shoulder he bore a burthen, but animated by the impressive beauty of the scene, he cast it down. It produced a sound as of ringing metals and some broad golden pieces escaped from their prison, and lay brightly and strangely around on the tender green grass and among the blue and crimson flowers. The boy seemed musing on the sight—he spoke in a low voice.

"Precious key to the glorious pleasures of life; blessed be the destiny that made thee mine. Thou art my shelter from the storms of the world. By thine aid these venerable trees, this delicious vale, are mine. Wherever I move, thine influence is with me. Thou unfoldest beneath my feet a carpet of flowers. Thou makest me the master of men, and by thy means I pass—"

As he spoke a glistening serpent uncoiled its folds at his feet—a moment and death would have ended his triumph, when a negro, armed with a heavy stick, rushed towards the spot and the monster writhed in death.

"I am a slave," said the man; "the profits of my own time are hoarded to buy my freedom. Once I had almost raised enough, but the bank in which the sum was deposited broke, and I lost all."

The youth's heart glowed with gratitude and compassion. "Wealth is dear," he said; "but gratitude is dearer. Take gold and be free."

The scene changed. The youth with his burthen was tossed in a ship on a stormy sea. For nights and days the violent storm raged. The wearied seamen exposed themselves to its fury. Now drenched with the breaking waves—now frozen with cold—now faint for want of sleep. Then the blue sky appeared, and the distant land. The mountain waves were calmed. He gazed on the tired mariners.

"We have wives and children," they said; "and aged parents. We risk our lives for them."

"Noble fellows!" said the youth; "here is gold—accident bestowed it upon me—it would purchase me pleasure; but your life is wasted in the midst of peril and toil—take it and carry happiness to your humble homes."

Again the youth advanced with his burthen in the midst of a rural scene, and beheld a lovely youthful girl weeping over a grave.

"Whom dost thou mourn?" he asked.

"It is my mother's grave," said the child; "my father lies by her side."

"Go home," said the youth, "and time will moderate your grief."

"I have no home," she said; "no friend;" and her tears fell upon the turf like drops of morning dew.

"Wretched girl!" said the youth; "thou wilt find this world a cold one indeed—a cruel and fearful fate is thine. Who were thy parents?"

She breathed their name with quivering lips. They were beings whom he had known and loved. Pity alone possessed his soul. He emptied at her feet the last of his treasures.

"I am young," he said, "and can meet the struggles of life. They will develop my character and stimulate me to action. But you—"

The scene which I had first beheld now appeared again. The water shining through the bridge—the lofty trees—the vines and flowers, and the hushed stillness reigning over all. Again the youth was there, but without his burthen. He was clothed in worn and faded garments. Disease was in his face, and anguish at his heart—for on his high and manly forehead, beneath the ringlets of rich hair which hung about his temples, some demon had stamped the word poverty. The loveliness of nature no longer touched his soul, unless to wrench it with a deeper pang. He fled to the city. The palace of pleasure attracted his steps, but her votaries laughed and he shrunk away. He sought the hall of fashion, but the crowd recoiled from him. Then he said, I will devote my hours to labour, and he went forth in search of occupation. He bent down his proud and lofty head at the feet of the haughty—"Make me a slave—degrade me to the lowest toil—only suffer me to mingle with my fellow-men"—but the stern glance read the word written on his forehead, and the jewelled hand waved him to begone.

A dark form approached him, and seemed to paint scenes of affluence and bliss. He described heaps of his lost wealth—he pointed again to the silent valley—to its stream and woods and flowers, and a gleam of hope and joy lighted, for a moment, his melancholy features—"And what shall I do for this—labour, danger, any thing I will encounter." His dark companion whispered in his ear—his face was overshadowed. He shook his head. Then strong men seized him and thrust him into a dungeon, where he sickened for the sweet breath of heaven till mercy released him, and he wandered on. Again he stood in the valley. The stream was flowing brightly on its course. He knelt before a girl whom he loved, and forgot for a moment that the curse was on him, but she pointed to the fatal stigma, coldly turned her head, and shrunk away. Then he lifted his heavy eyes to the blue heavens, and cursed the world, and a wild and unnatural light broke over his haggard and unhappy features, and the silent and solitary haunts of the beautiful green woods rung with the mad voice of intoxication. A faithful dog had accompanied him in his desolation. At length the frenzy subsided, and he leaned against a tree which had been scathed with lightning, and winter came over the blossoming woods. Freezing winds sighed heavily through the dismal naked branches. The stream was locked in ice; hushed was its playful music, dark the flashes of its liquid crystal. So pure and beautiful childhood is now seen laughing and dancing in the grace of its young being, and then stretched in the cold and marble stillness of death. Man had refused him pity. Nature spoke no tone of sympathy to his weary heart. He flung himself upon the ground, and covered the agony of his face.

Then the summer came again, with its beauty—and a pleasant night. The willow drooped its heavy and mournful branches over a grave. No marble slab was there, although around, the sculptured flame up-curved from marble urns, and letters of gold mourned that the great and the selfish, whose easy lives had rolled away in splendour, could enjoy it no longer. Silently the moonlight fell through fragments of fleecy clouds. Upon the neglected mound a dog was stretched stiff in death. Poverty could find no other monument. F.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

PECULIARITIES IN LANGUAGE.

It is curious to note the changes which time and circumstance work upon language. Under the cherishing care of philosophy and science, it attains an eloquence and a precision by which it shadows forth all the floating emotions and abstract thoughts of the mind. The southerners laugh at the peculiarities of the Yankee when he tells them that "he went to sea a little grain," and makes similar characteristic observations. The simple, hard-working countryman stares to hear the city student "availing himself of the earliest opportunity to see his friend," and telling him "how excessively he was annoyed by dust," &c. Travellers remark that in all places, especially not cities of a commercial character, little strange discrepancies will creep into the speech even of the most enlightened. A singular mode of pronunciation prevails among that part of our southern population who reside in the interior, among the uncleared back woods.

In a walk one sunny morning through a field, dotted far and wide with tufts of snowy cotton which had burst from the bud, I found a lank, broad-shouldered Georgian, and an athletic negro slave engaged in building a log-hut. The roughly hewn beams were duly piled one upon the other, and the roof covered with boards; an uncouth prominence, constructed of heavy and unbarked timber formed the chimney, which the two labourers were employed in plastering with mud. A large dog, which had lain quietly watching the progress of their toils, starting at my approach, pricked up his ears, and uttered that sort of low, unfriendly growl by which individuals of his race frequently save themselves from my caresses. I paused a moment to address the workman, and found his conversation replete with expressions, some of which I have endeavoured to remember. Of course they contain no interest except from their peculiarity.

"Will your dog bite?" said I.

"Well, I reckon he won't hurt ye, if you don't tease him; only speak kind, and ye needn't be afeared." And sure enough he lowered his ears and placed his handsome head against my hand.

"Do you live in these parts?"

"No, sir."

"Maybe you're a traveller?"

"I am from the north, sir."

"Why, my father was raised in the north. I reckon you knowd him—Richard Williams?"

"I don't recollect any body of that name," answered I.

"Have you been much in this country?"

"No, sir."

"How do ye like us?"

"I have scarcely been here long enough to judge."

"Well, I reckon if ye stay here much, ye'll never want to go back, for there's a power of people come down here. I've just moved down from S.—I begun this hut day before yesterday, and shall finish it to-morrow. It an't no great thing, but it suits me prime."

"And how do you obtain a livelihood here?" asked I.

"I go out to work on a farm, and then I got a little land free. It don't look very nice just now, but it'll be a heap better when I get settled a little."

"Have you a family?"

"Well, I reckon I have—a wife and six children, and monstrous nice little critters as ever you see?"

"And does your daily work support all these?"

"Why, my woman does a little something, and that helps along. Now this year we've had a power of dry weather—the crops look mighty sorry in a heap of places—mighty sorry indeed."

"How far am I from S.?"

"Oh, a good piece off—you're clean out of your way if you're going there."

"Could I walk there to night, think you?"

"Well, I reckon you might stand a pretty smart chance."

"What's your dog's name?"

"Snap, sir—you never see a better crittur in your born days. He'll tote a basket from here to S.—as well as I can."

"Is that large building a court house?"

"That is a meeting-house—Mr. B. preaches there, and a monstrous nice little man he is, too. He suits the people prime. He has been sick with the fever and ague, but he got shut of it this summer. He's a heap better man than even he was afore—some of the folks don't like him no account, and are trying to put him out, but they'll have monstrous tight scrouging, I tell you; they'll never populate in knowledge in these parts if they don't keep good preachers, and every body can't preach like he does. You can't help listening to him no how. He's right good at it, I tell ye."

"I believe this country is very healthy, is it not?"

"Why, I only arrived here a few days ago; but I reckon you stand as smart a chance here to die of old age as any where. The people telled me it was healthy, and that's one reason that fauched me here."

COLONEL ACHILLE MURAT.

Since the commencement of the old French revolution the American population has been increased by a great variety of foreigners, to whom our shores form a refuge from the commotions of Europe. Men born in the highest spheres of society, and inheriting extensive wealth and splendid distinctions, have been thrust forth here, "like limbs from their country cast bleeding and torn." They have been ~~applied~~ apply accomplishments, cultivated for the brilliant circles of the old world, to the arduous struggles and plain realities of life. Our practical republicans, who hear of the magnificent characters and events which have dazzled the eastern continent with glorious light, and now shaken down its gorgeous fabrics in dark ruin, as they read some wild and romantic legend, find themselves frequently brought in contact with men who have thus moved the mighty springs of action, and fled from the consequences. The same convulsions have also doubtless crowded us with as distinguished objects of sympathy, who have succeeded in palming themselves off upon our credulity as persons of rank. Heroes have flourished here, who would have created a stare in the ancient circles of fashion. Some stalk as captains who once sneaked as cooks. Your barber, perhaps, has been in Egypt, or was left for dead in Russia; but it is generally known that individuals of the highest families in France have been wandering, with various degrees of success, through foreign lands; and the attractions held forth for them by the present regenerated state of their native country, and their general return, after so long a banishment, give an air of romantic interest to their history. Among those whom the recent revolution has called back to Europe, we notice the name of Colonel Achille Murat, the son of the late unfortunate king of Naples. This gentleman has long resided in Florida, where his talents and conciliating manners have rendered him generally respected and beloved. By a correspondence between himself and a committee appointed to conduct the ceremonies of an entertainment offered to him on his departure from Florida, we perceive he has become so attached to the institutions of the United States as to cherish the intention of returning as soon as the settlement of his private affairs will permit, unless induced to remain by public causes of paramount importance.

NEW-YEAR'S DAY.

It is rumoured that some of the fair leaders of the ~~last~~ have it in contemplation to refuse gentlemen the indulgence of visiting them on the first day of the new year. Every fashion, if imperative, may be productive of awkward consequences; but the worst which may result from this cannot surely be of such serious import as to require that a festival, which stands prominently out as one of the happiest days among the whole three hundred and sixty-five, should be divested of its charm. We shrewdly suspect that the revolutionary principles which have set all Europe by the ears are stealing into the quiet bosoms of our once contented republicans; and, as we have not to rend asunder any shackles of iron, imposed upon us by dark-minded and black-browed tyrants, we must even tear off those soft chains of flowers, which peace and pleasure have flung around us. For our own part, we venerate the benevolent spirit in which this custom has sprung up, and commence thus early to sound the "tocsin of alarm," that all lovers of social enjoyment, all who respect the hospitable manners of the past generation, all who are willing to set their faces against the introduction of cold ceremony in the place of frank friendship, may begin to make out their visiting list for the first day of eighteen hundred and thirty-two.

CHANCES OF A REVOLUTION IN ENGLAND.

"Down with the national debt," is not a popular revolutionary cry in England; indeed it is hard to say what is, for though there are plenty of turbulent and dissatisfied spirits there, yet they are split up into more parties and factions than are to be found mentioned in the columns of our political journals. Some are for vote by ballot without universal suffrage, some for universal suffrage without vote by ballot, some for both, some for merely disfranchising the rotten boroughs, some for annual parliaments, some for triennial ones, and each and all clamorous and confident of the efficacy of their own measures, and fully convinced of the utter inutility of those of their brother reformers. There wants some substantial grievance to bind them together—some act of outrage and oppression as in France, about which there can be but one opinion, to make them act in concert, and this they are not likely to have. The only thing on which all the lower and middling, and a great portion of the richer classes seem to think alike is "the church;" and if ever there be a revolution in England, I think there is little doubt but those who ought to be the pure and humble ministers of peace, will be the occasion of it. We do not live in a religious age, (the more is the pity,) but I by no means wish to be understood as joining in the common and idle cry against clergymen. No one has a more sincere respect for mild and tolerant religion, and right sorry should I be to see the pretty, picturesque village ~~parsonage~~ scattered all over England, where much good and no harm is weekly taught, torn down by a lawless and infuriated mob; but if ever it be so, the dignitaries of the church have themselves to thank for it. The poor curate hardly earns his scanty stipend of fifty or sixty pounds a year, whilst the lordly bishop reposes in idleness and luxury upon thousands. This simple fact is constantly before the eyes of the people, and all the sophistry of Blackwood cannot do it away; and this fact has done more to spread scoffing and infidelity in England than all the irreligious publications that ever came from the press. Some alteration must be made in "the church system," if quietly and constitutionally, all the better.

THE ELEPHANT.

The actors are all in an uproar. Not Henry the sixth, when informed that evil was coming upon him in its worst shape, that of the duke of Gloster; not Charles the tenth, when told that the noble Parisians would not let him abide even in his beloved Rambouillet, were more agitated and alarmed than are our actors at the announcement of the coming of the mighty elephant. Shakespeare, who was once pronounced the prince of dramatic writers, is now discovered to have made too serious an omission not to be disgraced for ever. He never wrote a play nor set down a speech for an elephant actor; yet such a one is shortly to appear, and to dispute the glories of the Cookes and the Coopers, the Forrests and the Keans, the Macreadys and the Conways; ay, and even of the little Burke himself. However critics may differ about the pre-eminence of other performers, they must surely unite in opinion on this one, and acknowledge it to be the greatest actor that ever trod the boards.

NEW READING.

A late personator of third or fourth rate parts at the Park theatre, enacting the character of Edgar, in King Lear, and feeling, from some unaccountable cause or other, so much elevated in spirits as to forget the words "as set down for him," in the place of these lines of Shakespeare,

"half way down,

"Hangs one that gathers samphire; dreadful trade," introduced the following facetious improvement:

"And look—away down there, stands a fellow
"Gathering vegetables; horrid profession."

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

In order to make room for the new-year's address, we have been compelled to omit the music intended for this week. The view of the Bay and Harbour of New-York, being at length finished, will appear in the next number.

James Monroe.—We have been much gratified with the attempts lately made in this city by some of our most influential citizens to bring the claims of this eminent statesman and veteran patriot, in an effective manner, before the congress of the United States. The public meeting held on the occasion was highly respectable and numerous, and the memorial presented by Prosper M. Wetmore is a manly, sensible, and convincing document, which cannot fail to make a powerful impression on all minds not warped by prejudice or devoured by the spirit of party. The claims of the venerable ex-president herein advanced, are founded, not so much on the gratitude of his countrymen, though even that feeling can never exceed the extent of his deserts, as on simple, indisputable justice. Property frittered away by neglect, consequent upon long absence in the public service, actual money defrayed, and immense debts incurred by his voluntary responsibilities, in the cause of the country, both before and during the late war—these sacrifices have left to one of the most faithful and active servants ever engaged in the government of the United States, an old age of poverty and dependence. This is truly lamentable, and the honour of our free institutions is identified with the redress of the grievance.

Medical libel suit.—If ever an opportunity was desired of seeing the most pugnacious people in the universe assembled together, so as to be enabled to indulge their sanguinary and dark propensities, it is likely to be afforded in the suit now pending before the court of sessions in this city, against the proprietors of the "American Lancet." We have understood that upwards of two hundred physicians, and all the corps editorial, are summoned to appear as witnesses! What a collection of gigs there will be around the park—what a glorious swarm of the knowing gentry in the hall—and what a cry for "the doctor! the doctor!" among the neglected patients! Rumours are abroad that awful disclosures are to be made "pleno foro," and that many a secret of the charnel-house will be developed, enough "to make the very hair to stand on end, like quills upon the fretful porcupine!"

Dr. Channing.—This distinguished writer has reflected much lustre upon American literature. His intellect is of the highest order, and his recently published works are a treasure to every reflecting mind. As a speaker, he exercises an extraordinary influence over his auditors, and the articles furnished by him for the Christian Examiner have established for that journal, both in this country and abroad, a brilliant reputation. We are informed, however, that the extract ascribed to him, and which appeared in the twenty-fifth number of this paper, headed "Natural Dread of Death," was from the pen of the Rev. O. Dewey.

The Daily Sentinel once more.—This gazette is under an obligation to us for having, at sundry times, furnished it with subject-matter for some very long paragraphs. In the present lamentable dearth of editorial invention, this is no small favour. The Sentinel, however, cannot escape as easily as it imagines from the imputations it affects to repudiate. We admit we were in error with respect to the editor, in relation to Lafayette. It was the Paris correspondent of the Sentinel and Free Inquirer who imputed to age and its natural weakness the repugnance of that venerable patriarch of liberty to the adoption of a republican form of government by the French; and her assertions have received the stamp and endorsement of accuracy from the Daily Sentinel. The personality of our contemporary must be passed over in silence; we never indulge in such freedoms. The term aristocrat is sadly misapplied.

The Annals.—These delightful inventions of a refined taste retain all their external beauty and attractions, but in their intellectual materials there is a woful falling off. They all contain some good pieces, but the tout ensemble is really unworthy of commendation.

Dentistry.—We have seen the artificial roof and palate made by Mr. A. C. Castle, surgeon dentist, of this city. They are ingeniously contrived to answer as a substitute for the organs and muscles of the mouth and throat. Attached to this useful piece of mechanism is a set of teeth, by which the office of mastication may easily be performed. It will, doubtless, attract much attention among scientific men, and those so unfortunate as to need its assistance.

NEW-YEAR MORNING:

A petit opera, in one act.

AS PERFORMED, WITH GREAT SUCCESS, JANUARY, 1, 1831.

RESPECTFULLY INSCRIBED TO THE READERS OF

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR,

BY THE CARRIER.

Written by Samuel Woodworth.

Dramatis Personæ.

COLONEL O'SAGE.
THE CARRIER.MISS AFFABLE.
SUSAN.

SCENE—A drawing room in the house of Alderman Affable—side-board replenished with cordials, wines, confectionary, and other refreshments. A knocking heard at the street door.

Enter Miss Affable, followed by Susan.

MISS AFFABLE.
Mind the door!—and peace with your chattering!
See the cakes and the cordials renew'd.SUSAN.
Pshaw! that knocker is constantly clattering!
Who the dickens is next to intrude! [Exit.MISS AFFABLE.
In mercy defend us from newspaper venders,
Those scribbling pretenders to fancy and rhyme,
Who trouble us yearly, and make us pay dearly
For trash which they really consider sublime.

Re-enter Susan, with a neatly folded paper in her hand.

MISS AFFABLE.
Well—who is it?—There's Major Vernillity,
Never fails in his holiday call;
Gay O'Sage, too, the pink of civility,
Comes with tickets, perhaps, for the ball.SUSAN smiles significantly.
I'll venture a wager, 'tis either the Major,
Or Colonel O'Sage, or my dear Captain Moore,
Or Lieutenant Quizit—he promised a visit—
Now, Susan, who is it?—say, which of the four?
Susan casts an arch look at the paper.SUSAN.
Hang the fellow!—Whatever his title be,
Here's a clew for your finding it out.MISS AFFABLE.
Long or short as the trashy recital be,
I must read his commission, no doubt!SUSAN.
He nodded and squinted, and smilingly hinted
'Twas handsomely printed, and warm from the press.MISS AFFABLE.
Then go, bid him dine on't!—I see the design on't,
And won't read a line on't—a newsmen's address!
With a slight curl of her ruby lip.
Susan unfolds, and displays the address.SUSAN.
Do but look, now!—the printing is beautiful!
There's a border of neatness and taste!
Here he says, that "the Carrier is devout,
"Eager, ever, to serve you in haste."MISS AFFABLE.
Such nonsense, I spurn it!—I tell you, return it,
Or tear it, or burn it!—I'm sick of their arts!
SUSAN. (reading.)
"With well-furnish'd dishes, of leaves and of fishes,
"For such are the wishes the MIRROR imparts."
Miss A. starts with pleasure and surprise.MISS AFFABLE.
Ha!—what say you?—the Mirror! O give it me!
Takes the address.
Here's a one-dollar bill for his pay;
Tell him always be careful and leave it me,
None but he can produce such a lay.
But, stay!—On reflection, I see no objection—
A little reflection would cheer him I think,
This cold winter weather—so bid him come hither.SUSAN. (laughing.)
That is, if his tether allows him to drink. [Exit.

Miss Affable sings from the address.

"Ladies, gentlemen, masters, and misses, too,
"Husbands, bachelors, widows, and wives,
"Health and wealth, with plenty of kisses, too,
"Peace and happiness sweeten your lives.
"May none, who would marry, be fated to tarry,
"Nor Cupid's dart parry, when virtue approves;
"May all be resign'd to the fortune they find, too,
"And every girl join'd to the man that she loves."

Re-enter Susan, with the Carrier.

CARRIER.
Servant, madam—a happy new-year to ye,
Hope and pleasure attend you through life,
Friends and lovers, and all that are dear to ye,
Heaven preserve them from sorrow and strife!MISS AFFABLE.
Whate'er be your rank, sir—your wishes are frank, sir,
And claim my best thanks, sir—My reticule, Sue; (aside)
These poets and scholars are beauty's extollers,
I'll give him two dollars—'tis less than his due.
Gives another dollar, and exits, reading the address.CARRIER.
Thank you, madam; may years of felicity
Ripen the beauties that blossom so sweet.
Now, fair Susan, thou pink of pudicity,
Cordials or "kisses"?—say, what is my treat?SUSAN. (aside.)
These Mirror folks really address us so queerly,
I do love them dearly—they care not for pelf—
But so fond of Misses!—Sir, "perfect love," this is,
There's "puffs," and here's "kisses"—so choose for yourself.CARRIER.
Thus I choose, pretty— [Enter Miss A.SUSAN.
Hush!—it's Miss Affable!CARRIER.
Kisses, then, I am doom'd to forego?MISS AFFABLE.
This address is so witty and laughable—CARRIER.
Here's your health. (Drinks.) Why, yes—it's so so.

MISS AFFABLE.

Take this, for I owe it—a fee for the poet—
Hush, Susan! I know it—too little by far.

SUSAN.

But then won't your mother be making a pother?

MISS AFFABLE.

He shall have another—We needn't tell Ma.
Gives another bank note.

CARRIER.

Fare you well!—for my feelings of gratitude
Words could never correctly express. [Exit.

SUSAN.

There's a model for language and attitude,—
Now, Miss Affable, read the address.Does't treat with compassion the vot'ries of fashion,
Or lay a sharp lash on to dandy and belle?
Does't praise little Roscius, with genius precocious,
Who plays the ferocious crook'd Richard so well?Fill'd, Pll warrant, with blarney and flattery,
Naming writers, and puffing them all;
Boasting what they have done for the Battery,
Bridewell, Park, and the famed City-hall.

MISS AFFABLE.

And well may they boast of so brilliant a host of Fine writers, the most of them critics severe;
In prose or in numbers, their fancy ne'er slumbers,
Nor useless word lumbars or clogs an idea.

SUSAN.

Tasteful Peale, with the scudder and Cozens, too,
Claim, of course, many flattering rhymes;
Meaneer shows he dispatches by dozens, too—
Then he gives us a "touch of the times!"

MISS AFFABLE.

He says, honest debtors, are doom'd, by their betters,
To shackles and fetters, and filthiness vile,
While hoary aggressors, with pious professors,
And ruthless oppressors, are living in style.

SUSAN.

Boasts he not of its splendid typography?
Music, pictures, engravings, and cuts?
Old Dutch houses, with musty bibliography,
Splendid churches, and mouldering huts?

MISS AFFABLE.

He modestly mentions his future intentions,
Respecting inventions, in arts and in trades,
And says the new college will propagate knowledge,
Imparting a small edge to dullest of blades.Then, he tells us how literature flourishes,
Where the press is unshackled like ours,
How young genius it strengthens and nourishes,
Plumming its wings and directing its powers,
Then follows two columns of new publish'd volumes,
For books are not all hums, as we have been told!
And let us not marvel if Harper and Carvill
And Carey (not servile)—should revel in gold.Pelham, Waverly, Almack's Revisited,
Falkland, Devereux, Tales of the Pease,
Cooper's Water-witch—ne'er were elicited
Brighter sparkles of genius than these.
The Father Obdurate, the poor Country Curate,
Paul Clifford, which you rate as morally vile,
With the late celebration of French liberation,
A faithful narration, and got up in style.Ancient, modern, and all kinds of history,
Every possible subject and theme;
How they furnish so much is the mystery,
Readers ought to peruse them by steam.
A press so prolific, is truly grandiose,
To minds scientific, that come in its reach.

SUSAN.

A bet I would offer, these Harpers will proffer
The talented author a copy of each.
A knocking heard at the street door.

MISS AFFABLE.

See who knocks, Susan.—Usher the Colonel here.

Enter Colonel O'Sage.

COL. O'SAGE.

Praise St. Patrick!—the winter is o'er,
Sure the season, my darling, is vernal here,
Pinks and roses are blooming once more.
I just met M'Kisley, so airy and frisky—
Sweet Susan, some whiskey—I gave him the go:
Assuming the stately, I cut him so nately,
It bothered him greatly—he's sentenced, you know?

MISS AFFABLE.

Sentenced, Colonel! I'm struck with astonishment,
What's his crime? for I never have learn'd.

COL. O'SAGE.

May it prove to the world an admonishment,
Taste and fashion are not to be spurn'd.
His crime, my dear creature, so foreign to nature,
Must ruffle those features, so placid before;
The man is a sneerer, and nought can be clearer.
He don't take the Mirror—we "vote him a bore!"Each aspirant for bright notoriety,
All who move in an elegant sphere,
Every member of genteel society,
All subscribe for the Mirror, my dear.
'Tis the touchstone of merit, to know who inherit
A true public spirit for science and art;
A chemical test for the demagogue's breast,
To determine who best love their country at heart.
Knocking heard. Exit Susan.Why has Turkey submitted to Nicholas?
Why has Charley absconded from France?
Why does Ferdinand act so ridiculous?
Why don't Erin awake from her trance?
I'll tell you the reason, without any treason,
Perhaps the next season it will not exist;
By wicked advisers, these despots and misers,
Are not yet subscribers on Morris's list.

Enter Susan and Carrier.

CARRIER.

Pardon me, miss; but your kind liberality
Caused a trifling mistake in the fee;
Please excuse, sir, the want of formality—
Here's five dollars—you meant them for three.

COL. O'SAGE.

An honest proceeding! and this shows the breeding
Of all who are reading the Mirror, my dear.

MISS AFFABLE.

The mistake you detected is what I expected,
And may be corrected—another New-Year.

FINAL E.

CARRIER.

Joy attend us, each holiday festival!

MISS AFFABLE.

May the press ever triumph and reign!

COL. O'SAGE.

Don't forget that the Mirror is best of all!

SUSAN.

Next New-Year you must see us again.

CHORUS.

Then, the Mirror for ever, so racy and clever,
Will all will endeavour, with heart and with hand,
Its freshness to nourish, and long may it flourish,
The bane of the curish—the FRUDE OF THE LAND!
Exeunt omnes.

For the Mirror.

EARTHLY TIES.

BY ISIDORA.

"Nay, lady, does the thought of death
Afflict thy heart so sore?'Tis but to yield the failing breath,
And suffer pain no more."And surely on thy closing eye
Bright beams of hope may shine,
For none need ever fear to die
Whose life has been like thine."Thy honours and thy lofty state
Thou hast with meekness borne,
The wretched suppliant from thy gate
Was never sent in scorn."Large gifts are from thy plenteous stores
Profusely scattered round,
The houseless oft within thy doors
A sheltering home have found."Thy friends—their grief thy worth may tell,
Tears swell in every eye.""Nay, I have loved them but too well,
Therefore, I fear to die!""But, lady, we are bade to love,
By holy law enjoined—
Thy conscience never can approve
A love for human kind!""Nay, gentle comforter, 'tis vain,
Thou canst not soothe my woe,
Thou canst not break the dragging chain
That binds me here below."I gave, 'tis true, with willing heart,
How could I choose but give!
From lavish stores a little part
Would let the wretched live."Such gifts no sacrifice demand—
The truth thou canst not hide—
I only gave, with careless hand,
The refuse of my pride!""And friends—oh! I have worshipped here
With such engrossing love,
That I have had no wish to spare,
No thought to send above."Go, comfort those whose daily care
Procure their daily bread—
Who give the alms they ill can spare,
And share their scanty shed."Go, speak of brightening hopes to those Who penury and scorn,
And countless hardships, countless woes,
With meekness still have borne."Go soothe the friendless wretch whose ear
Ne'er drunk the words of love—
No charm has bound his spirit here,
His hopes have soared above!"But, ah! when life's bright current flows
Unruffled to the eye,
When fortune smiles, and friendship glows,
Who would not fear to die?"Who would not crave a wider space,
With better deeds to spread?
Who would not wish a longer race,
A holier path to tread?"When tones beloved, and looks adored
Speak to the eye and ear,
Is it not hard to burst the chord
That binds the spirit here?"Be patient, gentle comforter!
I fain would fix on high
My closing eye and failing ear—
But still I fear to die!"

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR:

A REPOSITORY OF POLITE LITERATURE AND THE ARTS.

EMBELLISHED WITH A VIEW OF THE BAY AND HARBOUR OF NEW-YORK, TAKEN FROM THE BATTERY.

VOLUME VIII.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, JANUARY 15, 1831.

NUMBER 28.

For the New-York Mirror.

NIGHT.

BY MRS. EMMA C. EMBURY.

(From a manuscript poem.)

NIGHT, queenly night, approaches—her dark robe
Gemm'd thick with stars; and while her gentle touch
Opens the sun-seal'd fountains of the dew;
Her fragrant breath is passing o'er the earth
Closing its flowers in slumber. Beautiful,
And strong as beautiful, art thou. The child
Who lifts his tiny hands in joy to see
The crescent on thy brow, is not more fair;
And the stern king at whose dread name men shrink,
Is scarce more powerful. Thy soft whisper lulls
Whole cities to forgetfulness, and sheds
The sweets of slumber o'er the armed host,
No less than o'er the busy insect tribes
That hum their hour away till silence reigns
Unmoved, save by the melancholy song
Old ocean wakes within his hollow caves.

Night, queenly night! like woman's holy love,
Thy blessed influence breathes on all around,
And fills the earth with gentleness and peace.
Oh, who while gazing on thy placid brow,
Thou first-born of eternity, can feel
The weight of earthly vanities? 'Tis thine
To loose the fetters which the world has twin'd
Around the spirit's eagle wings, and give
Free flight to daring thought, till the proud soul
Overleaps the narrow bounds of time and sense,
To pierce the glorious mysteries of heaven.

AMERICAN SCENERY.

NEW-YORK.

WE present to our readers in the present number of the Mirror a view of the Battery and Bay of New-York, done in a style that cannot fail, we think, of giving universal satisfaction.

Few that have ever visited this city will require a laboured description of this beautiful scene, which is too striking to escape the notice of the most superficial observer. There is, probably, no public promenade in the world superior to the Battery in every point of view, internal and external. Its walks are numerous, dry, and convenient, and are beginning to be shaded with avenues of fine trees. The air, freshened from the waters, is pure, cool, and invigorating; and the prospect diversified with almost every object and every ingredient constituting natural or artificial beauty.

Nothing, indeed, can be more agreeable than the scene presented on a summer evening, on and about this charming promenade. The walks are lined with elegant women and well-dressed men; the grass is dotted with groups of little children, sporting like butterflies and grasshoppers, to and fro; the bay is alive with steam-boats, displaying their pennons of smoke far behind them; and every species of vessel, from the stately ship, winding her way amid clouds of white canvass, that seem mixing with the skies, to the little Whitehall boats, renowned in story for their unequalled swiftness. To the left is the verdant shore of Long Island, adorned with all the beauties of wood and cultivated fields; to the right we look up the majestic Hudson, where Hoboken, Weehawk, and beyond them the gray majestic precipices present themselves in succession. In front are the low but picturesque shores of Jersey, spotted with little thriving villages, and bounded in the distance by waving blue hills; and down the river the heights of Staten Island on one side finely contrast with the low shores of the opposite isle. Nor must we forget the little islands sprinkled about the bay, and crowned with those famous works of defence, which seem destined never to answer any other purpose than to gratify the admirers of picturesque beauty.

In such a scene, and in the bland twilight of a summer evening, the eye and the imagination may both revel in luxurious indulgence, while the music of Castle-garden, now happily rescued from the iron hand of war, and devoted to the gratification of peaceful citizens, wakens a thousand pleasing associations. If we are of a contemplative disposition, the present will be lost sight of in the recollections of the past, or the anticipations of the future. We shall, peradventure, call to mind the mutations of men, of names, of things, which this delightful scene has exhibited within little more than two centuries. In that period it has passed from the dominion of one great race to that of another—from the red man to the white; from the Dutch to the English, and from the English it has returned again to the possession of the na-

Its name has changed with its destinies, its language with its masters. The Indian and his dialect are no more, and the names which he gave to his territory are almost all forgotten. Manhattan, the ancient name of the island, (would it were not so,) has, after various changes, at length settled down permanently, at least until some other wandering nation shall come in good time to discover and dispossess us, into the inglorious appellation of New-York; and the sonorous Shawbackanicka has degenerated into Greenwich. Here and there, however, some few fragments of Indian names are preserved, as Ahasinuis, or Harsimus, Weehawk, not to forget the renowned Communipaw, on the Jersey shore, and Gowanus, on Long Island. Of the ancient inhabitants of these places nothing remains but their story, which is a melancholy one. Like the mammoth they have become extinct, and we are only certified of their having once existed by sometimes digging up their bones. In the place of a few wandering, hunting, fishing, and fighting barbarians, are now to be seen hundreds of thousands of christian, civilized men. Is the contrast to be regretted? No. If existence is indeed a blessing; if agriculture, the arts, sciences, and literature administer to the happiness of mankind; it would argue a narrow, unphilosophical mind, to find fault with the substitution of the white man for the red man; or to lament that where one solitary savage roamed, a hundred civilized christians now enjoy the comforts of life, and worship the true God.

In the month of September, 1609, the island of New-York was first seen by a white man. During that month Hendrick Hudson was employed in sailing up the river in search of a passage to India, which, as may be readily supposed, he did not find; but he found a noble site for a city, a noble river, and a noble country. This discovery led to a settlement by the Dutch, in whose employment Hudson was when he made it. At what precise time this settlement began, where the first house was built, and who built it, we believe our records are deficient in recording. The oldest portion of the city is that about Broad-street, Stone-street, and Whitehall-street. The writer of this is in possession of a Dutch deed, for a part of his property, as old as 1688. About that period, according to Judge Benson,* wampum was frequently used as a circulating medium. The judge states, that in 1672 six white or black wampum passed for a stuyver, and refers to a bond, dated in the same year, for the payment of sixteen hundred guilders, in wampum. According to the same venerable authority, the value of estates in the city in 1688 was seventy-eight thousand two hundred and thirty-one pounds, sterling we presume. In 1815 it was eighty-one millions six hundred and thirty-six thousand five hundred and twelve dollars. The tax on the property of the city in 1688 was a penny half-penny in the pound. Verily the taxes have increased with the property!

The same respectable authority affords us a number of other curious particulars. It would appear, from various facts collected by him, that the earliest, or one of the earliest products attempted to be cultivated here, was tobacco. One of the first cargoes sent hence to Holland in 1661 was a ship-load of tobacco and peltry. The Indian names yielded to the Dutch. The famous strait at the mouth of Haerlem river was called Het Helle Gat, which is literally Hell Gut, not gate. De Laet calls it Inferi Os. The renowned bay, since converted to the purpose of fattening turtle for corporation feasts, was called Deutel Bay, in allusion to its shape, which resembled that of the pegs called Gedeutelt. From "deutel" to "turtle bay" was an easy transition. The good city became Nieuwe-Amsterdam; the bank of the Hudson between Greenwich and Haerlem heights Bloemen'd Dal; the creek, dignified since as Haerlem river, Spyt den Duyvel Creek; Constable's Hook was then Konstabel's Hoeck; Paulus Hoeck was named after Paulus Schrick; Ahasimus gave place to Pavia; the present Sandy Hook was called Sandt Punt; Coney Island, which has been supposed from its name to have once abounded in rabbits, was called Conyn, which is a Dutch surname; the Narrows was called Hoofden, signifying headland, or foreland; Brooklyn was called Breuckelen; Jamaica, Rustdorf; Flushing, Vlissingen; Bowery, then the Poor's Farm, Armen Bowerey, or Poor Bowerey; Newark Bay was Het Achter Cul, afterwards anglicised into Arthur Kull's Bay; and what is now called the Kills, was then Het Kill Van Het Cul; Robbin's Reef is modified from Robyn's Riff, or Seal Reef; and Governor's Island was long known as Nooten Island, from its abounding in nuts. A great many other curious etymologies are given by Judge Benson, whose age, character, learning, and professional acquaintance with old titles, render his authority unquestionable.

The habits and manners of the Dutch of New-Amsterdam were simple, economical, and, like the laws of the Medes and Persians, unchangeable. Slow and sure, was their maxim, and for a man to grow rich in a hurry, or do any thing else in a hurry, was considered not only rash but unbecoming. The more respectable sort of people dressed in domestic manufacture, of their own spinning and making up; and short gowns and petticoats were the ordinary wear. On Sundays they always put on their best, but, with a commendable economy, always put it off as soon as they returned from church. By this means a Sunday suit was made to last a whole life, and not unfrequently descended from generation to generation. As the fashions never changed it was always in fashion. We have seen an honest Dutch beaver, which had belonged to the grandfather of the present wearer. It must be confessed, however, that the fabrics of that day were somewhat more substantial than those of our time. A hat of those days had as much beaver in it as half a dozen of these degenerate days; a yard of broadcloth would outweigh three of the present glossy texture, which has no substance in it; and a silk gown would stand alone. In those days, considering the relative value of money, every luxury was dear, but it became cheap in the end by the excellence of its fabric and the economy of the wearer; now luxuries are grown cheap, while, from their flimsy texture and frequency of change, we have become ten times more extravagant.

Dancing was a favourite amusement among these sober people; and it is on record that the zealous Dominie Laidie preached against it in vain. The respectable tradesmen worked in their shops, and carried home their own goods; nor was it possible in those days to behold swarms of young dandies, dressed in the extreme of fashion, tripping along the streets with bundles under their arms for their fashionable customers. The shops were plain and unostentatious; and those who purchased goods at them were certain not to be obliged to pay an extra price for the pleasure of looking at mahogany counters, shelves of elegant cabinet work, and splendid gas lights. We ourselves always eschew such temptations, from an instinctive perception that the customer, not the shopkeeper, pays for all these in the end. It is recorded by an industrious antiquary, from whom we have borrowed these particulars, that one of the great innovations of the English after the conquest, was keeping their shops open at night, contrary to the universal practice of the ancient inhabitants.

It was customary for the good citizens of New-Amsterdam to sit out of doors on their *stoupe*s, or little piazzas, of evenings, when the weather was pleasant. Here they were happy to receive their neighbours, who came without ceremony, sat down with them, chatted and smoked till they were satisfied, and then departed with as little ceremony as they came. It was a social habit, and conduced much to social intercourse; for there is something in the ceremony of knocking at doors, waiting for servants to come and open them, and then to wait again for them to go and inquire if people choose to be at home, that prevents many a visit, and destroys a great deal of pleasant intercourse. In a pleasant summer evening you might see almost every stoupe occupied by a cocked hat and a long pipe, whose incense curled upwards to the skies, an image of peace and serenity. The insides of the houses were always sedulously clean, and the dresser emulated the glories of Mr. Marquand's shop, or Mr. Gardiner's furnishing warehouse. The white pewter shone like the silver of the present day, which seems especially well tinned, and the crockery was resplendent to behold. A man that outran his income, was always shut up as a lunatic; and the first and only bankruptcy that took place in New-Amsterdam, was preceded by an earthquake, and followed by a hurricane.

The city itself partook of the steady unchangeable character of its worthy inhabitants; and for many years continued to increase of itself, as a regular Dutchman grows fat, without any trouble to himself or any body else. They left it to grow up as it pleased Providence, and it continued to grow silently and soberly, with a steady propriety of demeanour, indicating a lasting prosperity and a happy destiny. Such indeed was the deliberation with which it marched on to glory, that in the year 1683, its marine forces consisted of but three barks, three brigantines, twenty-six sloops, and forty-six open boats;* and in 1730 the number of inhabitants was eight thousand six hundred and thirty-eight.† There is a tradition, that a certain busybody of an alderman, under the Dutch dynasty, was once smitten with a desire to improve the city, and make it grow faster; but his plan was received with universal indignation. A decree was made, banishing him from the city, into the wild parts of Maiden's Valley, where the Indians lived; and to put a stop for ever to the unseemly growth of the city, a wall of palisades was built where Wall-street is now, to prevent any mischievous expansion. There is some obscure allusion in the early annals of New-Amsterdam to a great rising of the people, in consequence of a plan being proposed for draining the Collect. It would seem our worthy ancestors had some sort of anticipation of what has been so happily realized by their descendants in that quarter.

The dialect both written and spoken was almost exclusively Low Dutch, until the city passed into the hands of the English, when it changed its name, its very nature, and language. Mr. Watson states, on the authority of one of our aged citizens, that the last Dutch schoolmaster on record in New-York, was old Master Van Bombeler, of whose history we know nothing. His name, however, gives somehow or other shrewd indication that he was expert in flogging. But there is something mighty tenacious and durable in the honest old Dutch language, manners, and customs, which makes stout resistance to the innovations of time and fashions. This is most especially observable in the neighbouring villages about New-York, where they still retain a primitive simplicity of dress and manners perfectly Doric. At Communipaw, Bergen, Hackensack, Flatbush, New-Utrecht, and other places, from one to ten or a dozen miles from the city, the language, the dress, and manners of the Dutch residents remain nearly what they were a century and a half ago. You may see old beavers at church in these places which came over, not with William the Conqueror, but old Hendrick Hudson, if one may judge from the fashion and material.

But of late, we are informed, the barriers begin to give way, and the intrenchments to yield to the sappings and underminings of divers interlopers. Several damsels have been routed from their high-heeled shoes, little caps, and bonnets of black silk, by certain mischievous itinerant milliners invading their precincts; and a story was lately in circulation, that an ambitious young royster of Communipaw made his appearance the other day at Bergen church in a high-crowned hat. The dominie attacked him manfully for his base apostacy; but it is feared the example will prove contagious.

After the city came into possession of the English, the progress of innovation was rapid and decisive. In a few years it became ungenteel to speak Dutch; in a little while after it became downright vulgar. The language was gradually banished from the pulpits and schools, and made its last stand in the city in the little Dutch church of Garden-street, the first erected by the emigrants from Holland, and the last to abandon their language. Even the name of the street has been changed, for no other cause, that we can conceive, than that innate, insatiable, and ceaseless love of change, which actuates the good people to petition for, and the liberal corporation to grant, new names to old things and old places. The inevitable consequence of such changes is doubt and obscurity as to old titles; its usual results, uncertain possession and endless lawsuits in time to come.

The city now grew faster than it did under its old auspices, but it does not appear that its progress was any way extraordinary until the revolution, which relieved it from the severe and watchful jealousy of an ambitious, craving step-mother, and placed it in the hands of those who knew its natural advantages, and had every possible interest in making the most of them. Since then it is only in the United States of America that any parallel can be found to our accession of growth and numbers. In 1730 New-York contained eight thousand six hundred and thirty-eight inhabitants; in 1825, upwards of one hundred and sixty thousand; and in 1830, unless the persons appointed to take the census here bestir themselves a little, our numbers will be doubled before they make their report! Have our moral character, our piety, our happiness, kept pace with this career of outward prosperity? The answer to this grave question will be found in the details of the newspapers, the records of our criminal courts, and the multiplication of state-prisons, poor-houses, and penitentiaries. Education has been extended, knowledge increased. But knowledge is not virtue, although it is the fashion to confound them together. We have also an excellent system of laws; but, as Horace truly says, "Quid leges sine moribus vana proficiunt?"

THE WRECK OF LOVE.

BY MRS. H. MUZZY.

Love trimmed his fairy shallop's sail,
And laughing wooed a prospering gale,
While Faith, with eye serene and mild,
Sat at the helm, and calmly smiled.

Over the clear and sun-lit sea
Love's shallop glided merrily;
And what had love to do with fear,
While Faith was there, the bark to steer?

Bright was each isle they glided by,
And bright the sea and bright the sky.
Love carolled, gay, his sweetest air,
Or slept secure, for Faith was there.

At length a storm lowered darkly, near.
"Fear not," cried Faith, "I still am here."
Love fixed on Faith his steadfast eye,
Serene and bright—the storm passed by!

But Jealousy, with aspect wild,
Approached and hailed the trusting child;
Love listened, till o'ercome with dread,
Faith left the helm, and trembling fled.

Who now the fairy bark shall steer?
Wild winds the guideless rudder veer.
By whelming waves the bark is lost,
And Love is wrecked, for Faith is lost!

THE FINE ARTS.

ENGRAVING.

In our last number we noticed, with the approbation it so richly deserves, a new and very beautiful specimen of the art of engraving just issued from the patriotic press of Mr. Bliss, under the name of the "American Landscape." It was our intention at that time to offer a few observations upon the present state of the fine art in our country, but the pressure of business compelled us to limit the article, and we therefore now crave the indulgence of our readers while we endeavour to fulfil the purpose which circumstances have, until this moment, obliged us to postpone.

The irresistible evidence of truth has compelled us, in common with our contemporaries, again and again to admit, that the art of engraving has not in the United States attained or even approached to the degree of excellence, we might almost say perfection, to which it has been carried in England. The causes of this fact are not difficult of discovery. They are to be found, not as some would have us believe, in any inferiority of intellect either in our artists or their patrons, nor yet in any very striking want of taste for the fine arts in our countrymen, but solely in the advantages which England possesses of wealth and leisure. We are essentially a people of business; there are but few among us who enjoy fortunes so ample as to exempt them from the necessity of devoting themselves to some money-making pursuit, and of those few there are scarcely any who avail themselves of their privilege, to keep aloof from the engrossing demands of mercantile employment—in short, we have not among us any gentlemen by profession; and, so far as our national prosperity is concerned, it is a happy thing that the want of some specific occupation is considered any thing but honourable. In England the case is different; her cities and high places swarm with titled aristocrats rolling in wealth, who consider employment a disgrace, or at least a nuisance, and who, unable, or too indolent to work out distinction for themselves, can only hope to attain it through the genius and labours of others. Where this is the case, it naturally follows that the competition of purchasers must produce competition among those whose works it is their pride to possess; where many are eager to buy, a large and liberal compensation is secured to the seller.

It is in this manner that the passion for making collections of pictures, which prevails to so great an extent among the nobility and rich commoners of England, is productive of its most beneficial influence upon her progress in the arts of design; the demand for excellence necessarily creates a corresponding supply; and the prices that are paid for good pictures are such as not only to enable, but to induce the artist to bestow the utmost desirable quantity of time and labour upon their production. The effect, too, of this principle extends to engravings not less than to paintings. To those whose means are inadequate to the attainment of a masterly original, the possession of a good copy is a desirable object; and it matters not how great the expense may be of its completion, if the skill of the engraver have succeeded in creating excellence, he is sure that his work will command a ready sale at its full value. Not so in this country. The cost of a collection which an English income would enable its possessor to make without inconvenience, would swallow up most American fortunes; and the time which an Englishman of wealth would readily devote to the inspection and purchase of fine specimens of art, could not be spared from the habitual and necessary avocations of the merchant, the planter, or the lawyer.

It is no disgrace then to our artists and engravers that their best productions are far excelled by those of their English rivals; on the contrary, the degree of perfection to which they have attained is highly creditable to themselves and gratifying to their countrymen; and affords strong grounds for the conviction which we feel, that with the same encouragement, the success of their efforts would be the same. When our painters are employed upon something besides portraits, and paid two thousand dollars for a picture which can be completed in three months; and when engravings from such pictures can be sold at ten or fifteen or even twenty dollars, we shall not fear to see the works of American artists placed in competition with the best of English—but not till then.

We have been led to these remarks by a comparison which we have been afforded the opportunity of fairly making between a volume of English prints and two of American—all having American scenery for their subjects. The first of these (which we have just received from London) bears the magnificent title of "The history and topography of the United States of North America, &c. &c., illustrated with a series of views, &c. &c. edited by John Howard Hinton, and dedicated by permission to Washington Irving, Esq." The others are, "The American Landscape," to which we have already alluded in this article, and "Childs' views in Philadelphia and its environs." The drawings in each of these collections are by American artists; the question therefore arises fairly upon the merits of the respective engravers, and we think it would be difficult for any critic, however skilful, to assign a preference to either. Yet we must confess that the English plates are not the best that country has produced, and the others on the contrary have seldom or never been surpassed on this side the Atlantic. In some particulars it is true Mr. Durand's engravings are superior to those of the English artists, as in the greater freedom of touch and correctness of outline and variety of light and shade; but on the other hand they are too apt to be unnecessarily dark and heavy, and want that lightness and smoothness of finish which are to be found in their English competitors. The same objections to which Mr. Durand's plates are liable, may be urged against some of those in Mr. Childs' very beautiful volume; while others are as light and soft as any of the English; but these last again are wanting in boldness, and bear evidence of timid handling. The figures in all are very nearly equal in merit; but we must confess that none of them are remarkable for excellence.

Did our limits permit, we should be glad to follow up this comparison at greater length, and to subject to it other specimens of the art of engraving from both countries. We cannot however conclude without bestowing praise upon the enterprising spirit by which the works we have mentioned have been produced, and upon the general merit of their execution. The commendations bestowed by our brethren of the press upon Mr. Durand's book, have been general and liberal, and justly so; and Mr. Childs', although it has not been much noticed in this city, is worthy of all praise. We shall perhaps, in a future number, be tempted to lay a full description of it before our readers.

MUSIC.

The Banks of Allan Water, a ballad, composed by Charles Edward Horn, the poetry by the late Mr. Lewis, commonly known by the appellation of "Monk Lewis," is worthy of attention as one of the best specimens extant of that species of composition. The genuine old English ballad is sui generis. Nothing resembles it in the present national music of any country; it stands on an insulated eminence, very difficult to be reached either by the poet, the composer, or the vocalist. It is a little epic poem, and, to be effective, must be recited as well as sung; in other words, it demands the best musical oratory. The aid of accompaniment is scarcely needed, unless a judicious chord here and there: any attempt at the modern mode of instrumentation would inevitably cloud its beauties and destroy their effect. The genuine ballad, or lyrical romance, of our native tongue, approaches nearer that of the ancient troubadours of Provence than of any other class of national poets; indeed, those who love to speculate on such affairs would not overstep the bounds of probability in giving an identity of origin to both: for, on the conquest of England by William of Normandy, it is but fair to suppose that its melodies received the same impetus from France as that which the best writers on music have not hesitated to claim for Scotland, from the residence there and individual influence of David Rizzio. A Welchman, on the other hand, would scoff at the idea of the genuine Saxon music being improved by a mixture with that of France, and quote the venerable monuments of art raised by Welch musicians and poets, some of which are of Druidical origin, having survived for centuries and being destined to survive as long as melody can soothe or excite. To speak the truth—if the Welsh be the aborigines of old England, the mixed breed of which our ancestors were constituted, need look no further for their national music. The ballad now in vogue, (Moore's, for the moment, are neglected, although they will live for ever,) is a light species of article, relying a good deal on the aid of accompaniment; the old fashioned lyrical romance has nearly passed away. Instead of inditing a narrative of events, as in the old ballads, our poets, with very few exceptions, are glad to prove successful by merely treating of common-place feelings. The departure of a lady from her lover, the emotions produced by her white hands, rosy cheeks, ruby lips, and clustering ringlets, on his imagination—the soothing effects in such cases of moonlight, cascades, rills, groves, and breezes—are the never-ending themes of our present lyriists. Miserable Henriets and faithless Emmas, with a deal of pseudo sentiment about stormy seas and willow trees, form another formidable reservoir for supplying the trade; and latterly we have been invaded by a host of profligate butterflies, bees, and other unprincipled insects, who flirt with daisies, jilt rosebuds, and betray dewdrops, to the great edification of boarding-school young ladies. But, to cut short our somewhat lengthy digression, and to return to the Banks of Allan Water. We have here to offer our readers a pathetic tale, admirably told in three stanzas, and set to a melody which embellishes and adds grace to the subject. A more happy union of music and poetry can scarcely be pointed out. We place it in the very select ranks of, and side by side with, "Auld Robin Gray," "Mary's Dream," "Black-eyed Susan," "Oh no, we never parted," her, and the "Soldier's Tent." In short, it is a gem which, when sung chastely, with good intonation and expression, must make its way directly to the heart. B.

* See Watson's Annals. † Judge Benson's Address.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

MASTER BURKE is still delighting our play-going population. Crowds follow him, and will continue to do so, wherever he goes. His abilities are certainly of an extraordinary kind. Whether he be gifted by nature with singular capacity, or his acting be the result of a severe application to a successful method of instruction, or whether both combined, have imparted to him his wonderful facility and power in representing various characters of an opposite description, the boy is still justly a subject of admiration and curiosity. Few things seem beyond the reach of his ability. He appears in tragedy, comedy, and farce, with great success; but, to our thinking, his personation of Irish characters is by far the best. His noiseté and rich natural brogue must always afford

Mr. Maywood lately performed Sir Archy Mac Sarcasm at this theatre, to the admiration of a crowded audience. In the representation of Scotch characters he is unrivalled in the United States.

In the course of the present month the grand musical spectacle of Cinderella, which has been in rehearsal from the commencement of the present season, will be produced, as we understand, with great splendour. It contains two strong buffo parts—one, the father of the three sisters, is to be entrusted to Placide; the other, the valet Dandini, to Mr. Thorne. Mr. Jones has a fine singing part in that of the prince. Cinderella is to be sustained by Mrs. Austin, and the two haughty sisters by Mesdames Blake and Vernon. We have particularly noted this cast, because we think it will be uncommonly effective. The music allotted to the prima donna is extremely beautiful, containing selections from Guillaume Tell, and is written for great compass and flexibility of voice. We were present at a rehearsal; and without attempting to forestall public opinion, we may, nevertheless, assure our amateurs that the music is of the very first class; the concerted pieces extraordinary for fullness; and that, in the selections from Guillaume Tell, they will hear Rossini, divested of his usual peculiarities, and habited in a new suit from head to foot. Indeed, in speaking of the style which he has lately adopted, almost all the foreign critiques written on that opera, charge him with having abandoned his usual mode of composition, and the mannerism which marks it, and gone over to the German school. The manager should give a prospectus in the bill of the various selections in this piece, which would enable the public to compare the former compositions of the great master with those unknown on this side of the Atlantic.

One of the most successful of modern playwrights is the author of the "Bold Dragoons" and "Snakes in the Grass." The managers of the Adelphi theatre have lately brought forward another new piece from his pen, which the English press pronounce his best effort. This drama, the "Wreck Ashore," is now in rehearsal, and will be produced on Tuesday evening next, for the benefit of Mr. Barry. Young Burke has volunteered his aid on the occasion, and our indefatigable and industrious stage-manager will, no doubt, be greeted by a crowded house.

While upon the subject of the Park theatre, we take occasion to observe that, although it has an excellent company, it is nevertheless susceptible of great improvements. Youthful appearance and personal beauty, in certain walks of the drama, are as necessary to perfect scenic illusion as good acting; and, in plain truth, our favourite, Mrs. Wheatley, although generally to be seen in the guise of elderly ladies, is more of a belle than the daughters and nieces whom she has usually confided to her charge.

LITERARY NOTICES.

CROLY'S HISTORY OF GEORGE IV.

IN pursuance of the plan adopted by the brothers Harper, in the formation of their "Family Library," we learn that it is their intention shortly to republish the above-named volume as one of that valuable series; and we have been favoured by them with a sight of the English copy, in anticipation of their reprint. The reputation of Mr. Croly is too well established to require eulogy; his first appearance before the public as a writer was in the field of poetry, and it is only within a few years that he has addicted himself to prose, in which, however, his success has been far greater than it ever was, or probably ever would be, as a poet. His prose writings are remarkable for the vigour of their style, and for a vein of originality, both in conception and expression, which, as it is one of the greatest, so also is it one of the rarest merits of the tribe of living authors. This quality is largely displayed in the work before us; and there is something in the energy of his diction which captivates the imagination of the reader, and commands his attention with a power that is actually irresistible. There is not a superfluous word or a feeble line. The aim of the author seems to have been, to say what he had to say in the most forcible, yet the briefest language possible; and, generally speaking, his success in attaining this object is eminent and singular. In his fictitious narratives he has also exhibited much power of description, and no inconsiderable knowledge of human nature. The life of George the fourth is not unworthy of Mr. Croly's reputation. It presents a vivid, and for the most part faithful picture of those remarkable events which have rendered the reign of this monarch a memorable epoch in the annals of Great Britain, and develops, with a spirit of philosophical accuracy, the origin and circumstances of those stirring incidents which we have seen and wondered at, and which will never be forgotten. With a few exceptions too, it does ample justice to the actors in those scenes, and is in a remarkable degree innocent of that mean tone of adulation in which the lives of kings are too often written.

But while we thus bestow our mite of approbation upon the good qualities of Mr. Croly's work, we must also censure the outrageous spirit of ultra-toryism with which some portions of the memoir are tainted, and the bitterness with which it denounces that great, just, and necessary measure, for which we think Wellington deserves more honour than for his victories—we mean the emancipation of the catholics. It was to be expected that an act like this should find but little favour in the eyes of a high and zealous churchman, educated as the clergy of England have been for many years, in the belief that the results of catholic emancipation must of necessity be injury to England; and still worse, ruin to themselves, or rather to their monstrous wealth and power. But we should have thought that the spirit of christian charity, which it is the business of divines to inculcate and enforce, would have softened the rancour of Mr. Croly's indignation, or at least have taught him to moderate the expression of his ire, however deeply he might cherish it in his inmost soul. We lament to say that it has not; and the intemperate abuse which he pours out upon those bold and prudent statesmen, by whom the great work was accomplished, does but little honour to his temper or his judgment.

NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW.

The January number of this journal did not reach us in time for notice this week; we must, therefore, content ourselves with merely giving the table of contents. The articles are—Statuary, Bank of the United States, Anatomy, Clarence, Hieroglyphics, American System, Grahame's History of the United States, Memoirs of Madame de Genlis, Philippe's Manual of Political Economy, and the History of the Jews.

FAMILY LIBRARY—NO. XIV.

The fourteenth volume of the Family Library, just published by the Messrs. Harper, consists of a narrative of discovery and adventures in the Polar seas and regions, with illustrations of their climate, geology, and natural history; and an account of the whale fishery, by Professors Leslie, Jameson, and Hugh Murray. The successive voyages made to the arctic regions, marked as well by the daring spirit of the adventurers, as by the important results to science which may be rationally anticipated from them, form a subject calculated to excite the imaginations of men, and to extend their knowledge of truth and nature. The simple relation of events and description of scenery afforded by the navigators who have penetrated to those solitary and remote portions of our planet, are tinged with the colour of romance. The forms assumed by animal and vegetable life in the arctic regions, and the geological structure of that frozen and desolate zone, have so long employed the curiosity, not only of the most scientific classes, but of all the reading part of the community, that this well written narrative will, beyond doubt, be sought with much avidity. While all may assuredly derive much entertaining information from an attentive perusal of it, no species of instruction more attractive and judicious could be placed in the hands of intelligent and educated youth. Clothed in this agreeable form, knowledge comes to them divested of every thing repulsive; it affords an excellent model of style, fills the mind with various valuable facts, and cherishes a taste for solid and useful learning.

ELEGIAC LINES,

ON THE UNTIMELY DEATH OF AN UNFORTUNATE COUPLE.

BY SAMUEL WOODWORTH.

"If ye have tears, prepare to shed them now."

Mr. Barney Brooke courted Betsey Baker,
She a pastry cook, he an undertaker;
Those who ate her tarts, pies, and sillabubs, sir,
Called her queen of hearts, at their festive clubs, sir.

Barney thus began—"Betsey I adore you—
Before another man, take the man before you;
I've a thriving trade, doctors are so plenty;
Graves must still be made—maids are grave at twenty."

With a saucy look, quick she answered Barney,
"Mr. Barney Brooke, I will not brook your blarney;
I make pies and tarts, you've a different trade, sir,
Shall the queen of hearts take the Jack of spades, sir?"

He in silence sighed, while she stirred her batter,
"Speak!" at length she cried, "never mince the matter."
Barney answered grave, while his brow was clouded—
"Grant the boon I crave, else my hopes are shrouded."

Barney wooed in vain, Betsey mock'd his passion,
Ridiculed his pain—jilting was the fashion;
The undertaker died—by sorrow overtaken—
Dr. Smoken tried, but couldn't save his bacon.

Soon the pastry cook found her roses wilting,
Because she jilted Brooks, who couldn't brook her jilting;
Fast her health did waste—pies no more she heeded,
Nor could she knead her paste, altho' her paste was needed.

Twelve o'clock at night found the maid a-weeping,
When an awful sight set her blood a-creeping!
Hid beneath the rug, soon she heard this sentence,
"Bet, your grave is dug, spite of your repentance!"

"I am Barney's ghost, who once admired your baking,
But you would rule the roast, a wicked undertaking;
Now, in the dark cold grave, your flesh is doomed to lie, miss,
And Barney Brooke must have a finger in the pie, miss."

Betty's spirit fled where it ought to go, sir—
Ape, they say, are led somewhere down below, sir;
Then, pastry cooks, beware! ne'er jilt an undertaker,
Or you may chance to share the fate of Betsey Baker.

THE RIME OF THE ANCIENT COASTER.

BY FITZ-GREENE HALLECK.

Written while sailing in an open boat on the Hudson River, between Stoney Point and the Highlands, on seeing the wreck of an old sloop, June 1821.

"And this our life, exempt from public haunt,
Finds tongues in trees, books in the running brooks,
Sermons in stones, and good in every thing."—Shaks.

Her side is in the water,
Her keel is on the sand,
And her bowsprit rests on the low gray rock
That bounds the sea and land.

Her deck is without a mast,
And sand and shells are there,
And the teeth of decay are gnawing her planks,
In the sun and the sultry air.

No more on the river's bosom,
When sky and wave are calm,
And the clouds are in summer quietness,
And the cool night-breath is balm,
Will she glide in the swan-like stillness
Of the moon in the blue above,
A messenger from other lands,
A beacon to hope and love.

No more, in the midnight tempest,
Will she mock the mounting sea,
Strong in her oaken timbers,
And her white sail's bravery.

She hath borne, in days departed,
Warm hearts upon her deck;
Those hearts, like her, are mouldering now,
The victims, and the wreck

Of time, whose touch erases
Each vestige of all we love;
The wanderers, home returning,
Who gazed that deck above,

And they who stood to welcome
Their loved ones on that shore,
Are gone, and the place that knew them
Shall know them never more.

It was a night of terror,
In the autumn equinox,
When that gallant vessel found a grave
Upon the Peekskill rocks.

Captain, mate, cook, and seamen,
(They were in all but three,)
Were saved by swimming fast and well,
And their gallows-destiny.

But two, a youth and maiden,
Were left to brave the storm,
With unpronounceable Dutch names,
And hearts with true love warm.

And they, for love has watchers
In air, on earth and sea,
Were saved by clinging to the wreck,
And their marriage-destiny.

From sunset to night's noon
She had leaned upon his arm,
Nor heard the far-off thunder toll
The tocsin of alarm.

Not so the youth—he listened
To the cloud-wing flapping by;
And low he whispered in low Dutch,
"It tells our doom is nigh.

"Death is the lot of mortals,
"But we are young and strong,
"And hoped, not boldly, for a life
"Of happy years and long.

"Yet, 'tis a thought consoling,
"That, till our latest breath,
"We loved in life, and shall not be "Divided in our death.

"Alas, for those that wait us
"On their couch of dreams at home,
"The morn will hear the funeral cry
"Around their daughter's tomb.

"They hoped" ('twas a strange moment
In Dutch to quote Shakspeare.)
"Thy bride-bed to have decked, sweet maid,
"And not have strewed thy bier."

But, sweetly-voiced and smiling,
The trusting maiden said,
"Breathed not our lips the vow to-day
"To-morrow we will wed?"

"And I, who have known thy truth
"Through years of joy and sorrow,
"Can I believe the fickle winds?
"No! we shall wed to-morrow!"

The tempest heard and paused,
The wild sea gentler moved,
They felt the power of woman's faith,
In the word of him she loved.

All night to rope and spar

They clung with strength untired,
Till the dark clouds fled before the sun,
And the fierce storm expired.

At noon the song of bridal bells
O'er hill and valley ran,
At eve he called the maiden his
"Before the holy man."

They dwelt beside the waters
That bathe yon fallen pine,
And round them grew their sons and daughters,
Like wild grapes on the vine.

And years and years flew o'er them,
Like birds with beauty on their wings,
And theirs were happy sleigh-ride winters,
And long and lovely springs,

Such joys as thrilled the lips that kist
The wave, rock-cooled, from Horeb's fountains,
And sorrows, fleeting as the mist
Of morning, spread upon the mountains,

Till, in a good old age,
Their life-breath passed away,
Their name is on the church-yard page,
Their story in my lay.

And let them rest together,
The maid, the boat, the boy,
Why sing of matrimony now,
In this brief hour of joy?

Our time may come, and let it—
'Tis enough for us now to know
That our bark will reach West-Point ere long,
If the breeze keep on to blow.

We have Hudibras and Milton,
Wine, flutes, and a bugle-horn,
And a dozen segars are lingering yet
Of the thousand of yesternorn.

They have gone, like life's first pleasures,
And faded in smoke away,
And the few that are left are like bosom friends
In the evening of our day—

We are far from the mount of battle,*
Where the wreck first met mine eye,
And now where twin-forest in the olden time rose,
Thro' the Race, like a swift steed, our little bark goes,
And our bugle's notes echo through Anthony's nose,†
So wrecks and rhymes—good by.

A TRIP TO PARIS.

BY JAMES K. PAULDING.

"Le grand auver."

It is worth while for an American to go to Paris, if it be only to see the mud in the streets, hear the boys with their baskets of pears crying "Cinque Anglais pour un sou," and be henpecked by a knowing valet, who leagues with the tailor, the barber, the chambermaid, the shopkeeper, and the washerwoman, to cheat his master and divide the spoil.

Harry Cuthbert was a young fellow of easy fortune, easy temper, easy to be persuaded, and easy to be led either right or wrong. He was without a profession, and free from the necessity of studying or practising one. He was moreover well-looking, and not altogether unworthy the attention of young ladies as well as their mammas. To the former his good looks and agreeable qualities were subjects of frequent commendation; and to the latter, his fortune made him an object of interest. He accordingly found it so easy to please, that pleasing soon ceased to be worth his while in his own opinion. He persuaded himself he had so many sources of pleasure within his reach, that it would be the height of folly to marry until all these were exhausted. He went the rounds of all, and got heartily tired of each in its turn.

"What a confounded dull place is this city of ours," said he one night to himself, after spending three hours mentally discussing the question whether he should go to a party, where he was sure of meeting the same company, the same everlasting confectionary, and the same fat sleepy fiddler, he had seen at every melée during the season.

"I won't go, shoot me if I do," cried he aloud. "I won't go—I'll go—I'll go—to Paris!"

The idea of performing this grand feat dilated his imagination into something like sublimity, and he strutted about the room like the conqueror of a world. All that he had read, all that he had heard, from his youth upwards, had united to instill into his mind a settled faith in the amazing superiority

Not the saint of that name, nor Cleopatra's lover, but a mountain in the Hudson Highlands, remarkable in its neighbourhood for the beauty of its scenery and its rattlesnakes.

of the earth, the air, the waters, the skies, the houses, the hotels, the men, women, and children, and above all, the cookery of Paris. No Welchman ever more devoutly believed the moon was made of green cheese, than our hero did that Paris was a misspelling of Paradise. Accordingly he sold his horses, his little waggon, his pointer dogs, his seat in the private box, and every thing he could sell; purchased bills on La Fitte, embarked in a Havre packet, was sea-sick all the passage, and at length put his foot down in Havre de Grace, a city without grace and without beauty. Every body wanted to show him the curiosities; but he was altogether assured that there was nothing in France, or indeed in the whole universe, worth seeing but Paris. Accordingly he turned himself round three times at Havre, picked up a pin, and went up to Paris in the steamboat, that paddled about three miles an hour, and every time she fetched her breath, puffed out a whole volume of scalding steam.

"She's no more to be compared to the North America, than an oyster-boat is to a Havre packet," thought our hero; "but never mind, wait till I get to Paris."

As they sailed up the river they passed a succession of old worm-eaten, weather-beaten towns, gray with age, and decrepit with decay. There was not a soul to be seen in the streets, except now and then a bare-headed friar or a ragged beggar.

"New-York is worth a hundred such old rusty mansions," quoth Harry Cuthbert; "but wait till I get to Paris."

The steamboat broke down and it was necessary to stop at a village, in the midst of extensive vineyards. Cuthbert had heard and read the most touching descriptions of the vineyards of France, and of the beautiful women that assisted in gathering the vintage, which was just now commencing. He ran into the country like a chicken let out of a coop, and after searching a great while, at last managed to make a clumsy-looking peasant comprehend that he wanted to see a vineyard.

"Ciel!" answered the peasant in a coarse voice; "Monsieur has got one right in his nose!"

The peasant spoke rather bad English. Our hero put his hand to his nose, but instead of a vineyard only found his whiskers. The good-natured peasant, understanding his perplexity, pointed out the precise location.

"Zounds," cried Cuthbert, "I mistook it for a great field of cabbages!" He then made a slight bow to the peasant, and thanked monsieur for his politeness.

"Eh! Monsieur!" exclaimed the other, in a passionate tone—"Eh bien! monsieur!—I am one demoiselle! monsieur—diable—hah! monsieur indeed!"

"A woman!" exclaimed our hero, as he surveyed her man's hat, coarse jacket, short petticoat which he had mistaken for small clothes, and wooden shoes; "A woman!—a specimen of the beautiful French peasantry! but never mind—wait till I get to Paris."

In approaching the city, he was surprised to see what a muddy, filthy little scoundrel of a river was the celebrated Seine. It looked and smelt just like a kennel. He compared it with the pure Hudson and the transparent Sound, and said to himself, "Is it possible that this can be the beautiful Seine? But never mind—wait till I get to Paris."

To Paris he got at last, and the first salutation he received was a bite from a great dog he attempted to pat on the head.

"Is it possible," said he, "that a Parisian dog should be so ill-bred as to bite a stranger?"

"He takes monsieur for a Jan Bull," said a bystander.

As Cuthbert threaded his way through narrow muddy streets without sidewalks, crowded with a tolerably ragged, ill-looking rabble, and lined on each side with old black-looking houses a dozen stories high, he thought to himself, "Can this be Paris? One of our bright, smiling, thriving, animated American cities is worth a dozen such Babylons. But never mind, I suppose I have not got into the genteel part of the town yet."

He arrived at the hotel, took a suite of apartments, and hired a valet to take care of his person and superintend his education.

"Ciel!" cried the valet, as he contemplated Cuthbert's costume—"Diable! where did monsieur get that coat?"

"It is the latest London cut," replied our hero modestly.

"Ah—ha!—one Jan Bull!—I thought so. But if monsieur goes into the streets with such a coat he will be mobbed."

"What, have they mobs in Paris?"

"O yes, every day, and all night. You will be torn to pieces if you go out in that coat."

Rather than be torn to pieces, our hero agreed to send for a tailor and get measured for a new one. The artiste came and made him sixty bows, for every one of which he charged a frank in his bill. The valet received a commission for bringing the tailor a customer, and the Jan Bull coat into the bargain, which he took with great indifference, saying he could get something for it of the old clothesman.

Towards evening Cuthbert thought he might venture upon a visit to one of the public gardens, in a short roundabout jacket. The women upon the Boulevards were all sitting outside of the houses, dressed in their best, to be admired by the men, who, as they passed, would turn round and ogle them in the politest manner possible.

"I'll not be out of fashion," said Cuthbert, and ogled them too. But they only laughed at his short jacket, and called him a Jan Bull. He passed the market on his way, and the poissardes saluted him with some of the finest strains of their eloquence. "Is it possible," said he, "that the women of Paris can swear?"

When he came to the gate of the garden he found a gens d'arme, with a musket and bayonet, and a tremendous pair of whiskers, who saluted him with a "Jan Bull foutre!"—and would not let him enter on account of his short jacket.

"Is it possible," quoth he again, "that the gens d'armes of Paris can be so rude?"

He retired home in disgust, and complained to the valet. "Sacre!" said the valet. "Did monsieur disgrace me by going out in that raze? I must take better care of you."

Accordingly he commenced a most rigid system of superintendence; never lost sight of his master, except when there was an absolute necessity for his absence in arranging some plan for picking his pocket. He fell into a passion, and sometimes almost into fits, at Cuthbert for speaking bad French, eating epigrammes d'agneau before brochet au bleu; breakfasting in his coat instead of his robe-de-chambre, and a thousand other crying enormities, that sometimes made him so triste that more than once he was on the point of committing suicide. He got our hero a dancing-master, a fencing-master, a language-master, and all sorts of masters, and his money melted away like butter before the sun. Never was an unfortunate single gentleman so henpecked by a valet as was our hero. "Zounds," cried he, "I might as well be married to a shrew, as yoked to this inquisitor!" But the valet was so polite in his despotism, and so useful that he could not think of throwing off the yoke and declaring himself independent. One day however the valet was so despotical on the subject of a cravat à la Talma, which he insisted was a thousand times more genteel than the cravat à la Byron, which Cuthbert had a sneaking kindness for, that our hero gave him warning.

"Ciel!" exclaimed the valet, casting up his eyes; "Ciel! have I lived to be turned out of doors by one cocoon republican?"

This was at night. Cuthbert went to a soirée at the American minister's, and when he came home was surprised to find neither valet nor any thing else at his lodgings. Monsieur had cleared out himself, and cleared out every thing he could lay hands on.

Our hero called for the master of the hotel, of whom he got six dozen bows and nothing else. He went to the police. The directeur turned to his book, where he found a full-length likeness of the valet in the person of a worthy gentleman who was vehemently suspected of being one of the greatest rogues in the city.

"Here he is," cried the directeur, and read over the description; "the very man! I've had my eye upon him these six months."

Cuthbert was a little nettled that he had not been cautioned against the fellow by the police, as they knew where he was, and so expressed himself to the directeur.

"It is not our business," said he.

"Not your business to see that strangers are not imposed upon?" said our hero warmly.

"Certainly not. We take care that strangers don't impose upon us; the strangers must take care of themselves."

"Is it possible," thought Cuthbert, "that this can be the celebrated police of Paris I've heard so much about?"

The directeur was a good-natured man, considering he was a police officer, and seeing the perplexity of his visitor, told him he would recommend him a valet who could be depended upon. In half an hour the man called, and Cuthbert hired him at once on the recommendation of the directeur of the police. He was one of the cleverest fellows in the world, and the politest of all possible valets, only he had a habit of seeing backwards and forwards, like a man rowing a boat.

He did not cheat Cuthbert above half as much as the other. But the good fortune of our hero in having such an honest, polite valet was not fated to last long. In about two months and a half he came to his master, and making divers bows, expressed his extreme mortification at being obliged to leave him.

"But why?" said Cuthbert. "Are you dissatisfied with any thing?"

He made divers other low bows, and placing his hand on his heart, replied with great sensibility, that "It would give him supreme pleasure to stay longer, but he had a particular—a very particular engagement."

They parted the best friends in the world, and Cuthbert thought he would go to his friend, the directeur of the police, and get him to recommend another valet. Having announced that his servant had left him and that he wanted another—

"O ay," replied the directeur; "poor fellow—his time is expired."

"Not at all," said our hero; "his month was only half out."

"I mean," said the directeur, "his leave of absence from the galleys expires the day after to-morrow, and he has just time to save his neck by making all the haste he can for the coast."

"The galleys!" exclaimed our hero, astonished and indignant.

"Ay, the galleys," replied the other coolly. "It is the custom to allow the galley-slaves, who conduct themselves properly, a recess from time to time, during which they are allowed to come up to Paris and earn what money they can under the surveillance of the police. They make the best servants in the world, for they know we are watching them, and that a single crime would bring them from the galleys to the gallows. I have one in waiting that I can particularly recommend."

"Thank you," said Cuthbert, making a respectful bow, in acknowledgment of this friendly offer; "I—I believe I shall be my own valet in future."

"Cochon!" muttered the directeur between his teeth, as our hero departed, saying to himself, "Is it possible! I always thought, always heard, the servants in Paris were the best in the world; but never mind, servants are servants all the world over. The aristocracy must be a superior sort of beings. I will see a little more before I judge."

On his way home, being full of thought, and not minding his way, he ran full against a decent sort of a looking man, who called him a "Dem Jan Bull," and made such a rout that a mob soon collected, with evident symptoms of hostile views towards Monsieur Jan Bull. From this dilemma he was relieved by a gentleman, who bowed very politely, took him under his protection, gallanted him out of the crowd, made him a low bow, and disappeared. "Come," thought Cuthbert, "there is some politeness in Paris after all."

When he got home he found his watch was gone.

"It must have been that brute who called me Jan Bull," quoth our hero. He was mistaken, it was the polite gentleman who made him so many low bows, and gallanted him out of the crowd.

The next day he went to dine at a famous restaurateur's, named, as I think, Hamel, who lived on the Boulevards des Italiennes. The waiter gave him a bill-of-fare a yard square, the contents of which were enough to confound Heliogabalus himself.

"I don't understand French well," said he; "this puzzles me." "Eh bien, Monsieur," replied the waiter, conceitedly; "there is the language of the court and the language of the kitchen."

"It looks like the inventory of an apothecary's shop," said Cuthbert.

"Bah!" cried the waiter with disdain, "does Monsieur compare the illiterate apothecary to the scientific cook? Peste! these Jan Bulls are great bêtes," added he aside.

Cuthbert selected some of the hardest words he could find, and ordered his dinner.

"Diable!" said the waiter, "we shall be eternally disgraced with such a dinner as this. Um—Filets de sole à la Vénitienne—um—Filets de sole à la Provençale—um—Filets de sole à l'Italienne—um—Filets de sole à l'Anglaise—um—Dem Jan Bull!—Saumon à la Genevoise—um—Anguille à la Tartare—um—Hareng, sauce moutarde—um—Carlet en matelotte Normande—Diable! Poisson—poisson—nothing but poisson! O ciel! And he went out, tearing his hair, to order this infernal dinner.

The cook swore upon one of his copper saucepans he would sooner break his three-pronged fork, lay down his sceptre and emigrate, than cook such a dinner. Even the very scullions demurred, and there was great danger of a general rising in the kitchen. The cook forthwith went to the editor of the Constitutionnel to demand the insertion of an article denouncing a fish dinner except on fast days, and that night all Paris was in an uproar about religion and the jesuits.

In the meantime the waiter was despatched to represent to our hero the utter impossibility of cooking such a dinner any where in Paris.

"Well then," said Cuthbert, in a passion, "go and serve up the cook's head in a charger for my dinner, if you like."

The eyes of the waiter dilated—"The head of the greatest artiste in all Paris—Ciel!"

"Ay, the greater the artiste the better dish his head will make."

The waiter disappeared, and in a few minutes the cook rushed in, spit in hand, his eyes glaring like two bright saucepans. "Monsieur," said he, grating his teeth, "Monsieur, hey dem! You want my head for dinner, hey?"

"Yes, you won't give me any thing else. I must have something."

"Eh bien! Peste! Diable! Sacre! O ciel! You cook the best head in all Paris for your dinner!" and he stamped about the room, repeating "Bête! Cochon! Jan Bull!" which was the climax of all. "These Anglais have no more respect for the fine arts than a republican!"

The cook would have certainly gone distracted if our hero had not pacified him by the assurance that he wanted his head to eat, in the hope that he should be thereby inspired with his genius, and become the greatest cook in Paris.

The artiste was delighted, made a thousand bows, and declared that if Monsieur would leave the dinner to his discretion he would serve him up one that should make him the envy of all the kings in the universe, not excepting Charles the Tenth. Thus this momentous business was settled without bloodshed, and Cuthbert at last dined upon several dishes that he thought must have been made up after an apothecary's prescription. This observation being communicated to the cook by the waiter, who hated the cook because he interfered with his perquisites, had a fatal effect upon his spirits. He pined away, never cooked a good dinner afterwards, mistook Carottes à la Flamande for Asperges en petits pois, and finally was found one morning suspended from the crane of the chimney, with the little turnspit licking his feet.

Our hero frequently went to fashionable parties, where he saw people of high rank, and was introduced to some of the beauties of Paris.

"Is it possible!" thought he. "These dukes and marshals actually look just like men I have seen in my own country, and behave very much like the well bred people there. As for the ladies, they are certainly pretty enough—but one need not go out of Broadway to see pretty women any day in the week."

After being in Paris about three months, Cuthbert found it was possible to be ennuyé even in Paris. It is impossible to be always eating and seeing sights, and besides the winter was setting in and Cuthbert never encountered such a winter. It was worth going to Paris to see. He never saw the sun for six weeks. The whole country was in tears, and so was the city. If it did not rain, it drizzled; and if it did not drizzle, it misted. The windows ran dew-drops day and night, and so did the walls, the banisters, and every thing inside the house. One day as he was sitting disconsolate in the midst of the world of waters, he said to himself—"Is it possible this can be the delightful climate of Paris?"

Just then a few drops of water trickled down on his head from the upper ceiling. "It must be the deluge," thought he, and ran up stairs where he found Mi Lord Anglais, an Englishman and fellow-lodger, sitting on the bed fishing with great gravity, and reading old Izaak Walton meanwhile.

"What luck, my lord?" said Cuthbert.

"Middling," quoth Mi Lord Anglais—"I've had symptoms of a glorious nibble. Pray be so good as to send my servant with a boat to take me off this island."

"I'll not stay any longer to get mildewed in this amphibious place," cried Cuthbert, as he sat brooding in his room, and listening to the waters as they trickled down the walls, inside and out. The next morning he was ready to set out.

"Whither so fast?" cried Mi Lord Anglais, who had finished his fishing match.

"I am going to America."

"Is it possible! What can induce you to go there?"

"To see the sun."

"O, if that's all, I advise you to go to England."

Cuthbert did not go to England, but to the United States, where he saw the sun shine on the happiest of all happy nations; and beheld eyes that sparkled as bright as the sun. In counting up the sum total of his gains and losses in Paris, he found himself a few thousands out of pocket. He ought to have staid longer, and he would have seen what the French really are when inspired by the love of liberty. Had he been there during the three days, he would have witnessed something worth going to Paris for—the triumph of a great nation.

"But I have gained great experience," said he; "I have found out that a man who sells his own lands to go and see those of other people, is a great blockhead."

Cuthbert is now married and settled down as an independent country gentleman, and when he sees people half mad at the idea of going to visit Paris, he smiles, but says nothing. B.

FORGETFULNESS.

BY WILLIS G. CLARK.

Oh, think not of that vanished dream, thou lovely one and young;
Forget the warm, impassioned vow, on love's beguiling tongue:
For time hath not one balm to heal a wounded breast like thine,
Whose purest faith was offered up on a delusive shrine:
And though thy sweet voice triumphed, when the soul's confession fell
From lips that sealed it with a kiss, whose fragrance none may tell—
Yet it died, when from thy burning cheek, the heart's tumultuous blood Rolled back in silence to its cell, a swift and heavy flood.

Why is it that, at such an hour, the purple currents rise,
To bathe in varying hues the face, and light the swimming eyes,
Where thoughts of tenderness unfold, are palpably revealed,
As each foud glance of transport given, by plighted vow is sealed?
It is that by that thrilling spell, the heart in fellowship
Sends up its flood, to paint the cheek, and warm the faltering lip:
That, melting in continual flow, the inconstant tide may be
A pure libation of the soul, victorious love, to thee!

Yet school thy heart a veil to fling o'er the lamented past,
Where all was bright and beautiful—too beautiful to last:
And let the waves of Lethe roll, above thy perished spring,
Where time, with laughter on his brow, shook diamonds from his wing:
And let the smile, the vow, the tear, be each beneath the pall,
That from oblivion's dusky plume shall, like a curtain, fall:—
What reck's it that life's faded hours passed like a summer stream,
Alas! where now have fled away their glory and their gleam?

Oh! if within thy heart of hearts, the memory should live,
Of dreams, so passionate and deep, and yet so fugitive,
It will but wake a quenchless thirst, for moments vanished now—
It will bring ashes to thy lip, and fever to thy brow:
And clouds, from the lone spirit's cell, in sable throngs will come
To clothe each image of the brain, in drapery of gloom:
Till, faint and sick, the autumnal hue upon thy cheek shall lie,
And futile longings fill with tears thy dim and pensive eye!

Then, think of love's departed hours, in dallying rapture spent,
As glimmerings of a melting wave, with sunset colours blent;
Bright—but so changeable, as to fade upon the gazer's eye,
While yet it drinks the glory of the accidental sky!
Love comes upon a rosy plume; and, borne in light along,
He pours his radiance on the brow, and wakes the soul to song:
But the golden bowl is broken soon, and when the heart is bow'd,
The wrecks of his dominion are—the shadow and the cloud!

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTERS FROM LONDON,

To the Editor of the New-York Mirror.

NUMBER NINE.

London, November 26.

So far, I confess, I have been rather disappointed with the theatricals of the metropolis. Probably I looked for too much, and my disappointment is therefore only the natural consequence of unreasonable anticipations; and possibly I have that to see which will more than realize my most extravagant expectations. I am as yet a stranger to the nervous and polished acting of Young—to the glories of Pasta, and the witcheries of Malibran—to the wonderful natural powers and extensive acquirements of Braham, and the divine simplicity of Stephens—to the smiles and fascinations of Vestris, and the spiritual dancing of Taglioni, and to a mass of talent, native and foreign, which has not yet been brought forward. True, in the days of my youth, I have seen a portion of those named above, and the impression then made on my green fancy has scarcely faded away; but I would have it stamped afresh—strongly and vividly—before I venture to put pen to paper concerning those "bright particular stars" of the dramatic heavens. An innumerable quantity of clever actors and actresses are at present playing; some of whom, in particular characters, approach perfection; but not any, take them for all in all, of tip-top ability, with the exception of Liston and Miss Paton. Indeed, there are woeful gaps in the acting of the English drama of the present day, which cannot be adequately filled. Charles Kemble, for some unaccountable reason, has forsaken Thalia, and voluntarily made a sacrifice of himself to Melpomene, preferring a second or third-rate station in tragedy to reigning lord of a high department of comedy. Time too, though he has dealt leniently with this gentleman, has not altogether passed him by. The tall, noble form is yet unbent, and the fine classical features untouched—but he is waxing portly, and the fire and elasticity of youth are no more. Setting him aside, where shall we look for the Doricourts and young Mirabels of the drama? "Where?" cries the public, and the managers echo—"where?" The representatives of such characters seem to have passed away with the characters themselves; and their places on the stage, as in real life, have been filled by Alfred Highflyers, Frank Poppletons, and similar brainless youths of the Tom and Jerry school. A boisterous spendthrift or a foolish fop has many very capital representatives, for it is only, to a great portion of the actors, appearing in their natural character and playing on the stage what they play off; but Shakspeare is far beyond their calibre, and Benedicts and Mercutios are not to be had. Tangents and Young Rapids are in abundance, but the Rangers and Captain Plumes are gone; and a Sir Harry Wildair on the boards would now be as great a curiosity as the real character at Tattersall's. It is curious to observe how helpless and out of their element a number of airy pleasant actors on the London stage appear to be when a few lines of Shakspeare are put into their mouths. They are quite at home in the light and agreeable conceits of Peake or Poole, but sink beneath the more substantial wit and humour of the older dramatists.

The fashionable dames of genteel comedy are in a similar predicament with the gentlemen, and the Lady Townleys and Lady Teazles are quite losing their characters with the public, in consequence of the chambermaid-airs and graces of their unworthy representatives for the time being. Even at Drury-Lane—"that it should come to this"—I have seen Letitia Hardy played in such a manner by a Mrs. Waylett, as to induce me to believe that Miss Kelley's personation of that character is by no means the worst performance in the world. The lady is uncommonly pleasant in trifling, coquetish parts in farces; but unfortunately, not having the fear of criticism before her eyes, and being prompted by vanity and "vaulting ambition," she did voluntarily act and perform and make a fool of herself in the said part, and circumstances behind the curtain conspired to permit her to do so. The papers, however, next morning admonished her, and she has not since repeated the offence. In tragedy, setting aside Miss Fanny Kemble, there is no woman of more than moderate pretensions; or rather, I should say, of moderate capabilities; for whatever the abilities of the sons and daughters of Thespis may be, their pretensions are generally immeasurable; and the probability is, that nineteen out of twenty of all the tenth-rate tragedy queens in England think themselves amply qualified to reign paramount at Drury-lane or Covent-garden, and that only bad taste, envy, cabal, and intrigue, prevent their occupying their proper station. Moreover, they will not only think this, but say this, to the utter astonishment of those who know them not, and the infinite amusement of those who do. Miss Fanny Kemble is undoubtedly a young girl of great, very great ability; but she is not yet—indeed, how should she be?—either a Miss O'Neil or a Mrs. Siddons.

In opera the case is still worse. Braham and Wood remain as yet unengaged at either of the large theatres; and it is somewhat doubtful whether Miss Stephens will ever tread the boards again. Miss Paton, it is said, is about to sail for Italy, and if she does, the English stage is left without a prima donna; for though, perhaps, there never was at any one time such a number of pretty, pleasing vocalists in London, yet few of them rise above mediocrity, and the distance between them all and the lady just named is immense. I went the other evening to Drury-lane to have a peep at a new Rosina, in the person of a Miss S. Philips. The name did not strike me; but judge of my utter astonishment when I recognised in Rossini's heroine, the very Miss Philips who, a year or two ago, made such an unsuccessful appearance at the Bowery theatre! She was, moreover, a good deal applauded; for even she, with her limited power of voice and graceless attempts at embellishment, is the best singer at Drury-lane! She has some sweet tones in her voice, and her enunciation, in the plain parts of her singing, is very clear and distinct. This, with her acting, which is much improved, being in many respects a pretty fair imitation of little touches of Clara Fisher, carries her through. You will perceive from this, how very much the cultivated powers and bird-like warbling of Mrs. Austin are wanted here. Indeed there is nothing on the London boards at present to be compared to her practised skill, delicious voice, and wonderful facility of execution.

Do not suppose that I am splenetic, or have fallen into the common practice of not being able to see any thing in the present comparable to the past. Being as yet a comfortable number of years on the right side of thirty, I flatter myself I am at a reasonable distance from that period of dotage which sooner or later overtakes old playgoers, when nothing that is, is to be compared to that which has been. With the above exceptions there is, in almost every other department of the drama, a host of talent, of which more anon.

A word or two touching old acquaintances may not be uninteresting. Sloman has taken a theatre in the country and is now a manager; the "being's end and aim" of every man who treads the boards, from the head tragedian to the subordinate supernumerary whose salary is a mockery. I suppose he is enabled to do this by means of the American dollars judiciously paid to hear those masses of outrageous nonsense termed "comic songs," but in what way comic I never could discover. Charles E. Horn continues, as usual, singing sometimes "excellent well," sometimes little better than execrably. I always thought, and am now convinced, that his acting is a species of somnambulism. He walks about the stage like a man in a dream, and talks by fits and starts like Pizarro in the tent scene. He has the character here of being a reckless, careless fellow, who will never do any good, though of very great ability, both as a musician and composer. Hunt, formerly of the Bowery, is allowed to make a noise occasionally at Covent-garden in minor parts on account of his good-looking face and tolerable figure. H. Wallack is engaged in that indescribable branch of theatrical employment, termed "decent business," and James Wallack is creditably fulfilling the duties of his old and arduous station of stage-manager at Drury-lane. I saw him the other evening in his favourite character of Massaroni in the Brigand. He looked remarkably well, and acted with great spirit; but I feel a diffidence in hazarding an opinion whether his manner of giving "Love's Ritornella" or that of the worthy manager of the Park theatre was most admirable. It appears to me, however, that both of them, doubtless led away by a consciousness of their natural and acquired powers, embellish too much, and indulge in a succession of difficult shakes, trills, and cadences utterly at variance with the simplicity of the melody. I have seen nothing as yet to equal the walk of Richings when well dressed, or Collett's bow, in any situation. C.

AN ODE TO FANCY.

BY THYRZA.

Thou, who art my spirit's bane,
Yet the soother of each pain;
Thou, whose power can bid me weep
Yet can lull each care to sleep;
Thou, who hast from childhood been
Still the angel of each scene—
Leave me, bright one, leave me not
To the darkness of my lot!

Never could my spirit brook
On reality to look,
Nor the features dare to trace
Of her stern forbidding face,
Didst thou not, that face to screen,
Fling thy silver veil between,
Hiding from my startled glance
Such a gloomy countenance
As the maiden, wild and pale,
Saw the prophet's hand unveil.*
Still, sweet spirit, hide from me
Thus my frowning destiny!

If with calmness I have born
Pangs which have my spirit torn;
If not vainly I have tried
Suffering of soul to hide;
If the heart's faint sickness, wrought
By the power of bitter thought,
I have struggled with and quelled,
Though no eye the strife beheld,
'Tis, enchantress, unto thee
That I owe the victory!
Thine the power, the triumph thine,
O'er this rebel heart of mine—
Oh! though dearer guests have gone,
Leave it, charmer, not alone!

Thou hast given me strength to bear
All my spirit's load of care;
Thou hast charmed e'en grief to rest—
When my heart thy presence blest;
Many a sad and weary hour
Thou hast cheated with thy power;
Many a dark, unwelcome guest
Thou hast banished from my breast;
Many a vision fair and bright
Thou hast brought before my sight.
'Twas thy potent spell which cast
Light upon the gloomy past,
'Tis thy spell whose magic power
Brightens e'en the present hour,
And the future owes to thee
All that makes it fair to me.

Yet less frequently thy light
Comes to make my pathway bright,
And thy visits are no more
Bright and beaming as of yore;
But methinks thy light is faded
And thy dazzling brow o'ershadowed.
Are these tokens meant to say
That thou too wilt flee away?
Oh! so long my spirit's mate,
Wilt thou leave me desolate?
I will brook the form of ill
If thy smile is left me still;
I will bear the deepest gloom
Which thy light may still illumine;
I will wrestle with my lot
So that thou forsake me not—
Through the ills I must inherit
Oh! be thou my min'string spirit!

THE GIFT.

BY WILLIAM PITT PALMER.

I ASKED the airy sprites that dwell
By fount and green-wood tree—
"What precious gift so rich as man's,
"From nature's hands have ye?"
"We've countless things of mystic worth
"Of every form and dye;
"But nought of all the wealth we prize
"With that one gift can vie."

I asked the earth, inlaid with gems
And sands of glittering gold—
"What sparkling boon, like heaven's to man,
"Does thy regalia hold?"
"Golconda's wealth, Potosi's stores
"Are mine," proud earth replied,
"With many a priceless pearl, but all
"Are poor that gift beside!"

I asked the ocean's favoured king
Amid his gorgeous hoard—
"What prouder gift than man can bring,
"Within thy realms is stored?"
And frankly free in all his pride
The trident-king declared—
"Take all the wealth of all my realms,
"Tis nought with that compared."

I asked the jewelled stars that light
The shadowy throne of even—
"Boast ye a richer, fairer boon,
"Than hath to man been given?"
And from the stilly depths of night
There came an answering tone—
"Though many a glorious gift we hold,
"Man bears a nobler boon."

And nature speaks, "thy quest forbear;
"No more my favours scan:
"Of all who've shared my free bequests,
"There's none so blest as man."
And what his high and hallowed gift,
That hath no counterpart
In all the treasured universe?
"Tis woman's blessed heart!"

THE CENSOR.

THE LITTLE GENIUS.

No. 102.

I LOOKED again in the mirror. The forest was there once more, and the pleasant valley; but the time was changed. The moonlight had vanished with its clouds of silver—its deep and hushed shadows. The blazing sun, with broadened disk, lingered in the west. Soft and yellow, his beams gleamed through the heavy branches, and illumined all the chambers of the wood. Through the wide stillness the woodpecker's beak was sometimes heard. The startled partridge broke from his covert with whirring wings. The gentle robin whistled as he flew silently by; and the idle tortoise, half buried in leaves, opened his spotted shell and put forth his awkward head. Bees were humming among the flowers, and in the distance, the dash of a little cascade drew my eyes to the spot where its shining water turned over a broken rock and fell flashing and foaming through the trees.

"I behold by the stream another form," said I, "with the fatal word stamped on his forehead. He too is of young and lofty bearing. Cheerfully he treads among the silent woods. Does he, also, hasten to despair and death?"

"Observe him in silence," said the Genius. "The enjoyment of wealth has never enervated his mind. Nature has always appeared to him as it is—a beautiful and happy prospect, gleaming through clouds and storms. But he knows the world, and tempers his feelings."

"And what then doth he bear upon his shoulder?"

"Gold," replied the Genius; "not the gift of fortune—but the result of enterprise and patient labour. Through peril, toil, and privation he has accumulated that little sum. His time is never wasted—he has seen so much misery in the great world, that he is in a measure callous to its influence. Thousands are generous, not from benevolence but from ignorance. If the consequences of extravagance were to be suffered before the errors were committed, the spendthrift would be a miser. Enthusiasm would often give way to prudence. He has felt the relentless hand of necessity goading him on to industry; and though neither corrupt in principle nor cold in heart, that which he has acquired with exertion he will treasure with care."

As he stood erect in manly strength and beauty, an aged blind man came by, led by a little dog. Thin locks of snowy hair gave a wonderful grace to his head. His features resembled those of Homer or Milton, as we see them etched in the marble. He uttered a piteous cry, and said

"I am lost in these pathless woods. Darkness is over my sight—my guide has abandoned me. I heard footsteps. Save me, oh save me!"

The youth laid his hand upon the treasure—paused—then drew the bandage tighter.

"I will lead thee into thy way, unhappy old man, but cannot give thee gold."

He walked with him till they stood upon the broad road.

"Whither shall I go?" said the beggar. "I am weary with exertion, and faint for want of food."

Here the little dog fawned upon him and licked his hand—tears rolled down the old man's cheeks. The youth turned away and was lost among the shadows.

On the hill by the river's side stood a lordly palace. Its lofty columns and white turrets gleamed through the trees—a star beamed high in heaven—then the moon rose with her broad and melancholy face. Soft clouds lay around, with silver sides, piled up in beautiful silent heaps, or ranged in fleecy waves, like the breast of a breezy lake. Then red light streamed from the tall windows, and a chord of music rose. The youth was there—the word on his forehead was nearly erased—he came to visit the master of all this beauty—to mingle with the young, the great, the lovely of the land. A thought of the old blind man, with his high forehead and snowy hair shot across his mind, and a feeling of regret not free from shame sunk into his heart; but he withdrew into a secluded part of the garden, where stood a statue of our Redeemer on the cross. A shadow fell upon it, but the moonlight shone on a part of its white pedestal. He poured his golden coins upon the marble and forgot the old man's sightless eyes and trembling hands, while counting the treasures that day had added to his heap.

The interior of the splendid mansion now appeared, and a brilliant crowd. He who gave the dazzling fête was proud and happy among his countless friends; but even while listening to the voice of adulation, messengers came pale and breathless, and his brow was clouded. His ships had gone down at sea—fire had desolated his princely halls—ruin had overtaken him. This was no sooner rumoured about, than there came over the bright scene a strange transformation. The music ceased. The master leaned against a column. Cold looks met him—a moment passed. Where was the happy multitude? Only the youth remained. Broken garlands strewed the floor—silence reigned in the deserted hall.

"Save me," said the ruined man, in a tone of anguish. "You have shared my prosperity—I have led you through paths of profit—you have amassed gold. The world has abandoned me. I expected no more. But you have been nearer to me. You will not shrink away!"

The youth's cheek was suffused with a glow—not of gratitude or of compassion alone—but of both those emotions alloyed with perplexity and shame. He sympathized with the sufferer, but he himself had suffered, and he remembered the hours of labour—the time when he had formed the purpose of becoming wealthy, and vowed to be drawn away from its accomplishment by no weak feeling. He turned from him with moistened eyes. The voice of his friend died away, unanswered but by the echo of that sad and lonely chamber.

His reward was at hand. The palace became his own. The more wealth he possessed, the more rapidly and easily he added to his abundance.

"Now," said my companion, "he is rich."

"But is he not base also?" I inquired.

"Base or noble," said the Genius, "such is the way to affluence."

"Must I believe, then," asked I, "the rich all heartless?"

"Far from it," said the Genius. "Accident, talents, personal privations, often facilitate the progress of him who searches for gold; but they who adopt a severe course of economy must necessarily exclude from their enjoyments the indulgence of those generous impulses which in many are the sources of purifying and enduring pleasure."

"But how much more admirable is he whose generous enthusiasm but lately led him to scorn gold, when compared with feeling?"

"He may be worthy of a kind of admiration," said the Genius; "but is he a model for imitation? You have traced the destiny of two equally gifted by nature, with ardent sensibilities, but modified by various causes. Both valued wealth—one from a vain taste for splendour, the other from an experience of its value. The lines of distinction between what is generous and what is just, are wavering and almost imperceptible. It is the duty of every man to regard the interests of his own family, exclusive of all other considerations but the laws of society, and those immutable principles of moral right concerning which no dispute can arise. The world teems with innumerable examples of wretchedness. In a city like yours they meet you at almost every step. The aged, the crippled, orphans, widows, and the victims of misfortune and disease, continually shock the sensitive observer, and awaken in his bosom powerful desires to dispense relief to all. The inexperienced attempts it, and is ruined. He who prides himself upon his knowledge of human nature, hushes up the gentle voice of humanity, and is enriched by pursuing an opposite course. I would teach you to avoid either extreme. Neither disregard emotions of sympathy, nor yield to them without discrimination. Beware of generosity without discretion, or you will be subjected often to ridicule, and sometimes to anguish; but, on the other hand, fear to tread in all the ways of the world which custom has rendered safe, though she could not make them noble." THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Poor emigrants.—A multitude of this class of emigrants have been brought to New-York within the last few months, many of them quite recently. As most of these adventurers have left their native countries under the pressure of adversity, and subject to almost every privation, it cannot be supposed they possess the means of supporting themselves without an immediate resort to employment of some kind. But how is employment to be obtained at this season of the year, when the city is thronged with a population whose necessities press upon them with severity, and who are glad to seize any occasion to obtain temporary relief? These emigrants, it must be remembered, are not only strangers in our land, but strangers to our customs and modes of doing business, and not a few of them altogether unacquainted with our language. Here then is a powerful appeal to the hospitality and good feelings of the citizens; and we deem it one that ought not to be disregarded for a moment. We are now in the depth of winter; and whilst this operates greatly to abridge the means of useful labour, it multiplies those imperious calls for sustenance, clothing, and fuel, which cannot be dispensed with. These considerations are much strengthened from the circumstance, that a large portion of these people have families of helpless children, who must be provided for, but who are yet too young to earn their own subsistence, even were there no other interposing obstacles. We think the city authorities are called upon to make a seasonable appropriation for this urgent purpose, provided it be not already done. If no steps to that effect have been taken, we are satisfied it does not arise from the absence of those generous sentiments which have long characterized our public guardians, and which have never failed to meet with a cheerful response in every bosom.

We have often contemplated with pleasure the admirable establishment which for a long time was kept up, (we are not advised of its continuance,) and which had the significant appellation of soup house. A more judicious and useful application of funds, to a moderate amount, we believe was never made. A pint of good soup, with a slice of bread, is a sufficient repast for a grown person, whilst a less quantity will serve a child; and we are all aware of its nutritive quality. This species of food, which can be made rich and palatable from the coarser parts of meat, when combined with a plentiful supply of vegetables, could be afforded, we presume, at two cents a quart; which should, perhaps, be the price demanded from those who are able to pay for it, but which ought to be delivered gratuitously to those who are not.

The mass of the community are perhaps too prone to view plans of this kind as burdensome. In this we think they greatly err. It should be borne in mind that an accession in numbers of a healthful and industrious population is an accession of strength, and leads to a multiplication, in a corresponding degree, of wealth and resources. This remark will apply with peculiar force as well to our own commonwealth as to the country at large. We have yet room for many millions, a majority of whom would seek for a residence in the interior, which holds out the strongest allurements to the industrious and virtuous settler. A comfortable subsistence rarely fails to be the reward of this class of people—very frequently, indeed, they realize an independence and rise to respectability. Much depends on timely aid and relief, with a right direction to the bold spirit and vigorous energies of the foreigner, who has been driven into exile by blighted prospects and withered hopes in the soil of his nativity, which must otherwise have been dear to his affections.

Medical libel suit.—This case, which has been productive of no worse consequences than a little brisk sparring among the lawyers, and a verdict in favour of the defendants. It occupied the court three days.

THE BANKS OF ALLAN WATER.

A BALLAD WRITTEN BY M. G. LEWIS—COMPOSED BY C. E. HORN.

ANDANTE.

On the banks of Al-lan wa-ter, When the sweet spring time did fall, Was the mil-ler's love-ly daugh-ter, Fair-est of them all:

For his bride a sol-dier sought her, And a win-ning tongue had he; On the banks of Al-lan wa-ter, None so gay as she.

2d—On the banks of Allan water,
When brown autumn spreads its store,
There I saw the miller's daughter,
But she smiled no more;

For the summer, grief had brought her,
And the soldier, false was he;
On the banks of Allan water
None so sad as she.

3d—On the banks of Allan water,
When the winter snow fell fast,
Still was seen the miller's daughter—
Chilling blew the blast!

But the miller's lovely daughter,
Both from cold and care was free:
On the banks of Allan water,
There a corse lay she.

SCRAPS FROM AN OLD COMMON-PLACE BOOK.

BRADSHAW, president of the high court of justice which condemned Charles the First, is called by one of the old cavaliers, "That infernal saint, John Bradshaw." The following noble epitaph was engraven on a cannon fixed in the ground on the summit of a hill in the island of Jamaica:

"Stranger! as you pass, contemplate this cannon, nor regardless be told that near its base deposited the dust of John Bradshaw, who, nobly superior to selfish regards, despising alike the pageantry of courtly splendour, the blast of calumny, and the terrors of royal vengeance, presided in the illustrious band of heroes and patriots who fairly and openly adjudged Charles Stuart, tyrant of England, to a public and exemplary death; thereby presenting to the amazed world, and transmitting down through applauding ages, the most glorious example of unshaken virtue, love of freedom, and impartial justice ever exhibited on the blood-stained theatre of human actions. O, reader! pass not on till thou hast blessed his memory, and never, never forget that rebellion to tyrants is obedience to God."

MUTUAL RIGHT OF SEARCH BETWEEN ENGLAND AND THE UNITED STATES.—I once wrote the following fable about the time the British government was proposing to ours to consent to a mutual right of search, under pretence of putting an end to the slave trade.

"A cunning old fox who had often baffled the hounds, one day came to a young eagle, just fledged, perched up in its roost in a high tree, and addressed her as follows: 'My dear young friend, I wish to make a bargain with you on terms of perfect reciprocity. Those wicked weasels rob all the poultry yards about the country, and I am very anxious to destroy them, or at least put a stop to their depredations, by stripping them of their plunder before they have time to devour it. You shall have the privilege of searching my hole, and of examining your nest to see if any young chickens have been secreted there without our knowledge.' 'Thank you kindly,' replied the young eagle; 'when my claws are as long and sharp as your teeth, it will be time enough to conclude this bargain; till then I'd rather be excused?'"

CONFOUNDING OF POLITICAL PARTIES IN 1820.

Just so the prudent husbandman that sees
The idle tumult of his factious bees,
The morning dews, the flowers neglected grown,
The hive a bomb case, every bee a drone,
Powers them o'er till none discerns his foes,
And all, themselves in meal and friendship lose,
The insect kingdom straight begins to thrive
And all wake honey for the common hive.

MUSIC.—The province of music is rather to express the passions and feelings of the human heart than the actions of men, or the operations of nature. When employed in the former capacity, it becomes an eloquent language; when in the latter, a mere mimic—an imitator, and a very miserable one—or rather a buffoon, caricaturing what it cannot imitate. The idea of the different stages of a battle, or the progress of a tempest being represented to the eye or the ear, or even the imagination, by the quavering of a fiddler's elbow, or the squeaking of catgut, is preposterous.

RETIREMENT.—One of the most beautiful descriptions of retirement is in an ode of Charles Cotton, the friend of old Isaac Walton, the famous piscator.

How calm and quiet a delight
It is alone
To read, and meditate, and write,
By none offended, and offending none;
To walk, ride, sit, or sleep at one's own ease,
And pleasing a man's self, none other to displease

ACTING.—The merit of an actor consists in two things; the slurring over of the bad passages with a sort of graceful negligence, and the giving full and complete effect to the good ones.

CONVERSION.—People that change their religion from reading books of controversy, are not so much converted as outwitted.

BEAVERS.—The Indians say the beavers were once gifted with speech, but the Great Spirit deprived them of it lest they should get the better of mankind.

A NEW-YEAR'S REVERIE.

BY MISS ELIZABETH BOBERT.

Be still, my heart, while I commune awhile
With the departed year. Canst thou not cease
Thy wild and turbulent beatings, while my thoughts
Flow back through memory's channel o'er the past?
Curb thy rebellious feelings—'tis in vain
To look for aught but disappointment here.
Sad are the changes of this checkered life!
How they break friendships and extinguish love!
How they cheat hope of promise! ay, and jar
Upon the spirit's harmony with man!

Another year now opens to the view,
And lengthens out its months and days and hours,
Through the dim vista of futurity,
As "shadows lengthen in the setting sun."
Where are the fleeting moments of the past?
Gone—freighted as they were with joy or grief,
Swallowed in the interminable gulf,
Which takes all time can give, and gives none back.
What are the revolutions of the world?
Its wars, its victories, and its deeds of fame;
Its liberated countries, or its chains
Of slavery for others? Those are themes
For men, with wider thoughts and words of power,
To tell their meaning.

Not for me.
I look back on the revolutions wrought
In individual feeling—on the things
O'er which forgetfulness has passed to all
But my own heart—would that its misty veil
Were spread o'er that! but ah, it cannot be.
The visions of the faded year still rise,
Like spirits of the dead, on which the earth
Has no more hold or power. I cannot break
The withered branch from memory—still it hangs
O'er each green spot, and scatters enviously
Its ere and yellow leaves. I watered it
At first, with many a tear, and strove in vain
To bring its freshness and its beauty back;
And when I found 'twas useless, then I wept
Anew, because it was of no avail.
I'll trust no more to hope—for now I know
It hath a thousand lives, that each may have
Its death within the heart.

But why these thoughts?
The new-year's day is scarcely over yet;
And I have looked on many a happy face,
And heard the voice of pleasure, and the wish,
By friendly feeling given. Are not these
Enough to wake a brighter reverie,
And chase away the memory of the past?
Who would not hail the opening year, and love
The social custom, which gives lighter wings
To festive moments, and instructs the heart
In lessons of good-will? Pride may look down,
And vain fantastic fashion seek 't invade
On long established rules—but fear them not;
They can but be as feathers in the scale,
While hospitality and friendship join
To turn the balance.

ORIGINAL TALES.

REMINISCENCES OF A SPINSTER.

BY MRS. EMMA C. SNURY.

It was a fine summer evening; a slight shower had fallen, and as the last beams of the setting sun lingered on the verdant lawn, every leaf of the dark trees, every blade of the tender grass, glittered with an emerald too precious to adorn any brow but that of nature. The sky was covered with clouds so gorgeous-tinted and beautiful, that even to the coldest fancy they might have seemed like the golden veils of the sanctuary, concealing from common eyes the "holy of holies," the transcendent glories of the far-off heaven. It was such an hour and such a scene as the young and imaginative always love. The strong analogy which subsists between nature and the human heart, between the world without and the world within, must be apparent even to the most unobservant; and every one must recollect the delight which such fanciful speculations were wont to afford in the days of youth and hope, ere disappointment and suffering had taught him to find only melancholy in the comparison.

Few persons were more susceptible of enjoyment from such a scene than the young, the gay, the enthusiastic Rosalie Somerton, and her more serious but no less enthusiastic aunt, yet they now seemed totally unconscious of its beauty. Seated in the deep recess of a window, which opened upon a balcony filled with odoriferous shrubs, aunt Mary was occupied in watching the motions of her pretty niece, who, leaning against the latticed front, was diligently pulling to pieces a very fine rose.

"How can you so remorselessly destroy that beautiful flower?" said aunt Mary, with a smile; "it was plucked from my favourite bush; and if I am not mistaken, is the same which the gallant Major Easton so gracefully twined in your hair a few hours ago!"

Rosalie started. "I hate Major Easton, and every thing that reminds me of him," exclaimed she vehemently, flinging down the flower as she spoke.

"I have no doubt that such are your present feelings," replied her aunt gravely; "nothing can be more natural, but at the same time nothing can be more unjust."

Rosalie was about to ask an explanation when the sound of a horse's hoofs was heard, and she bent eagerly forward to catch a glimpse of the road, which was just visible through the trees.

"Do not look so anxiously, my dear Rose, he will not return to-night," said her aunt, as the horseman passed.

"Indeed, madam, you speak in riddles. I—" Here Rosalie's assumed calmness forsook her, and she burst into tears.

"My child, I did not mean to distress you," said her aunt, kindly; "but when I saw the flush of anger upon your cheek, and the sparkling of indignation in your eye, I felt that you merited some punishment. I cannot bear your tears; come, lay your head upon my bosom, as you were wont to do in your childish days, and tell me all that grieves you?"

"Oh! there is nothing to tell, dear aunt; I have been very angry, that is all; and—and—"

"Shall I finish the sentence, Rose? You have been very angry, and are now very penitent. Nay," continued aunt Mary, "you need not give those pretty curls such a toss; penitence is the very word I meant to use, however wounding it may be to your pride. Now suppose, instead of your telling me the story of your lover's quarrel, I shall tell you all I know about it, do you not think that between conjecture and observation I might arrive pretty near the truth?"

"Indeed, aunt, I do not know what you can have observed," said Rosalie.

"Sit down beside me, Rose, and I will tell you. In the first place, I observed that you had bestowed unusual care upon your personal appearance, and you were conscious your labour had not been lavished in vain; this elated your spirits, and when Edward Walton and his friend arrived, the evident admiration of the latter, and the whispered compliments of the former, completed your intoxication. You know I have often told you that when you are thus led away by the extravagance of your spirits, your manners are precisely those which, however charming in a girl of fifteen, certainly afford least pleasure at an age when we look for the calm and self-possessed gentleness of the woman. Your manners this afternoon were characterized by all those quick and violent transitions of feeling, all that unmeaning petulance, which are so startling and distressing to him who is about to entrust his whole happiness to your hands. Edward Walton loves you sincerely, my dear Rose, but he has too much prudence to allow his passion to blind him to your faults. He is well aware that a woman, however charming, who cannot govern herself, is not the proper person to preside over a well regulated household, and he cannot but feel wounded when you compel him to doubt the wisdom of his choice. But to proceed with my observations. You accompanied the gentlemen to the garden, and after flirting for some time with the major, to the manifest annoyance of your lover, you suffered him, notwithstanding Edward's whispered remonstrance, to place in your hair the rose which you have just discarded. The major's smile at what he no doubt considered your affectation, aroused Edward's anger, and the quarrel which afterwards ensued between you was caused rather by his jealous fear lest others should think so meanly of you, than by his anger at your folly as affecting himself. He knew that Major Easton, in common with all those who have lived much in dissipated society, entertains a very contemptible opinion of our sex, and he was mortified to see you sacrificing his comfort, merely to gain the insecure admiration of one so much his inferior."

"Edward ought to have known better than to believe I sought the major's admiration," replied Rosalie; "if I erred, it was simply through the too great extravagance of my spirits, but certainly not from any disposition to coquetry."

"My dear Rosalie," said her aunt, "you are yet to learn how ill nature and prejudice may misrepresent the most innocent actions. Major Easton, no doubt, construed your gaiety into coquetry, your petulance into ill temper, and your simplicity into affectation; and whatever may be Edward's own opinion, it must be extremely mortifying to him to be compelled to vindicate you from such imputations. Come, dry your tears, my child, I know you will not be happy again till you have made ample reparation for your fault; but remember, that however a man may admire the strength of character and high-mindedness which enable a woman thus promptly to confess her errors, it may be questioned whether his admiration can counterbalance his displeasure at the inconsistent weakness which permits the frequent repetition of those errors. One who knew human nature far better than you ever can, Rosalie, has called the affection of woman 'a lovely and a fearful thing.' Its loveliness many can appreciate, its fearfulness few can imagine, unless," added she, while a shade of melancholy crossed her usually placid brow, "unless experience has been their teacher."

"Dear aunt, how should you know so much about love?" said Rosalie, smiling playfully through her tears. "I should really think you had experienced some of its effects yourself, if I did not know so much about your cruelty to all your ancient admirers."

"Examine your own heart, Rosalie, and tell me whether you believe it possible for a woman to pass a long life in society without learning something more of love than mere imagination can teach," replied her aunt. After a pause she resumed, "you have frequently flattered me for my skill in story-telling, and my 'reminiscences' have often been summoned to amuse you; but there is one tale which you have never yet heard, perhaps it may beguile you of some sad thoughts to listen to

A SPINSTER'S TALE OF LOVE.

"Your father and myself were very young when we had the misfortune to lose our parents. Happily for him, his guardian was one of those rare beings who could love his neighbour as himself, and the orphan was watched over with the same solicitude, and guarded from the world's contaminating touch with the same vigilance that his own children awakened. I was less fortunate. The lady who had been selected to superintend my education, was one of the most extraordinary characters that ever existed. Possessing intellect of more than masculine vigour, together with more than feminine delicacy, combining the clearest powers of reasoning with all that nice tact and discernment which even the intolerant spirit of man has allowed to be peculiarly a woman's faculty, she was yet a victim to the most violent passions that ever swayed a human heart. She, whose powerful and persuasive eloquence, whether uttered in the midst of society, or sent forth from the recesses of the closet, held the most unbounded sway over the minds of all, had yet no power over herself. Alternately given up to the deepest melancholy, or yielding to the wildest excitement, every thing that was romantic, or that deviated in the slightest degree from the dull routine of common life, had for her a peculiar charm; and though her manners were generally a model of elegance and refinement, she was continually offending against that most unsparring of all enemies—etiquette. Her history, too, was as singular as her character; but at present it is enough to know that from the greatest opulence she had been reduced to extreme poverty, and it was only by the incessant labours of her pen that she now procured her subsistence. Her well-known talents caused her to be selected by my few friends as a proper governess for me; and though she at first dreaded the interruption which such a change must be to her ordinary pursuits, yet the large remuneration which was offered, was to one in her circumstances an unanswerable argument. However, her better feelings were soon awakened, and before I had been with her many weeks she had learned to love the little orphan with the ardour of which her nature was capable.

"The system of education pursued by such an instructor may easily be conceived. Naturally sensitive and affectionate, she could scarcely have found a child so well adapted to her tutelage as I was, and she delighted to cherish those ardent feelings and foster those acute sensibilities, which, even at that early age, too strongly characterized me. No one could be better fitted to form the mind of a young person than was my governess, but certainly no one could be less qualified to direct the heart, and the effects of her novel mode of instruction were soon very apparent in her pupil. At the age of seventeen I possessed a figure somewhat attractive, a mind deeply imbued with the love of ancient and modern days, and a heart filled with unappropriated affections and morbid sensibility. When I tell you that I was likewise the heiress of a large fortune, you will think that I entered society under the most flattering auspices; but experience has fatally convinced me that had I been allowed to tread the humble path of mediocrity, I should have reached a happier goal. Though I was soon surrounded by admirers, only one among the number could compare with the beau idéal which I had so long worshipped in secret. Charles Clairville had just then returned from a residence of some years in France; and from the first time that I looked upon his noble face, and listened to his winning words, my destiny was sealed. He possessed intellect of the very highest order; his mind had received every variety of cultivation. Travel had rendered him familiar with all the wonders of nature and art, and to these advantages he united the rare and dangerous gift of matchless beauty. You will smile, perhaps, and deem my description coloured by the pencil of fancy, but I am too old now to paint with other taints than such as reality affords. You may form some idea of his personal attractions when I tell you that the bust of Antinous, in my dressing-room, which you have so often admired, has always been peculiarly valuable to me on account of the striking resemblance it bears to the object of my first, my only love. His manners, too, were peculiarly fascinating. Always mild and gentle in his deportment, there was a degree of softness in his gaze, and a deepened tenderness in the thrilling tones of his voice when addressing women, to which even the coldest of my sex were not insensible, and it is not strange that to such a dreamer as myself he must have been irresistible. I loved him as only such an ill-governed heart as mine could love; with a depth and fervour of which I almost shudder to think; for well do I know that the blessing of heaven never has, and never can visit such wild and impious adoration. I was a lone and friendless creature; my brother I had scarcely seen since infancy; and that inexhaustible fount of affection which is usually diffused through the various channels of domestic life, was, in my case, poured forth in all its freshness and fullness upon him.

"Time has shown 'the blossoms of the grave' upon my temples, and his cold touch has withered the passion-flowers which grew too luxuriantly in my heart's uncultured soil; but even now, though my cheek has ceased to glow, and my eye to kindle at the name of Clairville, yet never can I pronounce it without feeling, as it were, a pulse in my very soul. He became my constant companion; the sharer of my studies, my pleasures, and my petty griefs, while my contempt for the frivolous gaiety of society increased in proportion to my affection. My governess, with whom I still continued to reside, soon perceived my attachment, and did not hesitate to encourage it. Any thing like romance was so congenial to her taste, that I believe she would have done the same had there been insurmountable obstacles to overcome; but there were, apparently, none. With respect to rank and fortune we were equal, and a union between us was desired by the friends of both. Yet there was a mystery about Clairville which even the keen eye of affection could not penetrate. He sought my society, he devoted his whole attention to me in the most open and unrestrained manner; he seemed miserable if I bestowed the slightest regard upon others, and yet when questioned by his friends, his invariable answer was, 'that he never intended to marry;' and once, when closely interrogated by a mutual friend, he said, 'Ask me no more—I cannot live without the society of Mary Linton; she is the only source of happiness which remains for me, but I can never make her my wife.' This answer was repeated to me, and I was earnestly advised to withdraw myself from his attentions, but that which should have been a warning for me only served to awaken the romantic enthusiasm of my nature, and I felt that I could glory in cherishing a love which sought no reward, vainly believing that love would be 'sufficient in itself, its own reward.' I looked upon the talents which I had so highly cultivated, the affections which I had so carefully cherished, but as so many grains of incense to be offered upon the shrine of the god of my idolatry. What mattered it that the idol smiled not upon his humble votary, when the privilege of kneeling before him was joy greater than all else on earth could bestow? Alas! I was fatally deceiving myself.

"Months passed away, and still our intimacy continued; but let me absolve Clairville from any dishonourable intention in thus winning affections which he could never return. That he loved me most fondly, I am well convinced; and often did he hint to me of some secret tie which alone prevented him from pouring forth the fulness of that affection, but at the same time he solemnly assured me that the obstacle was an insurmountable one. He never referred to the subject without emotion, amounting almost to agony; and though it was a source of anxiety and melancholy to me, yet a doubt of the purity of his feelings never occurred to me. We were both wrong. He ought to have avoided my society as soon as he found it had become almost essential to his happiness, and I ought to have avoided his attentions as soon as I learned that fate had placed an inseparable barrier between us. But 'who, alas! can love and yet be wise?'

"Our intimacy continued for many months, during which time I rejected several splendid offers of marriage; for it was my fixed determination to devote myself to him, and never to marry unless this mysterious obstacle could be removed. One evening, as we were returning from a walk, we observed a man closely muffled in a cloak, just leaving the door. On entering the house a letter was put into my hands, containing these words: 'Is it quite consistent with Miss Linton's ideas of virtue and delicacy to be receiving the addresses of a married man? A man whose wife is at this moment dragging out a miserable existence in a convent in France, the victim of his ingratitude and perfidy?' I had so often heard ill-natured insinuations respecting the mystery which characterized Clairville's conduct, that this new effort of malice only made me smile. As I retired to throw aside my walking-dress, I handed the note to Charles, saying, 'You see how much good nature prevails in this world.' On my return to the parlour I found him seated on the sofa, with his face buried in his hands, and the expression of his countenance, as he turned towards me was absolutely terrific. In a hurried and broken voice he thus addressed me:

"'Mary, your generous confidence has overcome me. I will no longer disguise from you the truth, though you should spurn me for ever from your thoughts. Before you again lay your head upon the pillow which I have strewn with thorns, you shall know my story. Heaven bless you, my only loved one,' added he, pressing me to his bosom, (it was our first but not our last embrace,) and the next moment I found myself alone.

"About two hours afterwards a letter was brought me, written evidently by an unnerved and trembling hand. That letter is still in my possession; but to no other eye will I expose the anguish and remorse of him who now slumbers in the grave. His story was but short. Finding himself master of a plentiful fortune, (at the early age of twenty,) he had been induced by the advantages which it offered to the student, as well as by the allurements which it held out to the man of pleasure, to take up his residence in Paris. The house in which he lodged was tenanted by a widow lady and her daughter. The extreme beauty of the latter soon attracted the notice of the inexperienced Clairville, and in the first ardour of his feelings he offered her his hand. He was of course immediately accepted, and in the simple and artless Emilie de Varre he fancied he had obtained that best of all blessings, a fondly attached wife. She had always lived in extreme retirement; but anxious to display her matchless beauty to his friends, he hired a splendid hotel, furnished it in the most luxurious manner, and commenced the style of living suited to such an establishment. Emilie was extremely ignorant of the world; in truth she was as weak-minded and unintellectual as she was beautiful and artless. Costly dress, fine equipages, brilliant parties alone occupied her thoughts, and her husband was treated rather as a necessary appendage to her splendour, than as the source from whom all this was derived. Charles had been accustomed to the society of highly-gifted and cultivated women; he had been flattered by the attentions which such women had been wont to pay him, and to be treated with mere complacency by one so destitute of all mental grace as Emilie, was more than either his pride or his affection could brook. Had she possessed the smallest proportion of mind, or had she been blessed with as much heart as usually falls to the lot of our sex, she would have known how to deepen the impression which her beauty had made; but unfortunately both these requisites had been denied her, and the result of such an ill-assorted union may soon be conjectured. Clairville sought companions every where except at home, and soon became deeply immersed in the follies and vices of Paris. His wife, wounded by his neglect, and exposed to the artful insinuations of a nobleman of rank, sacrificed to passion the little she possessed of principle, and Charles was suddenly aroused to a sense of his degradation by the shock of her elopement. His feelings at that time baffled description. Remorse haunted him like a demon; he considered himself as the original cause of her guilt, for he was conscious that he had exposed her to temptations of which she was wholly ignorant, and had withdrawn his guardian care at the very time it was most required. He followed and rescued her from the fate which she had chosen, but the feelings with which he looked upon her, convinced him that he had never really loved her. By the most earnest and patient endeavours he brought her to a sense of her guilt, and at her own desire placed her in a convent. But the kindness of his nature forbade him to institute a legal process for divorce, and he therefore still remained the husband of a degraded and guilty woman.

"What my feelings were upon learning these particulars, I leave you to imagine. His conduct towards me will seem to admit of no excuse; but you must remember that his love for me was so unlike his former attachment, that it had gained the mastery over him before he was aware of its existence. While I believed that there might be suffering but not sin in my hopeless love, I proudly cherished it; but when I learned that I had been pouring out my tenderness upon one who was bound by other ties, when I was compelled to feel that my affection was guilt, I sunk under the pressure of such accumulated misery, and weeks passed away before I was again conscious of my being. When I recovered, I was told that Clairville had left the country for ever; but one evening, as I was sitting alone in the little parlour where we had spent so many hours of happiness together, the door opened, and Clairville appeared before me. 'Think you,' said he, in answer to my agitated inquiries, 'think you that I could leave the country while your fate was yet doubtful? Mary, I never would have survived you; now I will go, I have once more looked upon your face. It is pale, my Mary,' added he, laying his hand upon my brow, 'I—I have done this—you may forgive me, but never, never shall I forgive myself; and before I could reply he had disappeared. The next day I learned that he had sailed that morning for the East Indies.

"My health long continued delicate, and after travelling for nearly two years in my native country, it was finally determined that I should try the genial airs of Italy. We remained in Italy about a year, during which time we visited every part of that beautiful and consecrated land. On our return we stopped at a small inn, to refresh our horses; and while waiting for our simple meal, the hostess entered, and asked if we were English. Upon our answering in the affirmative, she begged us to visit a sick English gentleman, who was lying in a neighbouring cottage, raving in the delirium of fever. We immediately accompanied her to the cottage, and what were my feelings when in the pale and emaciated countenance of the sick gentleman, I beheld the wreck of that noble beauty which distinguished Clairville! Need I add that I became his constant and unwearied nurse through a tedious and painful illness?

"For weeks he lay unconscious of every thing, at length one evening as I sat beside him, he raised himself on his pillow, and looking earnestly in my face, said, 'Surely this is no dream. I have seen that face for many days in my dreams, but now;' he put his hand to his brow, as if to recall his wandering thoughts, and with a heart thrilling with joy I bent over him, and whispered all that woman's affection at such a moment could suggest. To describe the feelings of both of us at such a time, would be impossible. In vain I endeavoured to restrain his impatience to narrate to me all that had occurred since we parted; and when I listened to his tale, when I found that he had been to pay the last duties to his unhappy wife, my emotions entirely overpowered me, and I sank, half frantic, on a chair beside him. 'Yes, my Mary,' said he, as he laid his pale cheek on mine, 'I was on my way to seek you when this fatal fever seized me. If a life of unbounded affection can repay your past sufferings, you shall yet be happy—do not weep, smile as you were wont to do in the days of our early love.' He drew me gently towards him as he spoke, and leaned his head upon my bosom. Alarmed at his continued long silence, I bent over and observed his countenance distorted with the convulsive expression of pain. I called loudly for assistance. My cry was answered by he smiled faintly. 'We will yet be happy, love,' murmured he, and fell back upon his pillow, with his arm still encircling my neck. Half frantic with apprehension, I pressed my lips to his—it was our last embrace—he was dead!

"Of what afterwards occurred I know nothing. It was long, very long, before I recovered the use of those faculties which sorrow had paralyzed, and I then found myself in this spot, which has since been my constant residence. Seated in this very balcony, many an hour have I spent in deciphering my heart and schooling my will into subjection to the inscrutable decrees of heaven. Had I lost Clairville under different circumstances, I could have borne it better; but thus to behold him snatched from me at the very moment when it was no longer a crime to love him, at the moment when I might be allowed to acknowledge in the face of the world the fervour of my attachment, was more than my strength could endure. It was only by abstracting my thoughts entirely from myself, and devoting all my time to the comfort of my brother and his sweet wife, (your mother, Rosalie,) whose delicate health required constant attention, that I was enabled to perform the task of submission. When I lost those dear friends, you became the sole object of my care, and many a weary hour has been beguiled by your cheerful prattle. Oh! let me not see my only source of comfort destroyed. Let me not behold the child of my afflictions throw away her fairest chance of happiness, by trifling with that most fearful of all passions—love."

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTERS FROM LONDON,

To the Editor of the New-York Mirror.

NUMBER TEN.

London, November 26.

In my last I made a few remarks upon the present state of the stage, its deficiencies, &c.; I will now add a few more concerning the audience. The two extremes of a London audience is generally composed of those who may be reckoned among the best and worst judges of acting to be found within the walls of a theatre. Among the best, because, independent of being men of talent and education—advantages confined to no particular place—they have been peculiarly favoured with opportunities of correcting their judgments by a study of the finest models, and possess that quick and unerring perception of faults and beauties which is so seldom to be found, except in those whose tastes have been mellowed and refined by a long familiarity with good acting. Among the worst, because, more profoundly ignorant people are in the habit of visiting theatres in London than is generally the case elsewhere. In smaller and less important cities the very lowest and worst educated classes of the community do not attend the theatre, for a man requires to be somewhat humanized to enjoy what is there presented to his view, they therefore do not go—they do not know anything about plays or players, and do not profess to know anything. But this would not do for a cockney, who, indeed, professes to be acquainted with all things, great and small; and who, upon the strength of being able to talk flash, settles it in his own mind that he is the most knowing person in the universe. With all his ignorance and coarseness, he always looks upon himself as "a bit of a gemman," and thinks it incumbent upon him to devote a tithe of his time to the fine arts. He considers that the mere fact of his having been born in London, of itself constitutes him a judge of whatever can, by any possibility, be submitted to his notice. Oh, the immensity of his contempt for the opinion of any one born out of it concerning any thing in it! In fact, he thinks no small portion of the greatness and wisdom of London is centered in his person; and thus hundreds of people, who never did or never will speak the English language, and who know as much of Shakspeare as the ladies and gentlemen in "High Life below Stairs," will, without the slightest misgivings on the score of incapacity, gravely go to pass their opinion on a man of genius enacting Hamlet or Othello! These are the personages who for the most part fill the upper galleries, and who, from their lofty station and nectar-quaffing propensities, have acquired the title of "the gods." During the overture, and at every interval of the performance, large flagons of beer and bottles of gin are to be seen passing to and fro amid the heavenly conclave, and various unique toasts and sentiments are given. Going likewise upon the principle that "an honest man has nothing to conceal," very audible inquiries are made from one remote quarter of the gallery to the other, touching each other's health, circumstances, and family affairs. They, moreover, particularly in the minor theatres, take the orchestra under their special protection, favouring the musicians from time to time with their advice, and indulging in much verbal criticism upon their different performances—also claiming for themselves great latitude of observation and freedom of remark concerning the personal appearance of the several members thereof. At the same time it must be allowed that many of the inhabitants of those distant regions have no inconsiderable portion of shrewdness and coarse humour about them, and from having seen a great deal of good acting, have vague ideas when a thing is well done without knowing why it is well done.

The pit, in the large theatres, is, with the exception of the private boxes and the dress-circle, the most respectable part of the house, and contains a large share of the literary talent of London, opulent tradesmen, and a host of clever young students in law and medicine. It is gratifying to observe the attention and decorum which pervade the pit during the first night of a new piece, or the debut of a strange performer. They feel that a sort of responsibility attaches to them; knowing, as they do, that on their verdict materially depends the fate of either; and I have been twice or thrice startled at the very decided, angry, and authoritative cry of "silence" from the pit, on the least disposition towards chattering being manifested by any one in the boxes. The dress-circle is for such ladies and gentlemen as choose to go in full-dress—the first circle for those who do not.

The pit rules the house, and the first decided "hiss" almost invariably proceeds from thence. The galleries certainly look to it with a kind of rude respect; and, on important occasions, seldom venture upon any expression of disapprobation until they have received their cue from below. After they once begin, however, any after attempt to rein them in again would be fruitless. The pit sit there for justice, but here mercy seldom finds a place; and if an author or actor really deserves condemnation, there is very little fear of any pitying scruples standing in the way of his receiving it. I was present not long ago at the first representation of a new tragedy, entitled "The Jew of Arragon," of which report had spoken highly. The expense with which it was got up must have been very great, the scenery being entirely new and uncommonly beautiful, and Charles Kemble and his daughter, both great favourites, sustained the principal parts. The first three acts were listened to with patience, but before the fourth its fate was sealed. Not even Fanny Kemble was allowed to be heard, and it was withdrawn. Another evening a Mr. Abbot, who has been long on the London boards, and is rather a favourite in second and third-rate characters, attempted to play Romeo to Miss Kemble's Juliet, on the strength, I suppose, of having performed it with much eclat in Paris. The consequence was, that he was hissed and laughed at, and another Romeo was obliged to be provided against the ensuing evening. Mr. Abbot returned to his old level, and is as much a favourite again, in a small way, as ever. I mention these things for a couple of reasons—first, to show the harshness of the London audience towards all of whom they disapprove, and to endeavour to put to rights the case of Mr. Cooper, which has been much misrepresented in America, and which may be the means of preventing actors of merit crossing the Atlantic, dreading, as they might do, a prejudiced reception here; and secondly, because I have heard it repeatedly asserted that Mr. Forrest is coming over. I dined a short time since with the worthy ex-manager of Drury-lane, and amongst other theatrical chit-chat, asked whether Mr. Cooper was fairly treated or not on the first night of his appearance at his theatre? He replied, that Mr. Cooper met with such an uncommonly flattering reception on his entrance, as quite astonished both him (Mr. Price) and the tragedian; and that for the first three acts an unusual disposition to applaud every little favourable point was manifested. When, however, it began to be glaringly apparent that he was unable to do justice to the part he had undertaken, the disturbance commenced. "The London audience," said Mr. Price, "will give any one fair-play, but," added he, "when they once begin they are merciless dogs." I always maintained that Mr. Cooper's failure was easily to be accounted for on very simple grounds, and that it was attaching rather an undue importance to him, to suppose that the British public entered into a conspiracy to drive him from the stage. It was rather ridiculous to make an actor's being hissed in Macbeth, a thing which is so very common here, a national affair between England and America. If Mr. Forrest comes, he will, of course, not be regarded with those sentiments of partiality which is quite natural and proper the people of the United States should feel towards their first native tragedian; but I am equally well convinced that he will not have any hostile or unworthy feelings to contend with, further than what may be engendered by the professional jealousy of the most jealous of all professions. Indeed, the current of popular opinion would be for two or three reasons rather in his favour than otherwise. In the first place, the middling classes have a friendly feeling towards America, very vague and indefinite it is true, for they know little about it, but still favourable as far as it goes; secondly—all the radical and many of the whig papers, if they were biassed at all, would be in favour of Mr. Forrest on account of his being an American, (and these are the leading theatrical papers) and thirdly, a portion of the press is hostile to Macready, and would regard with peculiar complacency any one who appeared in the parts he is in the habit of playing. I have dwelt the more on this subject because I know, should Mr. Forrest intend playing in London, it will be one peculiarly interesting to his numerous admirers in the United States.

THE DRAMA.

THE OPERA OF CINDERELLA.

THIS opera will be produced on Monday next, and the Park theatre closed for a night rehearsal on Saturday evening. Immense labour and expense have been incurred in its production. The music, according to our poor judgment, supported as it is by the opinion of the London Harmonicon, (the best critical journal in Europe) is exquisite, and has this advantage, it is absolutely the essence of four of Rossini's operas. "Le Cenerentola," "Armida," "Maometto Secondo," and "Guillaume Tell." The plot and dialogue are said to be pleasant, and the strictest care has been taken by Mr. Rophino Lacy, to whom the credit of its adaptation belongs, to preserve the exact sentiment of each selected morceau. If we expect our worthy manager to maintain a musical establishment, such as that to be found at the Park, and which gives New-York an important superiority in that respect over all other cities in the Union, we must afford him the support which his strenuous exertions so decidedly merit, and which good taste dictates, otherwise we may anticipate that our theatre will fall to the insignificance and poverty of materiel, so justly complained of in the similar institutions of Philadelphia and Boston. Our musical stars will return one by one to Europe, and we shall only have the credit of having enriched such prodigies as Mr. Sloman, of treble-encore notoriety, whose admirable songs require at least the aid of a couple of blind fiddlers, or a bagpipe. In short, the opposition which existed between the Park and Bowery, during Mr. Gilfert's life-time, has engendered so gross an appetite for monsters and novelty, that we run a great risk of losing our character for good taste in administering to its cravings, and, as part of the press, we plead guilty in some measure to negligence in not having more frequently raised our voice in order to check the growing evil. A fair opportunity occurs at the present moment of calling public attention to the representation of a splendid musical work of first-rate importance. If it be really meritorious, surely good sense should lead our amateurs to support it, for it is only by the general cultivation of a taste for music that we can expect ever to arrive at the possession of a fine operatic corps. It is in vain to hope that without travelling through the elementary walks of the science we can jump straight from Betsey Baker and Major Longbow to a well-sustained and adequately paid company of Italians. M.

GREEN-ROOM CHIT-CHAT.

One of the best and most severe of the dramatic critics in this country, is the writer in the Philadelphia Daily Chronicle, who signs himself "Colly Cibber." In speaking of Mr. Charles Kean's performances in that city, he closes with the following remark. "Notwithstanding there was a little too much of exuberance in some parts of his acting, particularly in the last scene, yet I have no hesitation in saying that Mr. Kean's Sir Giles Overreach was worth all the Sir Giles's that have appeared on our boards since the days of his great predecessor Cooke, whom to equal in that inimitable character is hopeless."

The new tragedies, Tancred and Caius Marius, the one by Mr. Stone, the other by R. P. Smith, have been successfully represented; Tancred at Boston, Caius Marius at Philadelphia.

The Parisians are amusing themselves with a new play, entitled Napoleon in Paradise.

An Italian opera-house has been erected at Algiers, under the direction of General Clausel.

Since his arrival in this country young Kean has remitted his mother eight hundred pounds sterling.

Madame Feron is singing at Boston.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

WANT OF EXCITEMENT, OR A TRIP TO LONDON.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "A TRIP TO PARIS."

TRAVELLING is certainly the most pleasant and profitable way of spending our time in the world. It makes folks so wise, and enables them to tell so many good stories. People that have nothing to do at home, and most especially young ladies who have been five or six seasons weather-beating at parties, and whose faces are becoming rather too familiar by constant use, cannot do better than regenerate themselves by a trip to London or Paris, where they will acquire a new gloss, and if they bring home nothing else, import the very newest fashions. If they are very rich, who knows whether they may not marry the second or third cousin of a lord?

Julia Earle was the only daughter of a rich broker—we beg pardon—banker, in a certain great city, in which Æsop would not have required a lantern to enable him to find at least two honest men. Bankers rule the world, at least the most enlightened, wise, and virtuous portion of it, called christendom. There is not a king, by divine right, in all Europe that can make war, give a great feast, or portion off a younger branch of the family without the aid of a banker. Nay, bankers are actually becoming statesmen, which certainly is a vast improvement of the age, since, by being in all the secrets of government, they can speculate to great advantage in the stocks. No wonder, therefore, that Mr. Earle held his head high, and his pretty daughter still higher. There was nobody, that is, none of the cits of the honest city in which they resided, worthy of their attention, except merely so far as to be invited sometimes to parties, to admire the magnificence of Mr. Earle. By the time she was grown up to be a woman, Julia had become tired of all the city beaux, because they ~~had~~ not the air noble; and of all the pleasures of the city, because—because she had tasted too much of them—and every body knows, that too much of a good thing is good for nothing.

"Pa," said she one morning, after being at a party till three o'clock, and eating pickled oysters, "pa, I don't feel well."

The old gentleman was alarmed—it was his only daughter.

"What is the matter, my dear?"

"I don't know—I believe I want excitement."

"Then go and buy a new bonnet."

"A new bonnet! lord pa, I'm tired of new bonnets."

"Well, then, go and buy a new cloak."

"I'm tired of new cloaks."

"Then order the barouche, and take a ride."

"I'm tired of barouches—they're so common—every body has got barouches. I am told the milk-men and baker-boys mean to change their carts into barouches."

"Then take a walk in Broadway—'tis a delightful morning."

"I hate walking in Broadway, it's so vulgar—every body walks there now."

"Take an amusing book, then, and while away the time."

"I'm tired of amusing books—but—but I'll try—"and she took up the first volume of the Water Witch; but, alas! she fell asleep ere she got through the address of Alderman Van Beverout to his man Euclid, and dreamed she was going to London.

She was awakened by a servant announcing the Honourable Captain Chiffington, who always carried a monkey with a gold chain under his arm, given him by the duchess of Devonshire. He was just from London, and talked so much of lords, ladies, and all that sort of thing, that Julia was miserable to be among such a beautiful, polished, enlightened people, all of whom had the air noble to a certainty.

When the old gentleman came home from heaping up pennies, and slaving all the morning in the service of the divinity he adored, Julia was more languid than ever. She thought of Chiffington and his monkey, of lords and ladies of the air noble, of Almack's and the court. No wonder she was almost broken-hearted!

"Are you worse, my dear?" said Mr. Earle.

"I believe I am, pa."

"Shall I send for Doctor Fizzleleg?"

"Oh no, pa, he'll only give me a dose of calomel. You know he prescribes that for every thing. The other day I was telling him of having lost my purse, and he ordered a dose of calomel for its recovery."

"My dear," said Mr. Earle, with an awful depression of voice, "my dear, don't you know Doctor Fizzleleg is a fellow of the royal society?"

"Well, pa, if he is, I suppose the royal society must be a set of very dull fellows."

"Hem!" quoth Mr. Earle. "But, my dear, I really wish you would take something."

"I should like to take something, pa," said the young lady significantly.

"What is it, my dear?"

"A trip to London, pa."

"A trip to purgatory"—quoth Mr. Earle; "what would you do in London?"

"O, I should be so well and so happy! I'm sure I should."

"Have you not every thing you want, my dear?"

"Y—e—s, pa—but then I want excitement. I'm so triste, so ennui, so—I don't know what—that I can't keep myself awake in the day-time."

"That is because you are up at parties almost all night, my dear; but I wish you would try and be happy. I'm sure you've every thing to make you so. Try, my dear; now do try."

"I can't, pa; indeed I can't—nothing excites me now."

"Suppose you go and buy a new real Cashmere shawl, my dear?"

The idea roused the young lady, and she acceded to the proposal with delightful facility. The old gentleman gave her a thousand dollars, and away she went as merry as a cricket.

The excitement of the Cashmere shawl lasted a whole fortnight; by that time every body had seen and admired, and heard how much it cost, and there was end of the excitement. Captain Chiffington and his monkey called too, and talked more eloquently than ever of the air noble, the air distingue, the duchess of Devonshire, Lord Wellington, and the lord knows who. The next morning Julia was triste, ennued, downright sick, and Doctor Fizzleleg was called in. The old gentleman was at his banking-house, turning a penny as usual. The doctor advised a dose of calomel.

"Pshaw, doctor," replied Julia; "if you want me to get well, prescribe me a dose of London."

"That's a medicine I never heard of before," quoth the doctor.

"It may be so, doctor; but it is a sovereign remedy, for all that."

The doctor was no fool, though he was a fellow of the royal society and prescribed calomel for the recovery of lost purses. He immediately recommended a voyage for the young lady's disorder.

Mr. Earle was alarmed at the imminent danger indicated by the necessity of a sea-voyage.

"Is she in a decline?" asked he with tears in his eyes.

"Not exactly," said the doctor, "she's only—hem—hem—she's a little predisposed—inclined that way—she wants change of air."

"The air noble," thought the young lady.

"Well, if I must I must," quoth Mr. Earle, when the doctor was gone away. "It will be very inconvenient for me to go; it will be thousands out of my pocket, and derange my business sadly."

"Well, pa, if it's so very inconvenient, you know the Dobbies are going to London, and they will take me under their wing."

"Hem—I don't like Mrs. Dobb's wing, and choose to have you under my own. But what shall I do in London? Perhaps I may make a profitable speculation," and he rubbed his hands in the anticipation.

"Yes, and then you know, pa, you know you've been so civil to all the distinguished Englishmen that have visited the city. You know you gave six dinners to the marquis of T., a party to Lady A., a public breakfast to Lord B., and General C. staid with us in the country a whole month, you know, pa; oh! we shall be quite at home, and receive such attentions! I shouldn't be surprised if we were to go to Almack's, and be presented at court!"

The good gentleman felt himself gradually melting at this description of the paradise that awaited them abroad. He made his preparations with infinite alacrity, and the very next packet saw them on their voyage to London.

"The voyage will be of service to you," said Doctor Fizzleleg.

"I'm sure it will," said Julia, who got sea-sick before they were outside the Hook, and could eat nothing but gingerbread during the whole voyage. But the old gentleman was just as bad, and that was some consolation.

"I wish I was home again," said Mr. Earle.

"I wish I was dead," sighed Julia.

"I wish I was in purgatory," said a young man from the western country, who had never seen salt-water before, except in a brine spring.

They got to London at last, after a voyage of eight weeks, which seemed like eight years. Had it not been for the anticipation of the air noble, the air distingue, of lords and ladies, Almack's, and the court, Julia would have died on the voyage, and been eaten by the fishes.

On landing at the London docks, there was a great struggle for their baggage, such as happened at the siege of Troy for the body of Patroclus. It ended in a battle, and the conqueror carried off the spoil. The Thames ran blood, but was not so much frightened as the little Scamander, being used to such matters. Mr. Earle, being a prompt man, drove straight to his banker, to present his bills of exchange, and take his advice as to disposing of himself and his daughter. The banker had been in the United States, and drank a pretty considerable quantity of Mr. Earle's Bingham and Marston.

"I dare say he will invite us to stay with him," said Julia.

"No doubt of it," quoth Mr. Earle.

The banker received them with great attention, talked to them half an hour at least at the door of the carriage, advised Mr. Earle to take lodgings as far off as possible, as the neighbourhood was not healthy, and regretted his inability to return his kindnesses in America, on account of his carpets not being down, and his house in confusion.

"I should be delighted to see you when the bustle is over; but the fact is, Mrs. or rather Lady Barington, for we have been honoured of late by his most gracious majesty, is going to take a trip to Paris this summer. Ah—hem—ha—how long do you expect to honour us with your company—hem—in London?"

"About two months, I believe," said Mr. Earle, "we shall then commence a little tour into the country."

"Then I regret to say we shan't be able to see you at our house. Good-by, my dear friend—any services in my power—a—a—good-by, my dear friend. Shut the door, coachman."

"Civil!" cried Julia, putting up her pretty lip.

"A specimen of the hospitality of old England," responded Mr. Earle, shrugging his shoulders. They drove to the hotel, where Sir Somebody Barington recommended them to go, and were accommodated with magnificent lodgings, at a most magnificent price. The waiter seeing the direction of Edward, Earle of —, reported a nobleman, and they were accommodated accordingly. Nothing could equal the civility, or rather servility of the landlord, the waiters, the chambermaids, and the courtly devoirs of the gentleman denominated "boots," among the initiated in travelling. Being a nobleman, every thing was charged accordingly. Mr. Earle felt a severe twinge in the vicinity of his pocket, but he was determined to do the thing genteelly.

Here they had every accommodation, not to say luxury, they could desire.

"I declare, pa," said Julia, "I feel almost as comfortable as at home!"

But the dullest of all dull cities for people without friends or employment, is London. Mr. Earle and Julia, after gazing out at the window, seeing the transit of rags and beggary on one hand, and princely splendour on the other, and listening to a noise of carriages, sufficient to confound the universe, began to feel all the desolation of strangers at an inn.

"I'm so tired!" said Julia.

"I wish I had something to do?" said her father. He rang for the waiter. "Is there any thing to be seen this morning, any public exhibition fit for ladies?"

"O yes, sir, plenty; there's five men to beanged, hand a boxing-match for a thousand guineas aside, a few miles hout hof town."

"Hum—not exactly the sort of amusement for ladies," said Mr. Earle.

"Not amusement for ladies, sir! the first ladies hin the city went to see Mr. Fauntleroy hin jail, and hat the drop; hand the duchess hof * won a undred guineas on Crib hin his last fight with Molyneux." So saying he departed, grumbling to himself, "Sich nobility! hi dare say they hare Hiriish!"

After a day of most desparate ennui, they went to the theatre. It was during the famous war of O. P. and N. P. and John Bull was in all his glory. Such hissing and howling and catcalling and catterwauling was never before heard in such an enlightened city as London. The actors were pelted off the stage, and Julia was almost frightened out of her wits.

"What in the name of common sense and common decency is all this about?" asked Mr. Earle of a person in the box.

"About sixpence," replied the gentleman.

"Are you for O. P. or N. P.?" demanded a fellow who came in with a bludgeon, of Mr. Earle.

"Say O. P. of you are a dead man," whispered the gentleman, and Mr. Earle answered accordingly, whereupon the O. P. man flourished his cudgel, and went away crying "O. P. for ever!"

"Let us go home, for heaven's sake," said Julia to her father.

"Won't you stay and see the sport?" said the gentleman.

"Sport," answered Mr. Earle, "do you call breaking heads sport?"

"The finest in the world for John Bull," said the other.

Such a scene of yelling, and scuffling, and hissing, and swearing now commenced, that Mr. Earle hurried his daughter away as fast as possible. When they were safe in the carriage, Julia exclaimed,

"Well, I declare I never saw any thing half so vulgar and brutal in America as a London audience at the theatre royal."

The next morning, as Julia was sitting at the window, killing time, she saw a superb barouche and four, with a gentleman, almost covered with gold lace, sitting in it, and a wessel-faced, hump-backed, servant out of livery driving.

"Ah!" exclaimed she, unconsciously aloud, "what a superb equipage!"

"'Tis Lord Dowdle's," said the waiter, just coming in.

"O, I was sure it must belong to a nobleman. He has the air noble!"

"He is reckoned the greatest whip in town."

"The greatest what?"

"The greatest four-in-hand man, your ladyship. He always drives himself, and makes his coachman take his place in the barouche."

"Impossible! a nobleman with a hump on his back!"

"It is true, I assure your ladyship. The man sitting in the barouche is my own brother."

Julia began to lose her faith in the air noble, and a little more experience destroyed it entirely. She afterwards saw a great many lords and ladies, that could not be distinguished from ordinary people by their air or manner.

"I declare," thought she, "there is hardly any difference between the well-bred people at home and the well-bred people here. Who would have thought it?"

But she found a vast difference between the common people of one country and those of the other. In America they were almost all in the enjoyment of the rational comforts of life; in London they were hungry and discontented, and consequently profligate. In America they could almost all read and write; in London the largest portion could neither do one nor the other. In America the familiarity of the common people was the mere consciousness of equal rights and independence; in London it was rudeness and stupidity.

"Well, I declare," said Julia one day to her father—"I declare, papa, I don't think the people of England are half as civilized as our countrymen."

"Nor I," answered Mr. Earle. "Has any one called to see you to day?"

"No," answered the young lady, sighing.

"I wonder what has become of the marquis of T. and Lady A., and Lord B., and General C., and the rest of them that used to dine with us so often at home?" said Mr. Earle.

"I dare say they don't know we are in town," replied Julia—"and yet it's very odd if they don't. Every body knew when we were in town, at home."

The next day, or, at any rate, very shortly after this conversation, as the old gentleman and his daughter were walking in Regent-street, they saw the marquis of T. approaching arm-in-arm with two gentlemen.

"I declare, pa," cried Julia, delighted, "here comes the marquis! now we shall have some one to escort us every where. You know how attentive he was to me."

But all at once the marquis seemed to recollect something he had forgot. He stopped suddenly, turned round on his heel, and bolted round a corner with a precipitation that betokened some very pressing business.

"What a pity," said Julia. "I dare say he has left his pocket-handkerchief at home."

"You are mistaken, my dear," said Mr. Earle; "it is only another specimen of the hospitality of old England."

This was destined to be an eventful morning. Scarcely had the marquis disappeared, when my Lady A. came driving along in an open landau. Mr. Earle bowed low, and Julia still lower. Her ladyship took out her quizzing glass, levelled it full at them, and passed on with a contemptuous toss of her head.

"Another specimen of old English hospitality!" cried Mr. Earle.

"I declare, yonder comes General C. who spent a month with us at Elmwood. I'm sure he will be delighted to see us."

At that moment General C. seemed as if he had just discovered he was marching up to a loaded cannon. He looked every way but towards Julia, and at length, in imitation of my lord marquis, made a most masterly retreat round a corner, and disappeared. General C. was famous for retrograde movements, but he never made one equal to this.

"Poor gentleman!" exclaimed Julia, "he has left his pocket-handkerchief home too—or else perhaps his spectacles."

"You are mistaken, my dear," said Mr. Earle; "it is only another exemplification of the hospitality of old England."

These dead cuts mortified Julia and irritated her father. They began to think of a trip to the country. The old gentleman had no opportunity of making a good speculation, and the young lady despaired of making the conquest of a lord. They began to throw out hints of being actually tired of London, as if such a thing were possible! The next day there happened two miracles—the sun shone bright, and Lady A. visited our heroine.

Nothing could be so civil in this world as my Lady A., and Julia was delighted. Her ladyship would take no denial—they must go down with her into the country and spend a month at least, if not the whole summer. She took Julia in her landau to the Park.

"What a pity nobody sees me!" thought Julia. But the hour was so unfashionable that she saw nobody but nurses and children.

They accompanied Lady A. to her superb castle. Only think, said Julia to herself, of my actually living in a castle! The first thing she did was to write to a hundred and fifty friends in America, to tell them that she was living in a castle seven hundred years old, with four turrets and a rookery. The letters were all kindly franked by his lordship—for Lady A. had a husband, although by her behaviour and conversation nobody would have suspected it. The very next London packet brought out twenty married ladies, and twice as many young ones, who had not been able to sleep a wink after receiving letters from Julia dated in an old castle and franked by a lord.

Nothing could equal the amiable attentions of my lady to Julia, and of my lord to her father. He took the old gentleman all round his estates, and showed him his improvements.

"Your lordship must have a great income," said Mr. Earle.

"A trifle—about—let me see—about thirty thousand a year. But I can hardly live upon it. A nobleman is obliged to support a certain style—you know—to keep up a certain establishment—you know—to have certain equipages—you know—and a certain retinue of servants—you know, my dear Earle."

"My dear Earle!" echoed the old gentleman, mentally, and rubbing his hands. "What a pity they can't hear all this in  street! I am resolved they shall hear it however. I'll tell them the story the very first dinner I give."

"Would you believe it, my dear Earle—I am in want of a few thousands at this moment. The harvest is not yet in, and my tenantry are not yet ready with their rents—and besides, I'd sooner eat my fingers than distress the poor fellows—you know, my dear Earle."

"My dear Earle," repeated thus three times, melted the heart of the old gentleman.

"I have a credit on the house of Baringtons for any sum I please," said he, in a faltering voice, as if fearful of offending his lordship. "If your lordship would—"

"My dear Earle—my dear friend, say no more, I accept your offer. We understand each other, and I am a man of few words."

So saying he squeezed the old gentleman's hand so hard that he squeezed out an order on his banker for five thousand pounds sterling.

"I'll give you my acknowledgment," said his lordship, squeezing his hand again, and calling him "his dear friend."

"It would be presumption in me to deal with your lordship as I would with a common man of business—let it be a debt of honour."

"My dear Earle, you are one of nature's noblemen," cried his lordship warmly, and he squeezed his hand again, as if he expected to squeeze out of it another five thousand.

But his lordship had read the fable of the goose that laid a golden egg every day, and was cautious not to press the matter too far. He went on cautiously till by degrees he squeezed about ten thousand more, when the old gentleman began to find both his credit and his patience nearly exhausted. The harvest had come in and the tenants paid their rents, but still his lordship talked not of paying his debt. Nay, he made another dead point at Mr. Earle, but it failed.

"My dear Earle," said he one day; "my dear Earle, I am almost ashamed, but if you would spare another five thousand I will pay the whole next week, or the week after certainly. The proceeds of an estate in Ireland will be remitted by that time, as I am advised by this letter from my agent," and he took out a letter—"um—um—ah! yes! the week after next certainly."

"My lord," quoth Mr. Earle, and his tongue clove to the roof of his mouth. "My lord—I—I—my credit on the banker—hem—I fear I can't spare the sum till I—I—see my banker."

His lordship saw he had killed the goose that laid the golden egg every day.

"O never mind, never mind—my—sir—never mind—I can do without it."

This time he forgot to squeeze the hand of the old gentleman, and call him "my dear Earle." He went out without asking his company as usual.

"Pa," said Julia, a day or two after—"pa, what is the matter—Lady A. is not half so civil as she was?"

"Nor Lord A. either," quoth Mr. Earle.

"I believe they are tired of us."

"I believe so too."

"Let us go back to London."

"Agreed, but what shall we do there?"

"Go back to America, pa."

"With all my heart—I'm tired of England."

"And so am I, pa," and Julia sighed at the emptiness of human anticipations.

They announced their intention, and strange as it may seem, neither her ladyship nor my lord made the least opposition.

"You know your own business best," said my lord.

"And do just as you like," said my lady.

What was most remarkable, his lordship said not a word about the money. "I dare say he has forgot it," thought the old gentleman; "but I shall put him in mind when I get to London." Accordingly he wrote a letter to which he received no reply. He wrote a second, which shared the same neglect. He wrote a third, it was returned in an envelope, with a notice from the steward that my lord and his lady had gone on the grand tour.

"I'll swinge the rascal!" cried Mr. Earle. Only think of his calling Lord A., a peer of the realm, a rascal!

"You can't swinge him," said the lawyer to whom Mr. Earle used this threat. "He is a peer, and privileged against arrest. No supplicative can be granted against him; no capias or exigent can be sued out against him for debt or trespass, nor can any essoign lie against a peer of the realm."

"Then I'll levy on his estates," said Mr. Earle.

"You can't," said the lawyer; "his estates are all entailed."

"I'll sue out a statute of outlawry."

"You can't in a civil action against a peer."

"Then I'll advertise him for a swindler."

"That would be scan. mag. and you'd be brought before the chief justice. The law presumes that a peer of the realm can neither be guilty of falsehood nor malice, and whoever says so, is guilty of scandalum magnatum."

"Then I've lost my money," cried Mr. Earle, in a melancholy strain.

"Exactly," said the lawyer, who never wasted words, except he was paid for it.

The lawyer pocketed his fee, and Mr. Earle pocketed his losses. He went home without his cash, and with the consolation that he had been a great fool.

"What will they say of me in  street? I shall be sung about the town in ballads."

"What is the matter, pa?" said Julia. "I do believe you want excitement."

"Not I—I want to go home."

"So do I—I'm tired of London."

"So am I."

"But it was delightful at the castle, wasn't it pa?"

"Not very," said Mr. Earle.

"I had like to have lost my heart to his lordship."

"And I lost my money," quoth Mr. Earle, to Mr. Earle, aside.

They sailed a day or two after in the packet, and arrived at home without any accident. Every body came to see them and ask about London. Julia talked about nothing but Lord A.'s great castle, and the charming hospitality of the noble couple. She did not know how dearly his lordship had charged them for their board. The old gentleman always hemmed, and fidgeted about when Julia talked away in this manner. He never told the story of my lord A. calling him "my dear Earle," nor was he so proud of his intimacy with that nobleman as might be expected. Julia, sometime after her return, married a young man of merit, and we are happy to say, that having sown her wild-oats, she is now the respectable wife of a respectable man, the happy mother of two children, and never complains of WANT OF EXCITEMENT. b.

ANNE BOLEYN.

THE name of Anne Boleyn, like that of Mary Queen of Scots, cannot be pronounced without exciting our curiosity, or awakening our sympathy. Alike distinguished for their beauty, rank, and misfortunes, they both fell victims to the unsparing jealousy and unrelenting hate of the Tudors. An outline of her short but eventful career is all that can be expected in the pages of a miscellany.

Anne Boleyn was born at Rochford-hall, in Essex, in the year 1507. She was the daughter of Sir Thomas Boleyn, in whose veins flowed the blood of the Ormonds, and of Elizabeth Howard, daughter of the accomplished and powerful earl of Surrey. Her father, who became a confidential minister of Henry the eighth, was an adroit and successful diplomatist; he was frequently employed in difficult negotiations, and his extreme sagacity in penetrating the motives of foreign courts obtained for him the surname of the "picklock of princes." The mother of Anne was a lady of highly cultivated mind, and attractive manners, and the wealth of Sir Thomas enabled her to live in the same princely splendour to which she had been accustomed in her father's castle, and to indulge her taste for elegant literature, which was so congenial to that of her husband. It was in the refined and polished circles, assembled in her father's hall, that Anne spent the happy years of her childhood; and from this society she acquired that ease, grace, and elegance which ever afterwards characterized her manners. With a lovely face, a sweet disposition, and uncommon quickness of perception, the little Anne became a universal favourite; and her ambitious parents, who fondly fancied she gave presages of future greatness, were not slow in availing themselves of such qualities to advance the worldly interests of their promising child. They procured for her at the early age of seven the enviable place of maid of honour to Mary of England, the beautiful sister of Henry the eighth, who, now only in her eighteenth year, was about proceeding to France, to be united to Louis the twelfth, whom infirmity and premature old age were rapidly hurrying to the grave. Peace had been concluded between England and France, and this ill-assorted marriage was projected to cement the alliance. Mary went to France with the olive-branch in her hand, and the bridal chaplet on her brow; but alas! she felt herself the victim adorned only to be sacrificed upon the altar of peace. Anne witnessed the inauspicious rites, the magnificent pageant that preceded, and the festivals and tournament that followed them. Five months afterwards death dissolved the unnatural union, and left Mary the arbitress of her own fortunes. Her story is well known; she bestowed her hand upon Charles Brandon, a gallant and chivalrous nobleman who had long possessed her heart. She returned to England unaccompanied by Anne, who entered the family of Claude, the amiable wife of Francis the first, the successor of Louis the twelfth.

Anne resided eight years in the court of this virtuous queen, where she was instructed in music, singing, and dancing, in all of which she excelled. The many hours spent by the ladies of this court in the monotonous occupation of the needle, were enlivened by the learned, witty, and brilliant Marguerite de Navarre, the beloved sister of Francis I., a princess who, "delighting in the pleasures of conversation, drew to her circle men of wit and learning, and found in the collision of kindred minds an intellectual gratification far different from the contemplation of broken lances and prancing steeds, or the mummeries of masques and pantomimes." Anne felt the ascendancy of her genius and the value of mental cultivation, and no doubt derived incalculable advantage from the society of this gifted woman. While poring over the grotesque figures of endless tapestry, her mind must have frequently wandered back to the scene of her childhood, and dwelt upon the legends relating to the families of her illustrious ancestors; and if she recollected that Rochford Hall, the place of her birth, had been occupied by more than one royal personage; that it had been the home of the celebrated Elizabeth Woodville whom Edward had raised to the throne; and that Anne, the daughter of that queen, had espoused her uncle, the chivalrous Lord Thomas Howard, it is no wonder that ambitious hopes were awakened in her bosom, and that visions of possible greatness floated before her ardent imagination. Her whole education was calculated to fill her mind with dreams of glory. She had witnessed the pompous pageantry of two coronations, and she had been present with Claude at the celebrated meeting of Henry and Francis in the plains of Guineas, the field of the cloth of gold, when at a tournament, unequalled in the costliness and splendour of its equipments, she beheld the expiring glories of chivalry.

This ostentatious display of friendship between the two monarchs was soon followed by a renewal of hostilities between their two kingdoms; whereupon Anne was recalled to England and separated from Claude and Francis, with mutual feelings of regret.

Through the influence of her father with Cardinal Wolsey, she was established in the household of Catharine of Arragon, the wife of Henry the eighth. It was known at this time to the select companions of Henry, that his affections for this excellent queen were declining with the wane of her beauty, and that he sought in the spirit-stirring delights of the chase, in chivalrous adventures, or in affairs of gallantry, the pleasures which he had formerly found in the society of his once beautiful bride. He, however, had no exclusive favourite until the accidental discovery of a secret love-affair fixed his wandering affections upon the fascinating Anne Boleyn. The young Lord Percy, who was a page in the service of Wolsey, attended the cardinal in his daily visits to the king; and while the minister was in private conference with his master, the noble page retired to one of the queen's apartments where he was certain to find the charming maid of honour. A mutual attachment ensued: the young nobleman declared his love, which was without hesitation accepted; but the youthful lovers indiscreetly betrayed too soon, by their significant glances, their ill-dissembled sentiments. A suspicion of their reciprocal affection was communicated to Henry, who then, for the first time, discovered that he had conceived for Anne Boleyn a violent passion, and, tyrant-like, determined to withhold her from him to whom she had pledged her faith. His vanity induced him to suppose that the king could not fail to supplant the peer in her affections, yet he thought it not prudent to rely entirely either upon the attractions of his own good person or the allurements of his royal diadem. Wolsey was ordered to interfere. The cardinal in angry tones commanded Percy, as he valued his life and honour, to desist from his pursuit of Anne Boleyn; adding, that though she knew it not, her sovereign had already disposed of her hand, and to one who he knew would be acceptable to her. Overcome by this appalling intelligence, Percy burst into tears; and in the agony of a heart suddenly bereft of happiness and hope, he implored the cardinal's intercession with the king, avowing that he had pledged his faith to Anne and could not retract it but at the expense of his honour. Surprised at his earnestness, the cardinal immediately sent for the parents of the offending lovers. The old Earl of Northumberland commanded his son on pain of disinheritance to renounce his hopes of a union with Anne Boleyn, while Sir Thomas, in obedience to the wishes of the king, reluctantly withdrew his daughter from court, and conducted her to his favourite residence of Hever castle, in Kent. To remove all impediments to the attainment of Henry's wishes, Percy was compelled, by the threats of his father, or the mandate of his sovereign, to marry the youthful daughter of the Earl of Shrewsbury; while Anne, wandering through the romantic halls of Hever castle, and indulging fond anticipations of future happiness, was suddenly awakened from her dreams of bliss by the fearful intelligence that Percy had been forced to desert his chosen love, and give his reluctant hand to another. Anne yielded for a short time to the alternate agitations of grief and indignation; but her proud spirit at length resumed its sway, and she determined to seek, in the aspirations of ambition, the happiness she had been unable to find in the dreams of love.

It does not appear that Anne, though now practised in courts, or her father, the sagacious "picklock of princes," ever suspected the motives of Henry in all these arbitrary proceedings, until his trumpet, sounding from a neighbouring hill, announced his approach to Hever castle. The whole plan was then developed. Henry declared his love; but Anne, in the well known words of Elizabeth Woodville, rejected his suit with disdain, and even when she found that he had irrevocably determined upon his divorce from his amiable queen, and when his visits had assumed an honourable character, her delicate nature revolted at the idea of supplanting her former mistress. The royal suitor was, however, at last received, and he became assiduous in his courtship and delicate in his attentions to the mistress of his heart. His correspondence with Anne at this time has been preserved, and as a royal love-letter may be a matter of interest or curiosity to many, the following is selected:

"My mistress and friend—I and my heart put ourselves into your hands, begging you to recommend us to your favour, and not to let absence lessen your affection to us. For it were a great pity to increase our pain which absence alone does sufficiently, and more than I could ever have thought; bringing to my mind a point of astronomy, which is, that the farther the mores are from us the farther too is the sun, and yet his heat is the more scorching: so it is with our love; we are at a distance from one another, and yet it keeps its fervency, at least on my side. I hope the like on your part, assuring you that the uneasiness of absence is already too severe for me, and when I think of the continuance of that which I must of necessity suffer, it would seem intolerable to me, were it not for the firm hope I have of your unchangeable affection for me; and now to put you sometimes in mind of it, and seeing I cannot be present in person with you, I send you the nearest thing to that possible, that is, my picture set in bracelets, with the whole device which you know already, wishing myself in their place, when it shall please you. This from the hand of your friend and servant. H. Rex."

The personal charms which rivetted the affections of a sovereign on a subject, have been celebrated by historians and poets. The Earl of Oxford remarks, that "when she composed her hands to play and voice to sing, it was joined with that sweetness of countenance that these harmonies concurred; likewise when she danced, her rare proportions varied themselves into all the graces that belong either to rest or motion." Miss Benger thus eloquently describes her: "That Anne was a brunette, is well known by description and representation from the artist and the poet; and it is notorious that on one of her fingers was a supplemental nail, a defect, if we may credit her encomiasts, which she had the address to conceal, or the skill to improve into a perfection. The fascination of Anne appears not to have resided even in her features, though of these the loveliness is almost universally acknowledged; but in her eloquent eyes, the symmetry of her form, the mingled airiness and elegance of her carriage; above all, in those indefinable charms of grace and expression which lend interest to every glance, and intelligence to each movement. Trained in the court of France, Anne had learned to improve her person by all those embellishments of dress which, under the direction of good taste, render art so powerful an auxiliary to nature. But it was not only at the toilette that her taste was confessedly pre-eminent: unrivalled in every captivating talent, she danced like a nymph, and not only touched the lute and virginal with a masterly hand, but accompanied them with her voice in a strain of delicious melody. To these brilliant accomplishments she added an exquisite willingness and power to please, and a taste and even more seducing than beauty."

Such were the fatal attractions that impelled the capricious Henry to seek a divorce from his once cherished Catharine,

"Who, like a jewel, had hung twenty years
About his neck, yet never lost her lustre."

On the first of September, 1532, Anne was created with much pomp Marchioness of Pembroke; and in the course of the splendid ceremony, Henry doubtless felt how well the royal diadem would become a brow that wore so gracefully the semi-circular coronet. After her elevation to this enviable distinction, Anne was attended like a princess by a numerous train of young ladies of the highest rank.

Henry now pursued his measures to obtain a divorce with all the ardour of his impatient nature. Dissimulating his real motives, he alleged, as his only plea, the illegality of his marriage with Catharine, his brother's widow; and with characteristic hypocrisy, to churchmen he spoke of the scruples of his conscience, and to the nobility he urged the necessity of a legitimate succession, fortifying his arguments with quotations from scripture; but his hypocrisy and sophistry were alike contemptible and condemned: the sympathies of the ladies of his court, and the affections of the people were all enlisted in favour of their beloved queen, whose unfeigned piety, gentle virtues, and spotless fame, were themes of universal admiration. The proceedings for the divorce were protracted to a length painful to all the parties interested. The king was vexed with unexpected obstacles and involved in inextricable difficulties. At length the impatient monarch could brook no further delay, and setting all laws, human and divine, at defiance, he was privately married to Anne Boleyn the latter part of the year 1532, without waiting for the decree of divorce, which, however, through the agency of pliant statesmen and obsequious churchmen, he was certain of obtaining, and which indeed soon afterwards followed. The only censurable part of Anne's conduct was her consenting to this premature marriage, although the divorce was placed beyond all doubt. On the Easter-even following Henry issued his proclamation for the coronation of his new queen, which took place on Whit-Sunday, the first of June, with a pageantry and ceremony unsurpassed in those days of "pomp and vanities." Clad in a robe of purple velvet, surmounted with ermine, her hair flowing down her swan-like neck in rich luxuriance and glittering with a circlet of precious stones, she prostrated herself before the high altar in Westminster Hall, and when she arose, the Archbishop of Canterbury, after anointing her head and breast, placed the heavy crown of St. Edward on her head, the sceptre of gold in her right hand, and the rod of ivory with the dove in her left, when the loud Te Deum, bursting from the choir, announced the elevation of Anne Boleyn to the summit of earthly honours. She had now realized all her most romantic dreams of greatness; and to crown her hopes, she became, on the seventh of September following, the mother of the princess, afterwards the Queen Elizabeth. For two years she enjoyed the love and confidence of Henry, but in the course of the third she experienced the decline and loss of both.

Among the causes of his alienation may be reckoned his inconstancy, his jealousy of her popularity, particularly with the reformers, whose cause she had warmly espoused, his suspicions of her fidelity, awakened by malicious and groundless insinuations, and finally the introduction of Jane Seymour at court, whose beauty, it was hoped by her friends, would counteract the influence of Anne's ever-varying fascinations over the king. The machinations of her enemies were but too successful. Henry was induced to place spies over her conduct, among whom was found her unnatural sister-in-law, Lady Rochford, who volunteered the most diabolical perjuries for the ruin of her husband's sister. But no plausible charge could be brought against a queen who had chosen for her confidential friends her accomplished brother and his associates, the elegant Wyatt and the gifted earl of Surrey; who had attached to her person ladies of unblemished fame; and who had appointed the rigid and unsuspicious Latimer the guide of her conscience. She found, however, her innocence no protection against tyranny and corruption. While at dinner, surrounded by her ladies, she was abruptly summoned to depart to the tower, to answer a charge of infidelity to the king and of conspiring against his life. Without friends or protectors, she was conveyed in a solitary barge to her prison—to the very place where, three years before, a magnificent train of two hundred barges had escorted her in triumph. Anne could scarcely realize this sudden change in her fortunes, or believe the king serious in his charges. From her "doleful prison" she addressed him a letter, written with uncommon energy and pathos, protesting her innocence, soliciting an open and impartial trial, and supplicating pardon for the guiltless persons who, she understood, "were in strict imprisonment for her sake." But this affecting appeal does not appear to have reached the king. On the fifteenth of May, 1536, a mere mock tribunal of justice was created within the tower, and peers of England were appointed her judges. No advocate was allowed her, and though witnesses had been suborned, yet the monstrous and absurd charges against her could not be substantiated; on the contrary, she successfully repelled them in an able and eloquent speech; and her acquittal was confidently expected; but her inimical judges knew the will of their tyrannical master, and she was condemned to be burnt or beheaded. Among the peers she beheld but one sympathizing countenance, the earl of Northumberland, her early lover, who, on the plea of indisposition, and before the fatal sentence was pronounced, abruptly left the court.

"Well might his breast with anguish thrill! few years had passed, away
"Since that fair form within his arms in love's deep fondness lay."

Anne heard her sentence unmoved, and lifting up her hands she emphatically exclaimed, "O Father! O Creator! Thou art the way and the truth and the life; thou knowest that I have not deserved this death." On the nineteenth of May, 1536, she submitted her head to the block. She intrepidly refused the bandage; and the meek and touching expression of her eyes disarmed the executioner, nor until a sudden noise withdrew her eyes from him, was he enabled to strike the fatal blow.

"Thus did she die—the young, the fair, the good, compelled to bow
"Her graceful, swan-like neck beneath the headman's heavy blow;
"Her shining locks were dabbled in the blood that flowed like rain,
"But o'er the whiteness of her soul e'en blood could leave no stain."

Ambition was Anne's ruling passion; but it was ambition tempered by a love of justice, and sanctified by daily acts of benevolence; "her eye of charity," says Wyatt, "her hand of bounty passed through the whole land." She placed herself among the leaders of the reformation, and the success of that cause may in some measure be ascribed to her active zeal. The advocates of intolerance became, of course, her inveterate enemies, and they vilely calumniated a name which must ever be remembered with gratitude by the friends of religion and civil liberty.

NOTES BY A TRAVELLER.

Virginia—September—1830.

TRAVELLED this day on horseback—had been fortunate in obtaining a fine, high-spirited animal. He arched his neck, champed the bit, and pranced along, playing off as many airs as if he had borne some mailed knight onward to battle. There is something exciting in this species of exercise. When I vault into the saddle my thoughts are all noble. I am a hero or an emperor. * * *

This town is near the centre of the state. The road to it lies through forests, almost as undisturbed by any sign of the human race as they were in the primeval ages. They have completely filled my imagination. They reminded me of the scenery so well delineated in Ivanhoe, where Robin Hood and the stout friar played their merry pranks—where the black knight wandered after the tournament, and joined the besiegers in beating down the massive battlements of that amiable gentleman, Front de Boeuf. But here, alas! are no battlements, no giants, no kings in disguise, no wandering knights and lovely distressed maidens—nothing but strapping farmer-boys; or negro slaves occasionally driving along their clumsy enormous waggons, heavily laden with corn, tobacco, or cotton; and numerous societies of certain gentlemen, with four feet, who eat acorns. The roving life led by the latter has undoubtedly its own charms. They certainly enjoy in an enviable perfection that "glorious freedom" for which so many patriotic two-legged persons have nobly fought and bled; but as the acorns, on which they place their principal dependence, do not fall till the autumn is pretty well advanced, it sometimes comes to pass that they arrive at a state of tenuity altogether beyond their wishes. I mused for some time upon the attitude of one unhappy denizen of the forest, "Left and abandoned of his velvet friends."

His countenance wore an expression of such a tender and melancholy dissatisfaction with the existing state of affairs, yet softened and subdued with such patient resignation to the will of fate, that I could not withhold my sympathy. Being in a contemplative mood, the sight awakened many sage meditations upon the unequal distribution of happiness among men as well as pigs, and I had turned over in my mind the plan of a pathetic "impromptu on seeing a pig standing alone in the middle of a forest, in the western part of Virginia, without any thing to eat," when it suddenly struck me that his leanness was the most fortunate occurrence that could possibly have happened to him, for the leaner the pig the less likely to be killed. I cannot tell if the person whom I have thus handed down to posterity were himself pursuing a similar train of philosophical and consolatory reflection, but I left him more than ever convinced of the truth of the poet,

"There is a spirit of good in things evil
Would men observingly distil it out."

The extreme loneliness of this route is occasionally relieved by the miserable log huts of the negro slaves, and the scarcely more inviting domicils of their white masters. These inhabitants of the backwoods, although sometimes so poor in money as to be stinted in their meals by a short crop, are yet always attended by several slaves, whose obsequious services would better fit the indolence of a Turkish sultan. I put up last night at a dilapidated building, which resembled a neglected barn. The chimney, built as they generally are here, on the outside of the house, had nearly taken leave of the dwelling. The walls were full of apertures. The farmer, or rather planter, was stretched at full length on a sort of bed, with a giantess of a negro girl fanning him to sleep. The family were at supper. Two or three negroes attended the table; one little half-naked creature waved a brush over the grouse to guard it against the intrusion of flies, cats, musquitos, and chickens. By my bed stood a clock, which, after divers noises from within, announced the hours of the night with an energy that, in my mind, entitled it to a place in a town steeple; and a dingy looking piece of antique drapery, which passed current for a mosquito-net, was hung about my bed, with holes in it large enough to admit a flock of wild geese.

Numerous huts, desolate and deserted, meet the eye of the passenger, and every object would impress a stranger with the idea that the most wretched degree of poverty pervades the whole state; a short deviation from the main road, however, would undeceive him. The wealthy have studiously located their mansions at a distance from the highway, to avoid the importunities of benighted travellers, and enjoy the other advantages of seclusion. Here are vast plantations, where abound all the comforts of life. * * *

I inquired my road this afternoon of a negro, whose athletic and giant proportions almost startled me. His appearance was perfectly noble. His shoulders were of an atlantean breadth—his open collar discovered a chest before which Hercules might have paused—his limbs were all powerfully formed and well-shaped—and I never beheld any thing more unequivocally black than his complexion. I was not sufficiently accustomed to a slave country to pass by without observation the sight of such a fellow, as he uncovered his head, cringing down and saluting me as "master."

A few moments afterwards I saw one of an opposite description. His beast-like and monstrous visage was deformed almost beyond any resemblance to the form of humanity. He seemed under the ban of some fiend. He was lame, half blind, and bent down with age. You wondered by what invisible agency his ragged clothes were kept together. He was crawling up a hill with a pail of brick clay upon his head, and stopped a moment to breathe at the foot of an immense and superb oak which rose above him like a giant, and sent abroad its magnificent branches with an air of haughty grandeur, as if it felt its superiority over the petty reptile at its root. Of what extraordinary extremes of hideousness and beauty the human form is capable! From this coarse, repulsive, and disgusting countenance, my mind recurred to others softly stamped by nature with the opposite extreme of intelligence, sweetness, and youthful beauty. Doubly charming from the force of so strong a contrast, or some other mystery in philosophy, they appeared to my mind with such a vivid loveliness that for a moment I closed my eyes to shut out those grim and uncouth features from the rich groupings of memory. Animalcula in snow.—In the present season, when every editor thinks it an imperative duty to say something about winter, the following extract of a letter from Dr. J. E. Mure to Dr. Silliman, may not be uninteresting to our readers. It was the theory of a late learned German philosopher, that not only air, water, &c. are filled with organized creatures, of inconceivable minuteness, but that the most solid matter, iron, rock, and wood, are composed of similar animals. Dr. Mure's experiment discovers a fact scarcely less singular.

"When the winter had made considerable progress, without much frost," says Dr. Mure, "there happened a heavy fall of snow. Apprehending that I might not have an opportunity of supplying my house with ice, I threw in snow, perhaps enough to half fill it. There was afterwards severely cold weather, and I filled the remainder with ice. About August the waste and consumption of the ice brought us down to the snow, when it was discovered that a glass of water, which was cooled with it, contained hundreds of animalcules. I then examined another glass of water, out of the same pitcher, and with the aid of a microscope, before the snow was put into it, found it perfectly clear and pure; the snow was then thrown into it, and on solution the water again exhibited the same phenomenon—hundreds of animalcules, visible to the naked eye with acute attention, and, when viewed through the microscope, resembling most diminutive shrimps, and, wholly unlike the eels discovered in the acetous acid, were seen in the full enjoyment of animated nature.

"I caused holes to be dug in several parts of the mass of snow in the ice-house, and to the centre of it, and in the most unequivocal and repeated experiments had similar results; so that my family did not again venture to introduce the snow-ice into the water they drank, which had been a favourite method, but used it as an external refrigerant for the pitcher.

"These little animals may class with the amphibia which have cold blood, and are generally capable, in a low temperature, of a torpid state of existence. Hence their immersion did no violence to their constitution, and the possibility of their revival by heat is well sustained by analogy; but their generation, their parentage, and their extraordinary transmigration, are to me subjects of profound astonishment."

Daily Sentinel.—We did not see the article in the Sentinel, alluding to the Mirror, till too late for notice in our last, nor can we at present comply with the request of the editors in a satisfactory manner, not being in possession of a file of their paper. We may possibly have been mistaken, although our impressions are strong to the contrary; and if, upon further examination, we find this to be the case, it will be both a duty and a pleasure to make every proper acknowledgment.

Mathematical Diary.—Mr. James Ryan, of this city, publishes a diary under the above title, containing a series of scientific questions, proposed and solved by students, to which is added evening amusements, or the beauties of the heavens displayed. Students in the mathematics would be benefited and amused by the use of this work.

WHEN LOVE WAS A CHILD.

WRITTEN BY THOMAS MOORE, ESQ.—COMPOSED BY BISHOP.

Moderato.

When Love was a child and went i - dling round, 'Mong flow - ers the whole sum-mer's day, One morn in the val - ley a bow'r he found, So sweet it al-lured him to stay.

SECOND VERSE.

O'er head from the trees hung a garland fair,
A fountain ran darkly beneath;
'Twas Pleasure that hung the bright flow'rs up there,
Love knew it, and jump'd at the wreath.

THIRD VERSE.

But Love didn't know—(and at his weak years,
What urchin was likely to know?)
That Sorrow had made of her own salt tears,
That fountain which murmur'd below.

FOURTH VERSE.

He caught at the wreath—but with too much haste,
As boys, when impatient, will do—
It fell in those waters of briny taste;
The flowers were all wet through.

FIFTH VERSE.

Yet this is the wreath he wears night and day,
And, though it all sunny appears
With Pleasure's own lustre, each leaf, they say,
Skill tastes of the fountain of tears.

THE WAVERLEY NOVELS.

THE following article is copied from a late number of the Caledonian Mercury:

When the introductions and notes to these novels were first announced, they were looked upon by many of the author's admirers with some apprehensions, as being likely to dispel the illusion which it is especially the romancer's interest and object to keep up, by letting the reader too much behind the curtain. As the edition has proceeded, however, these apprehensions have been banished, and by the many thousand readers of the novels, the appearance of every alternate volume is now eagerly looked forward to, as a renewal of the author's delightful gossip about himself and his works. The introduction to Ivanhoe is in a singularly happy tone. The notes to the second volume of that romance are not numerous, but they are most of them curious. Two of them vindicate the author's heraldry, the correctness of which had, by some squeamish critics, been called in question, because he had, in the description of the device on the shield of the "Black Knight," charged metal upon metal. We see no reason why, if it liked him, he might not take the same liberties with heraldry which he does with history; the notes, however, satisfactorily prove that he had full authority for this peculiarity. The note on the castle at Coningsburgh is interesting to the architectural antiquary, as exhibiting the author's theory of the early Saxon architecture.

The Waverley novels constitute, beyond a doubt, the most popular series of works in the English language, and the success, which has attended the present edition of them shows that the elevated rank which they have attained in our literature has not been assigned to them on slight grounds. Observing that the proprietors have recently issued prospectuses of a NEW ISSUE, we made some inquiries about it, and learned that the object of it is only to enable them to add twenty thousand more subscribers to the thirty thousand or thereabout, whom they have already enlisted.

A great deal has been said and written lately on the subject of these embellishments, and the explanations which have been elicited tend to show that the proprietors are liable to no portion of the censure which has been—we will not say altogether unjustly—lavished on many of them. When the first number came out, illustrative of Guy Mannering, there was but one opinion of its merits—this will never do—and the result was, that we have not had the affliction of criticising any more of them. The author of Waverley must pay the penalty which his great predecessors, Shakspeare and Milton and others have done before him, of having some of their noblest and most ideal conceptions embodied to our eyes, according to the conceptions of men unendowed with one particle of the genius or intelligence of the original.

These novels certainly stand at the head of that great periodical flow, into which so large a portion of the literature of the day has been drawn; looking at it in a politico-economical point of view, the success of the speculation must contribute materially to improve the comfortable existence of some, and to afford the means of daily bread to many, (we have heard so many as six hundred mentioned) including paper-makers, printers, painters and engravers, bookbinders, booksellers, and many others. There is one person, however, in whom the public is more interested than all the others, namely, the illustrious author himself, who will derive, ultimately, no small portion of the benefits which it will realize. Hitherto, to his honour be it said, the produce has been entirely applied to the discharge of the heavy obligations (a large proportion not his own) which the calamities of 1826 brought upon him. These claims are in the course of liquidation, and we learn that a partial payment is on the point of being made which will reduce their amount to nearly one half. We really conscientiously believe, that one of the secrets of the unprecedented success which this edition of the novels has met with, is to be found in the sympathy which all classes of the public, great and small, entertain for one to whom they are so deeply indebted. Bright and happy, we are sure, will be the day, for the immortal proprietor of Abbotsford, when the success of his works shall have enabled him to discharge every shilling he owes, and to leave his property unincumbered to his successor. Whenever it is his fate to leave the world after that—and long may the day be distant—he will not only leave behind him a name above every other name of which the literature of his country can boast, (in times when great talent and laxity of principle are frequently combined) but a reputation of a still higher kind, which is so well summed up in the expressive line of the poet:

"An honest man's the noblest work of God!"

THE DISCARDED.

"No doubt she was right in rejecting my suit,
But why did she kick me down stairs?"—Ballad.

I LIVE, as lives a withered bough,
Blossomless, leafless, and alone;
There is none left to love me now,
Or shed one tear when I am gone.

When I am gone—no matter where,
I dread no other world but this,
To leave it is my only prayer,
That hope my only happiness.

For I am weary of it—black
Are sun, and stars, and sky to me;
And my own thoughts are made the rack
That wrings my nerves in agony.

There's not a wretched one that lives
And loathes like me the light of day;
And I shall bless the hour that gives
My body to its kindred clay.

And yet at times, I know not why,
There comes a foolish feverish thought,
Of where these shrivelled limbs shall lie,
And where this dead cold flesh shall rot,

When the quick throbbing of my brain,
That now is maddening me, is o'er,
And the hot fire in each swollen vein,
Is quenched at last to burn no more.

And then I shudder at the tone
Of my heart's hymn, and seem to hear
The shrieking of my dying groan,
The rattling clod upon my bier;

And feel the pang which he who dies,
Welcomes—the pang which gives me rest—
Ere the lead-weights are on mine eyes,
Or the white shroud is on my breast;

When the death-foam is on my lip,
And the death-dews are in my hair,
And my clenched fingers in the grip
Of agony, are clinging there.

And then I feel how sad it is
To know there's none my fate to weep,
Print on my lip the unanswered kiss,
Or close mine eyes in their last sleep.

For all unheard the damp earth flung
Upon my coffin lid must be;
By strangers will the bell be rung,
That tolls in mockery for me.

And he who tolls will laugh the while,
And whistle his light song of mirth;
And he who digs my grave will smile
As senseless as its senseless earth.

Some dark-robed priest, perhaps, will pray
Beside my bier—because he must,
And some hoarse voices sing or say
The unfeeling adage, "dust to dust."

And if perchance I leave behind
Enough of worldly pelf to raise
A marble tomb—my name enshrined
In prodigality of praise,

May meet the passing stranger's eye,
A sculptor's monument and pride;
Telling that man was born to die,
And I—was born and lived and died.

And men will trample on my grave,
And keep the grass from growing there;
And not even one poor flower will wave
Above me in the summer air.

For there are none to plant it—none
To water it with patient tears;
My cradle watchers—they are gone—
The monitors of my young years

Are silent now—there was a time—
It is a long, long time ago—
When in a pure and holy clime
I breathed—and if the clouds of woe

Dimm'd the blue heaven of my thought,
Like summer storms they flitted by,
And when they vanish'd there were wrought
Bright rainbows in the twilight sky,

On which my wild gaze linger'd till
Their colours faded far away;
Those clouds—I feel their dampness still—
But the bright rainbows—where are they?

And she I loved? I must not think
Of her "for that way madness lies!"—
Boy, start that Champagne cork—I'll drink,
And dream no more of Mary's eyes. Nov. 1821.

LETTERS FROM ENGLAND.

FROM OUR LONDON CORRESPONDENT.

NUMBER ELEVEN.

London, December 4.

AFTER the actors and audience, perhaps a few observations on the different theatres, and the description of pieces exhibited in them, for the amusement and edification of the public, may not be out of place. Drury-lane and Covent-garden are two magnificent temples for the representation of the legitimate drama. Taste and elegance are conspicuous in whatever appertains to them; and though both houses are richly ornamented, the most fastidious critic would be puzzled to point out any thing gaudy, glaring, or obtrusive. The contrast between the chaste simplicity of their common scenery, and the glittering coarseness of that of the minor theatres, is very striking. The greatest fault of both is their size; great physical powers being absolutely requisite to make the singing and acting effective in the more remote parts of the house. The interior of each being in the shape of a horse-shoe, the stage is consequently much smaller in proportion to the audience-part than that of the Park theatre, which is semi-circular. The saloons and lobbies are uncommonly spacious and splendid. The principal saloon at Drury-lane is one large mirror, the walls being entirely covered with glass. Next in reputation to these stands the Haymarket, nearly the size of the Bowery, and bearing about the same relation to Drury-lane and Covent-garden, that the Chatham in its best days did to the Park. The English Opera-house—lately burned and now rebuilding—its name sufficiently indicates the purposes to which it is appropriated. The Italian Opera-house, not yet opened for the season, but which I am given to understand is by far the largest and most splendid theatrical establishment in London. Then there is Astley's, in the quadruped line, where dramas written by asses are played by horses—where the business of the scene is transacted en croupe, and ladies are courted and tyrants slaughtered at a three quarter pace or a full gallop. Sadler's Wells, once famous for heroic actions and real water, swearing and tobacco. Here ships were nightly wrecked and long-boats overturned, and sailors continually employed in jumping overboard to save beauty and innocence, in wet white garments, from a watery grave. The performers were a species of amphibious animals, and passed half their time in fluids; and the best swimmer was, next to the Newfoundland dog, the most important personage in the establishment. Here it was that the "Courageous Coral Diver, or the Shark of the Gulf of California," had such a successful run. The "Humane Society for the recovery of drowned persons" allowed, I believe, their drag-nets, warm flannels, stomach-pumps, and other apparatus to be kept in readiness at this theatre in case of accident; but still they could not prevent the coughs, colds, catarrhs, and pulmonary complaints incident to such an otter-like state of existence—the real water was therefore discontinued—the sea was sunk, and the ocean is now made of carpets and painted sail-cloth, as in other establishments.

Besides these, there are an infinite number of minor theatres, with the names of half of which I am unacquainted. Some of the major-minors are highly respectable, and not unfrequently have first-rate talent on their boards; but the minor-minors are, for the most part, from stage to gallery, an unmixed mass of ignorance and vulgarity. Here is performed that species of "national drama," which was wont to be enacted at the Lafayette and Mount Pitt circus before they were purified by fire, and which is still to be seen at the Park and Bowery, much to their credit, on holiday nights, where the several parties have it all their own way; and the most glorious and decisive victories are obtained by the tremendous carnage of one half of the supernumeraries, and the craven cowardice of the other; and where the enemies of valiant Englishmen and courageous Americans are humbled into the dust before them, much to the gratification of the very patriotic and enlightened audiences. Here, as on your side of the water, instances of almost incredible prowess are as common as can be; and an enemy's first-rate is frequently boarded and taken by a single midshipman, or a young officer alone cuts a detachment to pieces, except that the curtain falls amid shouts of "England for ever!" instead of "Hurrah for Jackson!" I had been so long accustomed to hear all the love and liberty and heroism and bombast proceed out of the mouths of gentlemen in blue jackets, that it at first seemed strange to hear gentlemen in red declaiming in precisely the self-same strain. However, it must be said for the Londoners, that these direct national puffs are not tolerated at decent theatres. The victories of his majesty's forces are almost entirely confined to places patronised for the most part by butcher's boys, dustmen, draymen, and coal-heavers.

The principal source of profit, however, to nearly all the minor theatres is the "supernatural business," or representation of demoniacal dramas. But here no narrow national feelings prevail—justice is equally dealt out to all; and in the last scene the devil has his due, let the culprit be what countryman he may. The mythologies of all ages and nations have been raked up, and the evil spirits with which they abound re-produced upon the stage. It is really fearful to look upon a dead wall, covered with play-bills, and read the dreadful announcements for the evening's amusements, rendered terribly distinct by oninous red or sombre black type of gigantic stature. Some of the managers ground their claims to public patronage and support on the immense expense they have been at in order to do justice to views of the interior of the infernal regions; and one spirited lessee has actually constructed a false or double stage, which, at the termination of the piece, sinks down with the particular fiend and victim of the evening, amid cataracts of flame spouting forth from the side-wings. The enacting of demons has become a regular branch of theatrical business; and Mr. O. Smith, a man with an unamiable countenance, and a voice horribly hoarse, is as distinguished in this line as Kean in tragedy or Liston in comedy. "The prince of darkness is a gentleman," says Shakespeare, but two-thirds of his representatives in London make him out little better than an illiterate scoundrel. It is rather too bad, on the most serious occasions, to hear the father of all evil transposing his v's and w's, and leaving out his h's, in the true cockney style, unable even to pronounce his own proper place of residence in a correct manner.

The public appetite for gloomy horrors is at present perfectly ravenous. I know not how to account for this, except by attributing it to the alarming increase in the consumption of pork which has taken place in the metropolis within these few years. This species of animal nutriment is the favourite food of the lower orders, and, I am inclined to think, generates more diabolical tastes and propensities than "flesh of muttons, beeves, or goats." How is it possible that a person who banquets off pork sausages and heavy porter, and then swallows two or three drams of spirits of turpentine, miscalled gin, can have his sensibilities aroused by such slight provocatives as wit and humour? Is he a man to be tickled with a straw? What is a joke, or a scrap of sentiment, or a lively conceit to him? You might as well give a glass of delicately flavoured wine to an habitual bibber of fourth-proof brandy. Take him to see "Much ado about Nothing," and he thinks the play well named—or "As you like it," and he likes it not. No—he pays his money and goes to witness "The Infernal Compact; or, the Fiend, the Victim, and the Murderer?"—he puts his hands in his pockets, and criticizes the vagaries of Mr. Smith, in his favourite character of the "Demon of the Valley of Skulls," (as performed by him fifty-seven successive nights, with distinguished approbation!) These monstrosities have been of gradual growth. First came "Cherrys and Fair Stars," "Visions of the Sun," and similar tales of enchantment; but these were soon found to be mere moonshine, and a class of melo-dramas were got up where "murders were done too terrible for the ear." The Newgate Calendar was regularly dramatized, and a most atrocious state of things prevailed for some time; but, as the anti-temperance man goes on regularly to increase the strength of the dose, as his acuteness of taste decreases, so the managers, after blunting the feelings and perceptions of the public, were obliged to resort to still stronger stimulants, and hence the present sulphureous state of the stage. But even this is beginning to fail. Notwithstanding the "infernal abysses," by the help of chemical substances, which throw on the stage a strong glare of red, blue, or yellow light, are rendered, as the term is, "highly effective," inasmuch, indeed, as to produce a strong impression on any person unused to such exhibitions, the cockney surveys the whole with critical coolness, until a superabundant quantity of flame elicits some such exclamation of admiration as—"I say, Bill, vot do you think of that 'are? My eyes!" delivered in a tone of voice which evidently shows that the view of the place of punishment before him has not made any impression on the mind of the speaker in regard to his own ulterior prospects. If the stage at present actually shows "the very age and body of the time, its form and pressure," the millenium is much further off than many people suppose. C.

LITERARY NOTICES.

Remarks on the Character and Writings of John Milton, occasioned by the publication of his lately discovered Treatise on Christian Doctrine. By William E. Channing.

THIS is a very neatly printed duodecimo volume, which has been long before the public, has run through several editions, and is so generally known and justly appreciated in Boston, and by a class of the author's friends in this and one or two neighbouring cities, that a review of it at present may at first be deemed a work of supererogation. We are however induced to offer a few remarks upon it, because, however highly, and it may be added enthusiastically, Mr. Channing may be esteemed where he is known, we have frequently been astonished at the total ignorance of his works which exists among well-educated and even literary circles, where Byron, Moore, and Scott are familiarly quoted; and where, to have neglected the perusal of Irving, or Paulding, would be noted as a want of taste or learning; yet he has probably excelled every other American in logical and convincing powers of reason, imbued with the fervour of a high and comprehensive imagination; in a rich and copious flow of thoughts; ready command of words, and charming, lucid, and graceful modes of expression. In whatever light may be considered those essays or discourses, whose object is the establishment of some point of doctrine or theory of metaphysics, by nature unsuceptible of complete demonstration, his broad and clear views of life and nature, the ingenuity with which he displays the great outline of his subject, clears away from it what is shadowy, detects and brings brightly forth its beautiful truths, and explains what seems inconsistent, gives his compositions a singularly inspiring and commanding influence. But his productions are not exclusively argumentative. There are pages of the most graphic delineations of human life. In his happiest efforts, as he proceeds in his subject, he seems to brace himself up with a consciousness of new and increasing intellectual vigour; a more glowing, fervid feeling animates his soul. His eloquence resembles a stream, which at first winds feebly from its source; but swollen with many tributary branches, flows on, broadening and deepening, till its current becomes actually irresistible. It is not our design to satisfy that portion of the public who have never examined the various offsprings of Mr. Channing's genius, so as to render the perusal of them unnecessary. We shall not, therefore, at present give any connected account of the object of this review, but we solicit the attention of our readers to a few extracts, which, although something of their force and lustre will be lost in their separation from the main body of the article, will serve as examples of that stirring, yet chaste and eloquent style of composition, of which we have endeavoured to express our admiration.

"Milton's fame rests chiefly on his poetry, and to this we naturally give our first attention. By those who are accustomed to speak of poetry as light reading, Milton's eminence in this sphere may be considered only as giving him a high rank among the contributors to public amusement. Not so thought Milton. Of all God's gifts of intellect, he esteemed poetical genius the most transcendent. He esteemed it in himself as a kind of inspiration, and wrote his great works with something of the conscious dignity of a prophet. We agree with Milton in his estimate of poetry. It seems to us the divinest of all arts; for it is the breathing or expression of that principle or sentiment, which is deepest and sublimest in human nature; we mean, of that thirst or aspiration, to which no mind is wholly a stranger, for something purer and lovelier, something more powerful, lofty, and thrilling than ordinary and real life affords. No doctrine is more common among christians than that of man's immortality; but it is not so generally understood, that the germs or principles of his whole future being are now wrapped up in his soul, as the rudiments of the future plant in the seed. As a necessary result of this constitution, the soul, possessed and moved by these mighty though infant energies, is perpetually stretching beyond what is present and visible, struggling against the bounds of its earthly prison-house, and seeking relief and joy in imaginings of unseen and ideal being. This view of our nature, which has never been fully developed, and which goes further towards explaining the contradictions of human life than all others, carries us to the very foundation and sources of poetry. He, who cannot interpret by his own consciousness what we now have said, wants the true key to works of genius. He has not penetrated those sacred recesses of the soul, where poetry is born and nourished, and inhales immortal vigour, and wings herself for her heavenward flight. In an intellectual nature, framed for progress and for higher modes of being, there must be creative energies, powers of original and ever-growing thought; and poetry is the form in which these energies are chiefly manifested. It is the glorious prerogative of this art, that it 'makes all things new' for the gratification of a divine instinct. It indeed finds its elements in what it actually sees and experiences, in the worlds of matter and mind; but it combines and blends these into new forms and according to new affinities; breaks down, if we may so say, the distinctions and bounds of nature; imparts to material objects life, and sentiment, and emotion, and invests the mind with the powers and splendours of the outward creation; describes the surrounding universe in the colours which the passions throw over it, and depicts the soul in those modes of repose or agitation, of tenderness or sublime emotion, which manifests its thirst for a more powerful and joyful existence. To a man of a literal and prosaic character the mind may seem lawless in these workings; but it observes higher laws than it transgresses, the laws of the immortal intellect; it is trying and developing its best faculties; and in the objects which it describes, or in the emotions which it awakens, anticipates those states of progressive power, splendour, beauty, and happiness, for which it was created.

"We accordingly believe that poetry, far from injuring society, is one of the great instruments of its refinement and exaltation. It lifts the mind above ordinary life, gives it a respite from depressing cares, and awakens the consciousness of its affinity with what is pure and noble. In its legitimate and highest efforts, it has the same tendency and aim with christianity; that is, to spiritualize our nature. True, poetry has been made the instrument of vice, the pander of bad passions; but when genius thus stoops, it dims its fires, and parts with much of its power; and even when poetry is enslaved to licentiousness or misanthropy, she cannot wholly forget her true vocation. Strains of pure feeling, touches of tenderness, images of innocent happiness, sympathies with suffering virtue, bursts of scorn or indignation at the hollowness of the world, passages true to our moral nature, often escape in an immoral work, and show us how hard it is for a gifted spirit to divorce itself wholly from what is good. Poetry has a natural alliance with our best affections. It delights in the beauty and sublimity of the outward creation and of the soul. It indeed portrays, with terrible energy, the excesses of the passions; but they are passions which show a mighty nature, which are full of power, which command awe, and excite a deep though shuddering sympathy. Its great tendency and purpose is to carry the mind beyond and above the beaten, dusty, weary walks of ordinary life; to lift it into a purer element; and to breathe into it more profound and generous emotion. It reveals to us the loveliness of nature, brings back the freshness of early feeling, revives the relish of simple pleasures, keeps unquenched the enthusiasm which warmed the spring-time of our being, refines youthful love, strengthens our interest in human nature by vivid delineations of its tenderest and loftiest feelings, spreads our sympathies over all classes of society, knits us by new ties with universal being, and, through the brightness of its prophetic visions helps faith to lay hold on the future life.

"We are aware, that it is objected to poetry, that it gives wrong views and excites false expectations of life, peoples the mind with shadows and illusions, and builds up imagination on the ruins of wisdom. That there is a wisdom, against which poetry wars, the wisdom of the senses, which makes physical comfort and gratification the supreme good, and wealth the chief interest of life, we do not deny; nor do we deem it the least service which poetry renders to mankind that it redeems them from the thralldom of this earthborn prudence. But, passing over this topic, we would observe, that the complaint against poetry as abounding in illusion and deception, is in the main groundless. In many poems there is more of truth than in many histories and philosophic theories. The fictions of genius are often the vehicles of the sublimest verities, and its flashes often open new regions of thought, and throw new light on the mysteries of our being. In poetry, when the letter is falsehood, the spirit is often profoundest wisdom. And if truth thus dwells in the boldest fictions of the poet, much more may it be expected in his delineations of life; for the present life, which is the first stage of the immortal mind, abounds in the materials of poetry, and it is the high office of the bard to detect this divine element among the grosser labours and pleasures of our earthly being. The present life is not wholly prosaic, precise, tame, and finite. To the gifted eye it abounds in the poetic. The affections which spread beyond ourselves and stretch far into futurity; the workings of mighty passions, which seem to arm the soul with an almost superhuman energy; the innocent and irrepressible joy of infancy; the bloom, and buoyancy, and dazzling hopes of youth; the throbbings of the heart, when it first wakes to love, and dreams of a happiness too vast for earth; women, with her beauty, and grace, and gentleness, and fulness of feeling, and depth of affection, and blushes of purity, and the tones and looks which only a mother's heart can inspire; these are all poetical. It is not true that the poet paints a life which does not exist. He only extracts and concentrates, as it were, life's ethereal essence, arrests and condenses its volatile fragrance, brings together its scattered beauties, and prolongs its more refined but evanescent joys. And in this he does well; for it is good to feel that life is not wholly usurped by cares for subsistence and physical gratifications, but admits, in measures which may be indefinitely enlarged, sentiments and delights worthy of a higher being. This power of poetry to refine our views of life and happiness, is more and more needed as society advances. It is needed to withstand the encroachments of heartless and artificial manners, which make civilization so tame and uninteresting. It is needed to counteract the tendency of physical science, which being now sought, not, as formerly, for intellectual gratification, but for multiplying bodily comforts, requires a new development of imagination, taste and poetry, to preserve men from sinking into an earthly, material, epicurean life. Our remarks in vindication of poetry have extended beyond our original design. They have had a higher aim than to assert the dignity of Milton as a poet, and that is, to endear and recommend this divine art to all who reverence and would cultivate and refine their nature."

There is a vein of moral ingenuity and faith running through these, as well as all other essays from the same pen, which constitutes them a mine of instruction to the inexperienced and wavering. By faith we do not wish to be understood the credulity built on hope and imagination, but the faith which arises from a previous conviction of the wisdom and perfection of the moral as well as the physical world, and urges and encourages the mind to a successful investigation of the causes and consequences of those events, that, at a single glance, afflict the casual observer with fear and horror. The misanthropist, the sceptic, and he whose once warm and flowing affections have been frozen in the wintry misery of life, will find a cheerfulness in his confiding views, his simple explanations, his rich and delightful delineations. An instance of his method of extracting the good from the evil things will be discovered in the course of the extract below, which we are unwilling to curtail.

"From this very imperfect view of the qualities of Milton's poetry, we hasten to his great work, Paradise Lost, perhaps the noblest monument of human genius. The two first books, by universal consent, stand pre-eminent in sublimity. Hell and hell's king have a terrible harmony, and dilate into new grandeur and awfulness the longer we contemplate them. From one element, 'solid and liquid fire,' the poet has framed a world of horror and suffering, such as imagination has never traversed. But fiercer flames than those which encompass Satan, burn in his own soul. Revenge, exasperated pride, consuming wrath, ambition, though fallen, yet unconquered by the thunders of the Omnipotent, and grasping still at the empire of the universe—these form a picture more sublime and terrible than hell. Hell yields to the spirit which it imprisons. The intensity of its fires reveals the intenser passions and more vehement will of Satan; and the ruined archangel gathers into himself the sublimity of the scene which surrounds him. This forms the tremendous interest of these wonderful books. We see mind triumphant over the most terrible powers of nature. We see unutterable agony subdued by energy of soul. We have not indeed in Satan those bursts of passion, which rive the soul, as well as shatter the outward frame of Lear. But we have a depth of passion, which only an archangel could manifest. The all-enduring, all-defying pride of Satan, assuming so majestically hell's burning throne, and coveting the diadem, which scorches his thunder-blasted brow, is a creation requiring in its author almost the spiritual energy with which he invests the fallen seraph. Some have doubted whether the moral effect of such delineations of the storms and terrible workings of the soul is good; whether the interest felt in a spirit so transcendently evil as Satan, favours our sympathies with virtue. But our interest fastens, in this and like cases, on what is not evil. We gaze on Satan with an awe not unmixed with mysterious pleasure, as on a miraculous manifestation of the power of mind. What chains us, as with a resistless spell, in such a character, is spiritual might made visible by the racking pains which it overpowers. There is something kindling and ennobling in the consciousness, however awakened, of the energy which resides in mind; and many a virtuous man has borrowed new strength from the force, constancy, and dauntless courage of evil agents.

"Milton's description of Satan attests in various ways the power of his genius. Critics have often observed, that the great difficulty of his work was to reconcile the spiritual properties of his supernatural beings with the human modes of existence which he is obliged to ascribe to them. The difficulty is too great for any genius wholly to overcome, and we must acknowledge that our enthusiasm is in some parts of the poem checked by a feeling of incongruity between the spiritual agent, and his sphere and mode of agency. But we are visited with no such chilling doubts and misgivings in the description of Satan in hell. Imagination has here achieved its highest triumph, in imparting a character of reality and truth to its most daring creations. That world of horrors, though material, is yet so remote from our ordinary nature, that a spiritual being, exiled from heaven, finds there an appropriate home. There is, too, an indefiniteness in the description of Satan's person, which excites without shocking the imagination, and aids us to combine in our conception of him the massiness of a real form with the vagueness of spiritual existence. To the production of this effect, much depends on the first impression given by the poet; for this is apt to follow us through the whole work; and here we think Milton eminently successful. The first glimpse of Satan's form is given us in the following lines, which, whilst too indefinite to provoke the scrutiny of the reason, fill the imagination of the reader with a form which can hardly be effaced.

"Thus Satan, talking to his nearest mate
With head uplift above the wave, and eyes
That sparkling blazed, his other parts besides
Prone on the flood, extended long and large,
Lay floating many a rood."

"Forthwith upright he rears from off the pool
His mighty stature; on each hand the flames,
Driven backward, slope their pointing spires, and rolled
In billows, leave 'th midst a horrid vale."

"We have more which we would gladly say of the delineation of Satan; especially of the glimpses which are now and then given of his deep anguish and despair, and of the touches of better feeling which are skilfully thrown into the dark picture, both suited and designed to blend with our admiration, dread and abhorrence, a measure of that sympathy and interest with which every living, thinking being ought to be regarded, and without which all other feelings tend to sin and pain. But there is another topic which we cannot leave untouched. From hell we flee to paradise, a region as lovely as hell is terrible, and which to those who do not know the universality of true genius, will appear doubly wonderful when considered as the creation of the same mind, which had painted the infernal world.

"Paradise and its inhabitants are in sweet accordance, and together form a scene of tranquil bliss, which calms and soothes, whilst it delights the imagination. Adam and Eve, just moulded by the hand and quickened by the breath of God, reflect in their countenances and forms, as well as minds, the intelligence, benignity, and happiness of their Author. Their new existence has the freshness and peacefulness of the dewy morning. Their souls, unsated and untainted, find an innocent joy in the youthful creation, which spreads and smiles around them. Their mutual love is deep, for it is the love of young, unworn, unexhausted hearts, which meet in each other the only human objects on whom to pour forth their fulness of affection; and still it is serene, for it is the love of happy beings, who know not suffering even by name, whose innocence excludes not only the tumults but the thought of jealousy and pain, who, 'imparadised in one another's arms,' scarce dream of futurity, so blessed is their present being. We will not say that we envy our first parents, for we feel that there may be higher happiness than theirs, a happiness won through struggle with inward and outward foes, the happiness of power and moral victory, the happiness of disinterested sacrifices and wide-spread love, the happiness of boundless hope, and of 'thoughts which wander through eternity.' Still there are times, when the spirit, oppressed with pain, worn with toil, tired of tumult, sick at the sight of guilt, wounded in its love, baffled in its hope, and trembling in its faith, almost longs for the 'wings of a dove, that it might fly away' and take refuge amidst the 'shady bowers,' the 'vernal airs,' the 'roses without thorns,' the quiet, the beauty, the loveliness of Eden. It is the contrast of this deep peace of paradise with the storms of life, which gives to the fourth and fifth books of this poem a charm so irresistible, that not a few would sooner relinquish the two first books, with all their sublimity, than part with these."

This article has occupied so much more room than we anticipated, that we are compelled to defer the remainder till the next impression.

Journal of the Proceedings of the Literary and Scientific Convention held in New-York, October, 1830.

What tends, in the remotest degree, to elevate the literary character of New-York, should be regarded with interest and favour. Surpassing all other cities of the Union, in the extent, the enterprise, and the general intelligence of her population, this city is still far behind several of them in reputation for letters and science. Not that she may not claim amongst her sons the very brightest names which adorn our native literature—not that she does not possess capacity and talent sufficient to advance claims to pre-eminence in every department of elegant or useful knowledge: but this capacity and talent are still latent—they are insulated, and require a field for concentrated effort, which has not yet been opened to their ambition. The direction hitherto given to mind in this thriving and commercial metropolis, has not been calculated to develop the loftier faculties of the intellect, or to cherish a love for the fine arts. In this respect, New-York particularly represents the situation of the country at large—her character is, as yet, undecided. All the elements of greatness abound in her—all the treasures of moral and mental excellence lie profusely scattered around her soil. They require only assimilation and combination to be brought into action. Her sister cities, which rival, and as yet, excel her in their literary pretensions, owe their supremacy, not to any inherent superiority on their part, or to any deficiency on hers. They are indebted for it solely to the character of their first founders, which gave a fixed and permanent direction to all their pursuits and habits; more especially to those connected with the cultivation of knowledge. Thus Philadelphia, owing her origin and establishment to the institutions of William Penn, and his humane and enlightened followers, received, and has preserved a uniformity of action, which has enabled her to make sure and decisive, if not, very rapid strides in intellectual advancement. Boston, again, the cradle of American liberties, was also, from the very day of her foundation, the abiding place of the most indefatigable and acute cultivators of all the arts and sciences connected with the moral and political improvement of the human race. Not so New-York. Frequently changing masters, and possessing unrivalled advantages for successful commercial speculations, which rendered her, at a very early period of her history, the great focus of attraction for emigration, her population has ever been variable and heterogeneous, and has wanted therefore that concert of impulse which has been the main cause of the great success of her neighbours. Hence, she maintains pretty much the same relation to them, as the United States do to older countries; and the same circumstances are daily operating to change the nature and the bearings of both.

As new generations spring up, identified with the soil they inhabit, a local spirit will be engendered, and the extent of extraneous interference will become diminished, until it no longer will have a tendency to interrupt the general uniformity and harmony. Already do we see the dawns of this spirit unfolded, and happy shall we be, if those who are engaged in the project of founding a university here, should be actuated by its aspirations. In thus contending in favour of the establishment of a local feeling, we do not refer to that contracted jealousy and petty envy, which have disgraced some of the most distinguished writers of other cities. We desire to see a noble competition for literary pre-eminence, a generous ardor to excel by positive merit, not by paltry depreciation or affected contempt of all rival efforts. These desirable objects cannot be better attained, than by occasional assemblages of the literary and scientific men of the different sections of the country, in which contending claims may be discussed with candour and freedom, important discoveries elicited and communicated, and a liberal feeling of friendly though lively emulation, created and fostered. Such undoubtedly was the aim and end of the convention, the proceedings of which are detailed in the very neatly executed octavo whose title precedes this article. How far the distinguished individuals who participated in its deliberations, have succeeded in accomplishing this object, we shall not now stop to inquire. Cavils and objections without number have been raised against the supposed trivialness of many of the subjects proposed for discussion, and the entire failure of the convention in eliciting any profound discovery, or establishing any one important principle. But this censure, even if well founded, is wholly premature. The labour has just been commenced; the foundation-stone has alone been laid. To decide on the nature of the superstructure, or to check its rise by interposing obstacles, is unfair, is unjust. For our part, we look forward with bright anticipations to the future, and place great reliance on the zeal and on the good sense, as well as on the talent and the learning, which are engaged in the cause. Great impartiality and wisdom will be required to complete the arduous task which they have begun; great sacrifices of prejudices and opinions long cherished; and many of them identified, perhaps, with supposed immutable truths. Of these, we could point out several, which have been suggested by perusing the interesting pages before us. But we reserve our remarks for separate articles on each in future numbers. In the meantime, we shall close with expressing our best wishes for the success of the important experiments undertaken by the members, to elicit intellectual truth as connected with the great subject of the education and moral improvement of our country.

Thoughts on Penitentiaries and Prison Discipline. By M. Carey, &c. Philadelphia, 1830.

Our indefatigable philanthropist, Matthew Carey, is not idle. The rigid frost of winter, instead of benumbing his active faculties, seems verily to call them the more vividly into play. And the same active intelligence, and zeal to promote the public good, still animate all his efforts and recommend them to the unanimous and prompt attention of his fellow-citizens. The subject of the present pamphlet is connected with some of the vital interests of society, and is treated in the author's usual ingenuous and plain style. Our limits forbid us to notice it further at the present time.

The Young Reader. By the Rev. John Pierpont. Boston: Richardson, Lord, and Holbrook, 1830.

This work, as its name purports, is intended to furnish reading exercises for pupils in academies. It is one of a series which consists of four volumes. The design of selecting from the large and varied stock which the press has already sent forth, a certain class of compositions adapted to the capacity and taste of the youthful mind, and yet calculated to expand and elevate it, has been frequently adopted by others; but few have been so completely successful as the Rev. John Pierpont, the editor of the "Introduction," the "National Reader," the "First Class Book," and that which is the subject of these remarks. No individual is more generally known as possessing all the qualifications necessary for the task. The "Young Reader" is the best of the series.

We have read with much attention the second volume of Moore's Life of Byron, but must defer a notice of it until a future number.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

THE MALAPROPOS.

THERE are some people who have a most unhappy knack at doing and saying things out of time and place. The more they try to avoid this, the more they run their heads into the fire; just as persons with an impediment in their speech stutter the more from their anxiety to pronounce some particular word correctly.

Frank Henley was one of these. He was the best natured fellow in the world, yet was continually wounding the feelings of others unintentionally. His life was one infinite series of blunders of this kind. It began at school, and ended only with the last act of his life. The schoolmaster was a little hump-backed man, and consequently as irritable as a crab. One day, being called upon for a definition of deformity, Frank, after considerable cogitation, pronounced it to be a hump on the back. This raised a laugh among the rest of the scholars. The pedagogue was convinced in his own little mind that our hero meant to insult him, and the consequence was, that Frank became the residuary legatee of all the unclaimed transgressions of the school. The poor lad, who saw from the laugh of the scholars where his definition of deformity had lighted, was so anxious ever after to avoid a similar offence, that he never came to that word without involuntarily raising his eyes, and looking fearfully at the hump on the schoolmaster's back. This cost him much tribulation and many a flogging. By some mysterious operation of sympathy, originating in his almost perpetual horror of giving offence to the little man's hump, his own back actually began to exhibit a protuberance somewhat similar to that of the schoolmaster, who observing it, thought to himself that Frank was making a mockery of him for flogging him so often without reason, whereupon he was exceedingly wroth, and flogged him more than ever.

At last Frank took the opportunity of a holiday to complain to his guardian of the tyranny of this little hump-backed pedagogue. He thought he would philosophize a little on the occasion.

"He is very cross," said he to the worthy old gentleman, his guardian, "he's very cross; but I suppose he can't help it, for it is observed by several learned philosophers that all deformed people are more or less irritable and capricious."

His guardian happened to have one leg shorter than the other—"It is, is it?" said he, in answer to Master Frank's wise observation; "then pray go back to school again, and don't let me hear any more of your foolish complaints. Irritable and capricious, indeed!" Frank got no spending-money this time. So much for his philosophy.

Suffering thus from the instrumentality of the hump, it at length became inseparably connected in his mind with the sense of his sufferings, and continually occupied his imagination. He could not keep clear of it for the life of him, and ran foul of it in some way or other ten times a day. As his offences increased so did the floggings. Frank could stand it no longer.

He complained to the wife of his guardian, a lady somewhat stricken in years, but fond of dress; and still remembering, with great tenacity, that she had been a great beauty some twenty years ago.

"He is the most testy, cross-grained little man I ever saw," said Frank; "he's as irritable as—as an old belle who has outlived her beauty, and yet expects to be admired as much as ever."

"He is, is he?" quoth the good lady; "then all I have to say is, that you may as well make the best of it, for I promise you I shan't interfere. An old belle, indeed—marry-come-up!"

Master Frank got none of the good things of the closet this time. So much for his comparison.

But all things must have an end. "'Tis a very long lane that never has a turning." It was time to send Frank to college, and to college he went. One of the leading professors was a great mathematician, and as proud as Lucifer of his talent. He held all sciences in profound contempt except the exact sciences, and especially undervalued the fine arts and the belles-lettres. The forte of our hero lay in these latter.

"A picture, a statue, or a sublime description proves nothing," said the professor of mathematics.

This was too capital an opportunity for a touch of the malapropos to escape our hero, who answered with all the simplicity of a child,

"Very true, Mr. Rectangle; but I have frequently heard it remarked, that men who believe in nothing but demonstrations are apt to have a confused understanding of every thing except that two and two make four."

"You have, have you?" said the professor of mathematics; and from that time he laid such a load of demonstrations on the back of our hero, that he pretty nearly converted him into a segment of a circle, he so crouched under the weight he carried. In short he became gradually so befuddled with calculations, that he at length demonstrated himself to the tail of the class.

"You are a blockhead and no mathematician," said the professor.

"A man may know nothing of mathematics, and a great deal of other things; and he may be a great mathematician, and yet ignorant of every thing else."

This was said by our hero, without the remotest preconception that he was striking the professor of mathematics right on the head. It was the very perfection of the malapropos, and he was rewarded accordingly by tasks that would have puzzled a Bowditch or a Hassler.

"How could you talk so?" said the professor of humanity, who had taken a great liking to Frank ever since he heard that he preferred classical literature to mathematics.

"But never mind what that old calculator says; languages, languages, and classical literature, are the only studies for a gentleman."

"I think I have heard it observed by a very wise man," said Frank, "that to talk in a different language was nothing more than serving up the same old sauces in a new dish."

"Procul O! procul esto profani!" said the professor of humanity turning his back for ever on our unfortunate hero. Thus he got between two fires, and what with the exact sciences and humanity, had a tolerably pretty time of it.

"Another malapropos!" said Frank, in despair.

In this way he managed with most consummate good fortune, to make an enemy of almost every man, woman, or student with whom he came in contact. If they had any special fault, foible, or deformity, he was sure to run a pin into it, and make them wince. He was perpetually led by his devotion to the malapropos into a succession of quarrels with his fellow-students, and suffered divers ily oppressions from the professors. He left college with an indifferent reputation in his studies, though one of the best scholars in his class; and with the character of a malignant cynic, who delighted in hurting the feelings of others, when we pledge our word he was one of the very best-natured young fellows in the world.

"This malapropos will be the ruin of me!" said our unfortunate hero, as he turned his face towards home, as he was accustomed to call the house of his guardian.

That worthy gentleman and his lady had neither of them got over the recollection of his wise observations concerning the irritability of deformed people, and elderly belles who are not so much admired as they ought to be. They did exactly as people generally do in similar cases: they resolved to prove the truth of his observations, by being as cross as possible, instead of proving him wrong by kindness and forbearance. Our unlucky youth in the meantime took special care not to run against any of their weak points, and the consequence was, that he became ten times more malapropos than ever. He swore to himself he would never, while in the presence of his guardian or his lady, make the remotest allusion either to deformed irritable people, or ill-natured superannuated beauties. Possibly he might have kept his resolution had he not chanced to meet with a caricature of a man, having two very dissimilar legs, with "paired not matched," for the motto. He was so tickled with the humour of this, that he could not for the life of him resist the inclination to purchase, and carry it home as a peace-offering to his guardian.

"He'll be delighted with it," quoth friend Frank.

"I understand you, sir," cried the old gentleman in a towering passion, "I understand you, sir; you have been caricaturing me; you have got me stuck up in the print-shops—you've made me the laughing-stock of the town. Quit my house, sir, and never let me see your face again. 'Paired not matched,' indeed!" and he looked down at his legs, and became more angry than ever.

Frank assured him solemnly that the caricature was not intended for him, nor like him, nor ascribed to him by any human being. The old gentleman at last recalled his sentence of banishment; but whether in virtue of our hero's protestations, or prompted by his recollecting that if he turned Frank out of doors he would be obliged to settle his accounts, and pay over his fortune, is doubtful. Frank threw the caricature into the fire, and his peace was made.

That very day his lady guardianship received a number of visitors.

"How I hate a pug nose!" exclaimed our hero, on the disappearance of one of the female visitors, who had an appendage of that sort.

This was said in the presence of his guardian's wife, who had a nose nearly allied to the family of the pugs, and it turned blue on the occasion. She had not the least doubt but that Frank intended to mortify her.

"Ungrateful brute!" she exclaimed, as she flung out of the room, "like Niobe, all tears."

The old gentleman was fifteen years on the wrong side of the lady, and consequently completely under her influence. The order of wisdom is entirely reversed in matrimony, where the youngest is always considered the wisest, and probably with some reason. A young lady, who marries a rich, old husband, has generally the more discretion of the two.

The lady took a violent dislike to Frank, and managed so adroitly, by continually entrapping him in the malapropos, that she at length got the better of her husband's antipathy to settling accounts and paying over balances. Accordingly, the guardian parted with Frank on very ill terms, and thus our hero was set adrift in the world, because he disliked a pug nose, and had not the discretion to keep his opinion to himself.

He had now the world before, behind, and all around him. The first thing a young fellow, with money, thinks of is spending it, which is the easiest and most pleasing affair imaginable. He went to town, and became a great beau among the ladies. Being rich and well looking, he might have become a favourite, and revelled in the smiles of beauty, had it not been for his old enemy, the malapropos, which beset him at every step.

He got acquainted with Miss Terentia Tattle, a distinguished azure, who paid him particular attention, partly because he paid such particular attention to what she said. One fatal morning, however, he forgot himself, and took occasion, in the presence of the lady, to express his disgust at a female pedant. The learned Terentia never paid him any attentions afterwards, and told every body he was an ill-natured, superficial young man.

He accompanied Miss Caperton to the assembly—Miss Caperton, the famous dancer, who delighted in waltzing, and made a man dizzy to look at her. She had the most beautiful foot and ankle, and where is the use of hiding one's candle under a bushel?

"Don't you think the waltz a most graceful and elegant dance?" asked she, after finishing one of those "circulars," in a style that would have done honour to Madame Ronzi de Vestris.

"Graceful and elegant!" replied Frank, who was so full of the subject that he forgot whom he was addressing—"Graceful and elegant! Vulgar and indecent, would suit it better, in my opinion. The very country bumpkins, in their wildest frolics, don't take such liberties with the girls, as a fine gentleman takes with a fine lady in a waltz. I wonder any delicate, respectable female, will thus degrade herself by submitting in public to the embraces of a stranger."

Miss Caperton had been to Paris, and had nothing to show for it but new dresses and a most approved style of waltzing. She blushed celestial rosy red, but it was a blush of indignant anger—modesty was out of the question with a waltzing lady. When Frank reminded her of an engagement for the next dance, she had forgotten it; and the next time he met her, she had forgotten him!

"What can be the matter with little Caperton?" said Frank to himself. "It must be my old old enemy, the malapropos," and he recollected his fine speech about waltzing, and called himself a great blockhead.

He was introduced at Mrs. Tetotum's, one of the most fashionable houses in town, where he saw a profusion of mirrors, candelabras, gilded furniture, &c. The lady was delighted at being visited by a person who had never beheld all this finery, and expected to see him gaze about in unutterable admiration. He took the first opportunity to descant on the beauties of an elegant simplicity in dress, equipage, furniture, and behaviour. He pronounced it vulgar to encumber a drawing-room with trumpery till it looked like a furnishing warehouse. Mrs. Tetotum was all affection; and her establishment answered the description of our wise hero exactly.

"He means me, the vulgar ill-natured creature!" thought Mrs. Tetotum, and marked him out for proscscription.

"John," said she to the servant, almost before he had shut the door on our hero, "John, shall you know that man when you see him?"

"Yes, madam."

"Well, then never let me see his face in this house again."

Before the expiration of the first winter Frank was deeply in love with Miss Cornelia Spicebird, a very pretty and graceful little creature as ever was seen. Her form was perfect, her complexion beautiful, but she had a large mole on her neck, which contrasted disagreeably with its snowy whiteness. She was pleased with Frank, and her parents liked his fortune, so there was every reason to believe it would be a match ere long. One evening, in a little circle of belles and beaux, they were talking of the fanciful theories concerning these spots and marks as indicating the temper, habits, and future fortunes of people. Frank, as usual, got so deep in the subject that he forgot every thing else.

"Nathaniel Wanley—I think it is he," quoth our hero, "says that a mole on the neck just under the right ear, is a sure sign of a backbiting disposition."

This was precisely the situation of the mole on the snowy neck of the lady of his love; and though he had his eye fixed on the very spot, he had no more idea of any personal application in his speech than the man in the moon. But though he had not, every one else had, and particularly the lady.

"Nathaniel Wanley is a great fool," said she in a passion.

"He's dead," said Frank.

"So much the better," quoth the lady.

"Why so?"

"Because—because he can't tell any more lies about me for you to repeat before my face."

"Heavens!" aspirated our hero, as the whole affair stared him full in the mind's eye; "I've made a pretty piece of business of it. The malapropos has ruined me again!"

His anticipations were soon realized. Miss Spicebird took an early opportunity of apprising him that as she presumed he could have little regard for a "backbiting lady," she begged that in future he would spare himself the trouble of pretending to it.

Shortly after this affair of the mole, Frank fell in company with a young officer of great merit and accomplishments, high-spirited and brave, but of a low parentage. It was generally understood that he was a foundling; certain it is he was particularly sensitive on that point. They were at a dinner party, and some how or other the evil genius of our hero pricked him on to touch the subject he of all others ought to have avoided. We don't recollect exactly how it happened, but so it was; he expressed his astonishment at some lady having married a man similarly circumstanced with the young officer. The rest of the company tried what virtue there was in winks, warnings of the finger, and joggings of the elbows, but the malapropos had got him in its toils. He went on more energetically than before, and finally became, in the opinion of all present, directly personal to the officer, who got up and quietly left the table. There was a dead portentous pause as he retired, and all present anticipated what would follow, except Frank, who wondered at his abrupt departure.

That very evening a gentleman called on him with an invitation to Hoboken, bright and early next morning.

"For what?" asked our hero.

"For insulting him publicly with the misfortune of his birth," said the other.

"Bless me!" exclaimed Frank, "I never thought of him all the time I was talking."

"You will find it difficult to make him or the company believe it. You were highly personal."

"But if I assure him I was not so?"

"He and all the rest will consider it an evasion, and call you a coward."

"O, very well," and he immediately signified his acceptance of the polite invitation which was signed "your most obedient and very humble servant."

The morning was bright and beautiful, and the river reflected in its placid bosom all the charms of heaven and of earth as they glided over to Weehawk, and landed under that awful cliff which has so often been stained with the blood of generous mistaken spirits.

As the parties received their weapons, Frank addressed his antagonist—

"I regret exceedingly, sir—"

"Hush!" whispered his second, who, like most other seconds, was an amateur of fighting, in the second person.

"Hush, it is too late now for apology or explanation."

"O, if that's the case," replied our hero.

The first fire both missed.

"Cannot I explain now?" asked Frank, who had behaved with the most perfect self-possession.

"By no means—you would be disgraced," said the second, who was very zealous for the honour of his friend.

They fired again.

"Alas!" thought poor Frank, as he lay weltering in his blood. "Alas! that a man should die of the malapropos!"

And thus ended the chapter of his blunders.

LETTERS FROM RUSSIA.

SKETCHES OF THE CITY OF ST. PETERSBURG.

Addressed to a gentleman of this city.

NUMBER ELEVEN.

St. Petersburg, 1830.

ARRIVING between the fortress and winter-palace, the broad river divides into the great and little Neva, which, after circling the shores of the Vasili-Ostrov, on either side, for a distance of three or four miles, unite in the gulf below. Not more than a third part of this island, however, is as yet compactly built up, and that part is principally along the right bank of the Great Neva. It consequently faces a long line of the continental quarters of the town, and, with its numerous splendid public buildings, presents a front scarcely inferior, upon the whole, to the court and English quays. The streets here are sufficiently spacious, and run in direct lines from river to river, and from the gulf upwards, intersecting at right angles. Shade trees abound on this side the Neva quite as much as on the other, and a highly rural aspect is found in the Bolshoe, or Great Perspective. Here a wide embankment rises several feet in the middle of the broad street, and a double row of shade trees crown its whole length, making a most grateful and refreshing promenade during the hot days of summer, and leaving sufficient width on both sides for the paved carriage-ways and foot-walks. The houses along this line recede from the street, and are almost hid from view by the thick foliage of their garden-trees and shrubbery, while the box-plant skirts the gravel-walks, and numerous flowers bloom in hillocks raised on the green patches—altogether reminding one of the best parts of Moscow previous to its dreadful conflagration upon being occupied by Napoleon. The private dwellings are not generally as high nor as showy as on the other side of the water; indeed you will see in the rear of the two first ranges along the river some entire squares of wooden tenements of a neat brown colour that were erected as long ago as the time of Peter the Great. Many of the public buildings, however, are equally magnificent, and that to which I shall first direct your attention is the Exchange.

To reach this you will cross the Isaac-bridge, thrown from the square of the same name to the Vasili-Ostrov, and ascending the river to where the two branches separate, you find it occupying the south-east point of the island. A spacious semi-circular area opens in front, bounded by both the Nevas, and on their magnificent granite quays two enormous columns, placed at some distance from each other, rise to a great height, having their circumference adorned with huge sphinxes and other monsters, and surmounted by lanterns that, in case of any alarm in town, are lighted up to give a more rapid intimation of the threatening danger to the citizens. The Exchange was erected at the expense of, and made a present by the emperor to the merchants of the city, and is alike creditable to the taste and liberal feelings of the munificent donor. It is unnecessary for me to describe its architecture, it being in exact imitation of, though probably not as magnificent as, the one in Paris, views of which you have often seen. On either side of this stand the Custom-house and numerous rows of government warehouses, encircling spacious court-yards and vaulted round in the eastern style. With the exception of hemp, flax, tallow, and potash, (which have separate and distinct quarters for their reception and shipment,) all foreign and domestic importations must be stored here till disposed of for exportation or interior consumption. The merchants, therefore, not being allowed the direct care and supervision of their goods, the necessity of private warehouses, as with us, is done away, and each individual holds his counting-room at his own dwelling, no matter how distant the quarter of the city may be in which it happens to be located.

The hours of change are from half-past three till five, and, as most of the bargains and negotiations are then concluded, you will see the open area in front thronged with carriages of every description, from a splendid coach-and-four down to the humble public droshky, and the great hall, occupying nearly the whole interior of the building, equally well crowded by representatives from the four quarters of the globe. This is the only truly busy scene that St. Petersburg presents, or that is at all capable of conveying to the stranger an adequate idea of the extensive commerce she carries on; and it is really cheering to pass from her dull streets and silent chambers into this lively and animated throng. The pasha of Egypt has his agents here, and you will see every shade of countenance and variety of costume assembled, from Chinese Tartary, on the east, across the wide Atlantic to North America, on the west. The great bankers and merchants of the first guild have each their particular stands at the head of some one of the double rows of seats that are placed at convenient distances over the floor, for the accommodation of those who are weary of standing. Here the principal remains bolt-upright, with his junior partners or confidential clerks on the right and left, giving first one ear and then the other, and sometimes both, to the numerous brokers that dexterously and rapidly thread their way through the dense crowd from stand to stand, addressing a short query, and nodding an affirmative to one or shaking a negative to another, while the great mass of individuals are moving more leisurely to and fro, like the waves of a subsiding sea, and discussing their affairs in their own, or some one of the foreign languages they may have acquired for their interest and convenience.

The produce of the empire comes down the Neva in flats and arks, similar to those you have seen on our western waters; with the difference of their being roofed in by slanting poles, covered by mats woven from the bark of the linden tree. The master and his servants, and not unfrequently his wife and family, are to be found on board, subsisting on their own provisions, and the milk of a cow or two brought down with them. The produce disposed of, the arks are sold, and broken up for fire-wood; the females, if any, placed upon horses that have accompanied them, and the males, like the backwoods-men of America, before the genius of Fulton had triumphed over her mighty waters, find their way back to their distant homes on foot. I shall not be more particular about business, the details of which are already perfectly familiar to you, but wish you were now here with me for a short half hour, to cross over to a small island in the Little Neva, exclusively occupied by the flax and hemp warehouses. When the flax is completely prepared for market, it is transported from one building up an ascent to another, and here I found two or three hundred government slaves actively engaged, and forming such a scene as I never yet beheld. Each individual was returning for a new load, or staggering along with a huge bundle on his brawny shoulders, and half naked, with long shaggy hair and beard of every different shade, his eyes and features obscured by dust, and covered from the crown of his head to the sole of his feet with locks of tow; every one, too, vociferating in an uncouth jargon at the top of his lungs, so that it seemed as if an assembly of demons had made a tumultuous sortie from the lower regions, and as if Milton's yelping progeny of sin had been in effect let loose upon the world. I was absolutely startled at first, and mingled among these savage figures with a dread of being devoured alive; I, however, found them a very harmless set of mortals, faithfully performing their tasks, and more disposed to caress than injure the visitant, and that their loud vociferations were none other than a call to "give way," "take care," or perhaps a friendly salutation, or cutting joke and repartee.

THE CENSOR.

THE LITTLE GENIUS.

No. 103.

"Who is there without faults? You are constituted frail, and liable to deception. You should expect in all something to censure, which, if you cannot correct, you should endeavour to yield to and endure. But how are your faults to be corrected, since you are continually falling into trifling errors and bad habits, glaring to every eye but your own? True, you have friends; but few are so sincerely and entirely inspired with pure and disinterested feelings of affection as to venture upon such a delicate and dangerous operation, or else they do not possess a discrimination and tenderness of manner sufficiently nice, skilful, and soothing, to inflict what must be a wound, without creating distant coolness, perhaps anger and dislike. No greater proof of fine good sense, and genuine ingenuity and intelligence can be offered than the successful accomplishment of such a task; and when undertaken from pure motives, no higher and more flattering evidence should be required by you of a confidence in the excellence of your heart, and the soundness of your understanding, combined with an affectionate and unalloyed interest in your happiness."

The Genius said these words in a sweet voice, and bade me look in the mirror.

A princely mansion stood upon an eminence on the banks of the Hudson. It was overshadowed by large oaks. A grassy lawn inclined gradually towards the shore. The garden in front of the house was in the full luxuriance of summer, and betrayed all the lovely and lavish profusion of nature, arranged by the skill and taste of the wealthy owner, so as to enhance its beauties. It was a bright, still, rich morning. Two persons were seen passing over the level gravelled walk, which led down to a charming road along the river. They had issued forth to participate in the general gladness of the loveliest of seasons, and to rove through a scene enchantingly picturesque. The sun had just arisen. The sky glowed with a thousand radiant colourings; the dew was sparkling upon the grass and bushes, and hung in trembling drops from the trees; and although a cool and refreshing fragrance made every breath of the balmy morning air invigorating, not a breeze shook the still branches, or ruffled the peaceful bosom of the stream. The water seemed a mirror, the land but the painting of some potent artist, such a quiet character of loveliness overspread it. It was an hour when the better feelings unfold themselves; when the chilling, corrupting influences of life fling neither shadow nor restraint over the operations of the heart. The youth was noble in his personal appearance. A girl, young, lovely, all expression in features, elegance in motion, all enthusiasm and purity in feeling, hung on his arm. Who could not discover what deep joy they found in each other's society?

"I know," she said, "I am unworthy your love. My faults are many and great. I am thoughtless, quick in anger, and impetuous in action; and I fear there are other defects in my disposition, of which I am not fully aware."

"Dear Fanny," said her companion, in a low voice, but with such a tone as goes to the heart of woman when breathing from such lips as his, "we have all defects in our disposition, but yours I have yet to discover."

"You will discover them," she said, "and when you do, speak to me freely. I am happy in owning a friend bold and sincere enough to correct them."

"Behold," said the Genius, "a gleam of human contentment. They have just exchanged those sentiments which enslave the young and ardent with such deep and precarious bliss. The present is all they feel. Flowers are bursting through the foliage by the wood-side, birds are warbling among the trees, scarcely a cloud varies the blue of heaven, and those which do float upon its azure tide, like the fears in the mind of the maiden, rather beautify than darken it."

Then the bright river vanished with all the sunshiny beauty and luxuriance of the morning; and the same maiden, in the midst of a fashionable party, was sitting at the piano. She ran her fingers over the keys. No one could touch the instrument with more skilful grace and effect. Murmurs of astonishment and admiration were heard. The crowd gathered around. She was the prominent object of praise and attention. Among the rest a soldier—a foreigner of rank—passed the highest encomiums on her performance. His flatteries became pointed, and what can more endanger the uniform, calm, and natural peace of mind in a beautiful girl than music, flattery, and a foreigner of rank? The companion who had walked in the garden, to whom she had pledged her affections, looked with sorrow, not unmingled with disgust, upon such a transformation in her manners. Was she the artless, affectionate, modest, and confiding being who had lately gazed up at him with moistened eyes, and listened to him as he unfolded his thoughts? She, whose voice was now so loud; whose attitudes were all strange to him; who sought to attract the gaze of the multitude; and whose eyes never rested on his, even when by accident they met? Nothing displays a female in a more repulsive manner than affectation. "I will tell her," said the youth, "for I remember her words—'you will discover my faults, and when you do, speak to me freely. I am happy in owning a friend bold and sincere enough to correct them.' They stood together in the dance. He whispered in her ear. The handsome soldier gazed on her even as she turned her beautiful head to listen to a cold lesson of wisdom, thus thrust upon her in a moment of excitement. An expression of anger flashed from her eyes, her red lip curled with an unconcealed feeling of scorn. Before the evening was over her new admirer had preferred his addresses without repulse."

"Even as the glass changes," said the Genius, "years pass away. To us spirits, all the lengthened ages which you mortals deem stupendous, and of which you behold so inconceivably small a part, vanish thus like those still and fleeting shades—but see, the proud beauty betrays the marks of years."

There sat the faded belle—the neglected, wretched wife—the haughty and still handsome face of her husband was frowning upon her; pale with the havoc of passion and irregular habits. He beckoned her sternly to depart, and as she obeyed, he took from his bosom a miniature—a sweet, new face—and pressed it to his lips.

A DINNER IN ICELAND.

THE "Courrier des Etats-Unis" gives the following sketch of a dinner party in that remote corner of the world.

Every person invited to dine at a house for the first time is obliged by etiquette to refuse nothing that is offered him, and to continue to eat long after his appetite is satisfied.  Some travellers, forced to dine with the mayor of the place, tell the story of their entertainment as follows:—It commenced with a soup made of sago, claret, and boiled raisins. Each guest was obliged, by strict good breeding, to devour two plates-full of this mixture. Their host next indicated to them a boiled salmon, cut in slices, swimming in melted butter and oil, and spangled with pepper. This dish was finally achieved, and the dictates of politeness were so far obeyed without causing any alarming revulsion to our travellers. But their stumbling-block was a dish of hard-boiled eggs, served up to each of them—twelve eggs on each plate. Besides there rose in the middle of the table a large dish, filled with cream and sugar, intended as a sauce to the eggs, and of which the guests were to partake plentifully, unless they chose to expose themselves to ridicule. This, it may easily be supposed, was too much, so they requested permission to leave the table and retire. The mayor observed to them, that as it was the first time they had dined with him, he trusted they would have the kindness to finish, with a good grace, the excellent hard-boiled eggs he had prepared for the occasion, giving them to understand, by way of consolation, that at the next invitation they might do as they pleased. He concluded by begging them to excuse him for not being able, on account of his age, to eat as much of all these good things as they would. Our travellers continued to swallow one hard-boiled egg after another till all were finished, which they succeeded in doing only by diluting them plentifully with cream. Next in order came the quarter of a sheep roasted, with boiled sorrel cut up and dressed with sugar—all to be eaten. Afterwards a dish of waffles, each eight inches long, by four broad. "Gentlemen," said the mayor to his guests, "I should be very much pleased to see each of you eat two of these cakes. Don't refuse me this little favour, for which I shall be grateful." After dinner coffee was dealt round, at the rate of four huge dishes per man, then two bowls of punch to each guest, finally six cups a-piece of wretched tea brought up the rear. The coffee was the only good thing in all the entertainment—but then four dishes a-piece!

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

NOTES BY A TRAVELLER.

NUMBER TWO.

Georgia—September—1829.

THE characteristic of a city is formal politeness or cool and elegant impudence; that of the country, ignorance of all etiquette, and honest hospitality. This distinction is not unfavourable to the men. I can easily overlook their want of what citizens call manners, which generally mean nothing. If they are devoid of grace, ceremony, and fashion, you may more confidently depend upon the sincerity of what they say and do. I can admire their homespun coats, their broad brawny hands, their sun-burnt honest faces; and when gazing on one of them, a man, perchance, who will pass away from the earth absolutely unacquainted with its enervating pleasures and splendours, and free from those exciting and corrupting influences which deaden the feelings and warp the principles, I listen with respect to his homely phrases, and feel at once that we are friends. They form the "bone and muscle" of the land, for by them the national character should be estimated, and its safety and permanency guarded and ensured. The accidental distinctions of education lose their importance in my eyes, and I feel their ignorance of them is a misfortune of no very grievous nature. If they are not refined, they are hardy; if not enlightened, they are honest and kind. When I take one of these weather-beaten children of labour by the hand, my heart beats warm with friendship towards him.

During a week's rest at this retired village, I casually mentioned that I had never seen a deer hunt. A party was immediately formed, and the next morning, after an early breakfast, we set out under a perfectly cloudless sky, and through these immense woods, whose dying leaves, betraying the touch of the autumn frosts, covered the whole face of nature as with a mantle of the most brilliant and opposite colours. Here a tree, with foliage of the brightest orange, mingled its branches with one of the deepest gory red, while among the oaks, which displayed all the various shades of the rainbow, here and there towered the erect and lofty pine, with its deep, dark, and unfading green. This tract of land was but a few years ago owned and occupied by the Indians, who, in order to facilitate their hunting by clearing the ground, were accustomed to set on fire what they term the under brush. The pine trees frequently suffer in the operation; and their burnt and blasted stumps are often discerned by the solitary traveller, like the frowning ghosts of that high-spirited and ruined race, lingering among the places hallowed by habit and tradition, where the ashes of their heroic fathers sleep. In the summer they contrast strangely with the bright and tender green, the delicate sweet flowers which spring up around their root, and the fresh and feminine loveliness of the vines, which sometimes cling with living tendrils to their scathed, dead trunks.

At a large and commodious dwelling, although constructed of logs, and by its appearance fully entitled to the appellation of hut, we found a good-natured, hospitable old gentleman, with horns, guns, and hounds. A dozen of the latter were assembled in the road, before the house, fully prepared to enter into the spirit of the sport. No one could comprehend what was going on more clearly than these worthy impatient gentlemen. They were fine animals, with fine names, and in their eagerness and joy frequently drew upon them the rebuke of the old man. Scarcely any brute creature expresses his sensations with more manifest meaning than a dog. Mark some timid, half-starved, and hungry wretch, stealing through the kitchen, and casting wistful looks towards the frying-pan. In a moment of solitude, when the temptation is too powerful for those virtuous principles, which all well-educated, decent dogs should practice, he steals towards some luscious fragrant morsel, his eyes dilate, and he licks his lips with a kind of timid courage, but Dinah enters, and marks the startled cur; and if you wish to see not only expression in countenance, but in every line of the form, just look at him as he describes a circular line of retreat for certain reasons best known to himself, the cook, and the broomstick-handle. Then behold the same creature animated and fearless, when he is where he knows he has a right to be. Music seemed inspired with an irresistible feeling of joy, which fairly overflowed his soul. Azure was chasing Beauty in circles, yet with every mark of affection; Silver lay by resting his noble head upon his two fore feet, in the dignity of grave and pleasing contemplation, occasionally wagging his tail, and brightening up as his longing gaze of gratitude won a word and look from his master; while others rolled, leaped, ran, and at length gave vent to their feelings in a loud prolonged yelp of delight.

"Ill cross it, though it blast me;"

It is necessary that a hunting party should consist of at least six or seven. One or two, termed drivers, with horns, horses, and hounds, ride to the grounds frequented by the deer, and the dogs soon catch the scent. There are certain known passages of the forest through which the timid animals, when affrighted, generally attempt to escape. One individual of the party is stationed at each of these, and in such an opening I found myself, on that bright morning, alone in the midst of these hushed and pathless forests, lurking, I almost thought, like a murderer, with my loaded piece, till the defenceless flying creature should spring upon his death. The silence around me was perfectly delightful. I could hear nothing—not even the warbling of a bird—not the murmuring of a rill, for the stream by my side instead of brawling and bubbling over its channel, had spread itself out into unbroken transparency. Across its bank, and accidentally answering the purposes of a bridge, a fallen tree was lying. Sometimes a playful fish leaped up from the brook, or glistened near the surface, as it turned its silver side to the sun; and sometimes a leaf, loosened from its branch, fell, and floated slowly to the ground in silence. I was thinking how many millions of my fellow-creatures drop off even thus in the shadowy places of life, and go down to the church-yard with as little notice or interruption to the general business and joy and beauty of nature, when the barking and yelping of the hounds came faintly through the distance, then nearer and nearer, till the whole chorus swelled on the breeze, and rung through the quiet woods, breaking strangely in upon its impressive stillness with discordant sounds of riot and death. You cannot conceive, unless you have experienced a similar moment, the almost painful eagerness and anxiety with which I watched to behold the victim appear through the trees. I heard a rustling among the dried leaves, and with desperate speed, with the the whole bloody pack close at her heels, a large doe broke from the thicket, and passed near the place where I stood. Fleet as the wind she was springing by, when I gave a low whistle; on a sudden she stopped, and the fatal ball lodged in her shoulder; another and another stretched her on the ground. She was a most lovely and feminine creature. Nothing could exceed the grace, cleanliness, and beauty of her form and limbs. The dark silky brown of her back, the snowy whiteness of her neck, throat, and chest, and the almost human intelligence of her face, struck me with a strange feeling, of which they, more familiar with the sight, could form no idea. I confess, however unmanly it may have been, that a momentary horror ran through my frame as the lids, with their long lashes, fell over those large, dark, and beautiful eyes. The swarthy huntsman, with rough grasp and merry jokes, bound together her slender tapering limbs, and one drew his long and glittering knife across her throat. These thoughts, however, are very unworldly, and when the diab of venison made its appearance, I forgot the tenderness of the beautiful eyes, and acknowledged the wisdom of that old and excellent proverb "every thing is for the best." THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

AFTER five months of active rehearsal, (and the manager himself alone can say how many more of passive preparation,) the opera of Cinderella was produced on Monday evening last, with the most brilliant success. It is a beautiful piece, admirably put together, with light and amusing dialogue, and containing music of most exquisite sweetness. The scenery is splendid. The landscape at the commencement, with a lake and island, (the repose and tranquillity of which form a striking contrast with the glittering troop of fairies, grouped on the stage,) seems to us one of the best; but the last scene, a noble hall, the perspective of which is very remarkable, has features of a more imposing description. The transformations are, some of them, clever, and all neat; the finest is decidedly the change of the kitchen into the view of a distant palace and gardens by moonlight, when an old rat becomes a fat, chubby, whiskered coachman, with very little trouble; and divers vermin and reptiles assume the character of bipeds and quadrupeds, adapted to a pumpkin, which is metamorphosed into a splendid car, and transports Cinderella to the mansion of her lover. These amusing incidents are of great service in relieving the piece from sameness, and would by themselves furnish an agreeable entertainment; but the music is the subject on which we feel it our duty to dilate; and, in doing so, we are spared much trouble, from the circumstance that the fairy tale is known to every body.

Mr. Lacy has opened the drama with the accidental separation of a prince from his friends during the chase, and his meeting with the queen of the fairies, who shows him the vision of a lovely female in a fountain, and promises him that if he prefer virtue and poverty to arrogance and wealth, he shall be happy. This vision is attended by a few bars of delightful melody, which the attentive auditor will observe precedes the appearance of Cinderella throughout the whole opera. The prince is then, by the power of the fairy, overcome with drowsiness, and falls asleep on a bank of flowers, where he is found by his followers. This introduces the splendid chorus a-la-chasse, from Gillespie Tell, in which the use of the wind-instruments calls forth the admiration of all professors.

The heroine and her two haughty sisters are then discovered in an apartment of their father's house, where the former is blowing the fire, seated on a low stool, the latter attitudinizing, and complimenting each other before two mirrors.

The terzetto is too well known to require comment. Here Cinderella sings the plaintive strain which is played in the former scene. Then follows the chorus, in which the two sisters give contradictory orders; and, as usual in those quarrelling Italian pieces, it ends in a general row, which was admirably wrought up. The prince then makes his appearance in disguise, is slighted by the baron and the two ladies, and of course falls in love with poor Cinderella. After this the fairy tale is minutely adhered to, and the denouement touching the glass-slipper concludes the piece.

In the first act the charming duet between the prince and Cinderella was given with a correctness and simultaneous effect, very superior to that produced on the Italian representation in this city, for Mr. Jones is an excellent musician, and sang admirably. Mr. Milon was no support to Madame Malibran; although a master of the science of music, he was a miserable vocalist. The finale to the first act was executed with astonishing precision; it is, indeed, one of Rossini's best efforts. In the second act the buffo duet, "Un Segreto," lost nothing by comparison with the Italian, for Placide sang every note, and acted incomparably better than Rosich, who carried it through by grimace alone. In the third act Mr. Jones and Mrs. Austin had a most difficult duet, from Gillespie Tell, and it was evident that a perfect understanding existed between them as to style, which is most essential to the success of all concerted music. The famed Tyrolienne air, with variations, glee, and chorus, (also from the opera just quoted,) were brilliantly executed by Mrs. Austin, supported by Jones and Richings. A chorus, from Maometto Secondo, likewise, with a solo, by Jones, were very striking. The finale to the piece is probably the most difficult morceau of all, and one of the most effective.

In conclusion we have no hesitation in stating that, out of London, so perfect an opera cannot be produced in any part of the British dominions; and Mr. Simpson deserves the highest commendation for preparing such an entertainment for the American public.

The curtain fell amidst cheers from all parts of the house; and Mr. Barry waited some time before he could be heard, in announcing the opera for a repetition. We cannot close this article without bestowing well-deserved praise on the effective state of the band, the care and attention of the leader, as well as the correctness and power of the chorus. For the principals, Mr. Jones really acted very creditably; but, in his singing, he stands far above Mr. Pearman, and every other English vocalist we have heard. His improvement, in all respects, is very great. When we state that Cinderella, which universally attracted houses of the most fashionable description in England last season, is now laid aside, because Miss Paton demands exorbitant terms, and no one else there can fill her situation, we pass a compliment on Mrs. Austin which she fully merits. The decided success of this opera here undoubtedly must be ascribed to her. The more Mr. Placide is heard in opera, the more he rises in our estimation. Mr. Thorne was extremely useful. Mrs. Blake and Mrs. Vernon really struggled through their difficult music in a very creditable manner; and, in acting, they were all we could desire. We may add, that they are better fitted to sustain Mesdames Clarinda and Thibet than any other two ladies in America. Mr. T. Placide surprised us by his dryness and drollery, as a stupid servant, a part quite worthy of Barnes.

TANCRED, KING OF SICILY.

This tragedy, by Mr. Stone, is highly praised in the Boston papers. Having neither seen it performed nor read the manuscript, we can, of course, only echo the opinions of others. The piece appears to be in the Metamora style, full of dramatic incident. It is said to contain "a little bombast on a small scale," but for this the public have to thank themselves. An author writes for effect, and, in introducing occasional instances of pomposity, he obtains the species of advantage which an intelligent actor acquires by bursting forth into a boisterous passion, and ranting through some scene which true taste requires to be more quietly delineated, for the purpose of eliciting applause. When the audience begin to discriminate between chaste acting and writing and that tumid and unnatural style of declamation and pathos in composition, which are now received with acclamation, then truth and nature in author and player will be studied and practised. Mrs. Barnes has appeared in Olympia, the Greek girl, with ecclat. A writer in the Boston Galaxy says, "she does all for the character that Forrest does for Metamora, and that, in her hands, it almost monopolizes the interest of the play." Mr. Stone's tragedies elicit much approbation and censure. They deserve both; but this class of writing is so new among us that the first attempts should not be regarded with too much severity. If they be unworthy support, the best method of at once proving and correcting the error, is for some of the critics to produce better ones. Every man of sense at this day, admits that there is no want of talent among us, but only of causes by which talent is attracted to flow in this channel. As soon as play-writing becomes a profitable business, and really from Mr. Stone's experiments the period seems to have arrived, we shall not want Shiel, Knowles, and Poole, (musical names by the way,) however sparingly Shakspeares may be bestowed upon us.

ANOTHER TRAGEDY.

Tragedies are springing up every where around us. Wyoming, a tragedy by Dr. M'Henry, is advertised for performance at the Arch-street theatre, Philadelphia. It is founded on the massacre at Wyoming, and Brandt, an Indian marauder, is the principle character. Among so many dramatic productions, it is to be hoped some may prove worthy of preservation.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Newspaper poetry.—A good prose article, when original, is always preferred for the Mirror to those which have appeared in other journals. In regard to poetry a different plan is pursued. The public can get along without it, and would prefer to do so, unless they can obtain the best. Among the effusions which float about society in the shape of newspaper poetry, there are, occasionally, found verses of value, and we sometimes copy the best of them, that they may be preserved in a safer and more attractive form than the columns of journals of which few keep regular files. The following is extracted from the American. The stanzas are musical and very pretty. A gleam of true poetry pervades the whole production.

MY CHOICE.

There is a light within her eye, that fires every gaze,
And a rosy smile upon her lip that a joyous heart betrays:
And a fairy frolic in her form, that makes each motion seem
As graceful as the bounding course of a laughing mountain stream.

The long and jetty lash that hides the deep eye's blacker hue—
The rival roses in her cheek, her white brow's veins of blue,
Her gentle and her joyous laugh, and the music of her voice,
Have won my spirit unto her, and she shall be my choice.

Her spirit is all gentleness, and yet her bearing high,
And passionate thoughts sleep sweetly in the circle of her eye;
A pride as pure as delicate seems in her breast to dwell,
And breathes around her form the charm and magic of a spell.

So gentle, not a shaft of wit in malice does she dip,
And satire's self comes smiling and sweetly from her lip;
And her look and tone, whenever I meet, they make my heart rejoice,
And win my spirit unto her, and she shall be my choice.

There may be eyes as deeply dark, and brows as lofty too,
And cheeks as softly blended, and as beautiful of hue;
And gentle hearts, with gentle thoughts, and gentleness of words;
And voices like to hers, that mock the music of spring-birds.

I think there may be such, and yet I scarcely can say why
They passed by me, as in a dream they pass me idly by—
But she can wield me with a word, one tone of her soft low voice—
She hath won my proud soul unto her, and she shall be my choice.

The following, particularly the second and last verses, discover the touch of the master, and possess too much genuine poetic imagination to go down into those "deep waters," among the "dark and shapeless" images of one thousand eight hundred and thirty.

THE PARTED YEAR.

I stood upon the sunless shore
Beside oblivion's sea,
And saw its sluggish waves break o'er
The by-gone yesterday—
The last of the departed year
Join in the lapse of time's career,
The past eternity.

It was a melancholy sight
To see it part from day,
And dim among the depths of night
Fade with its dreams away;
And dark and shapeless with it go
A thousand hopes once rich in glow,
Born in its hour's decay.

A cold thrill to my feeling taught
How much there was of mine
Gone with that year of perished thought,
And ill-delayed design.
A part, too, of the vital gleam
Quenched beneath time's incessant stream,
A march towards decline.

From out those waves no palmy isle
Uphears its sunny head,
Where shipwreck hope may light her smile,
Boundless, and drear, and dread,
The billows break without a roar.
"Nameless is stamped upon the shore,"
And "death"—there all is dead.

And love turns trembling from the sight
Hiding his face with fear;
And beauty shrinks in pale affright,
And fame stands silent near,
And glory's laurels shrink and die,
Changeless alone one brow and eye,
But they are of despair.

All watch the last skirts of the year—
The wreck of minutes done,
In those deep waters disappear
For ever from the sun;
Leaving a dread tranquillity,
As when a mighty ship at sea
Has just gone wildly down.

Colley Cibber.—From the occasional perusal of the pieces published in the Philadelphia "Chronicle" under the signature of "Colley Cibber," discussing the claims of various actors to reputation, we were induced to term him in a late number "one of the best and severest of the dramatic critics in the country." In a subsequent article, however, from the same writer there are advanced various assertions, the truth of which we by no means subscribe. This is a mistake. Young Kean is a promising actor; his advantages of early education both in general subjects, possessed by very few actors, and practice will open him into extraordinary talents. One of the severest upon some one whose method of rendering dramatic characters is their principal object, to guide the public taste and instruct the actor himself touching his faults, is thereby defeated.

THE HARP THAT ONCE THROUGH TARA'S HALLS.

WRITTEN BY THOMAS MOORE, ESQ.

Slow.

The harp that once thro' Ta-ra's halls, The soul of mu-sic shed, Now hangs as mute on Ta-ra's walls, As if that soul were fled: So sleeps the pride of for-mer days, So glo-ry's thrill is o'er, And hearts, that once beat high for praise, Now feel that pulse no more.

2d.—No more to chiefs and ladies bright, The harp of Tara swells; The chord, alone, that breaks at night, Its tale of ruin tells: Thus freedom now so seldom wakes, The only throb she gives, Is when some heart indignant breaks, To show that still she lives!

SCRAPS FROM MY COMMON-PLACE BOOK.

NUMBER II.

SCENIC representations were first introduced into the city of Rome, on occasion of a pestilence, by way of expiation. The performers came from Etruria, and were called histriones, from hister, which, in the Tuscan language, signifies a player. Hence the denomination of "the histrionic art." These performances were at first mere medleys, composed of a variety of parts, and it was not until the year of the city 522, that Livius Andronicus, a freedman, produced the first regular drama on the Roman stage. It was then the practice for the author to perform his own piece; but Livius having broken his voice by too much exertion, obtained leave from the audience to make use of a boy as a chanter. The boy, standing in front of the music, and keeping time with it, recited the compositions of the poet, who accompanied him with corresponding gesticulations. This practice obtained afterwards at Rome, until at length the passion of that people for gesticulation, produced the pantomime, which consisted wholly of action. Neither the Romans, nor their successors, the Italians, ever excelled in the dramatic art. Roscius, of whom so much is said, and so little known, is the only actor on record of distinguished fame. Cicero has immortalized him. Of the Roman tragedies, little can be said; and the comedies of Plautus and Terence are far below those of Aristophanes. There are but three or four good comedies in modern Italian literature; the best is by the famous Machiavel, one of the finest geniuses Italy ever produced. Goldoni, a Venetian has written many popular pieces, which, however, would not suit the taste of a refined and intellectual audience. Music has swallowed up every thing in Italy, and opera and pantomime superseded the manly legitimate drama. Alfieri has written worthy of antiquity; but his tragedies are read, not acted. The Italians would rather listen to fiddlers, and sopranos, and see opera-dancers. Can such a people expect to be free?

The worst government in the world is one which practises every species of extortion and monopoly under the mask of liberty. The corruptions of a free government are worse than the most inflexible despotism.

The best government in the world is that where the labourers receive high wages, and the public officers low salaries.

The muses were invoked throughout all Greece, but no sacrifices offered to them; as if to indicate that gifts could not conciliate them, or purchase the sacred spark of genius.

No two races on the face of the earth ever differed more than the Indians of North and South America. The former are among the most intractable of the human species; the latter, except in their sacrifice of human victims to their gods, appear to have been the most mild, indolent, and easy-tempered of all mankind. The Spanish writers, one and all, with the exception of Las Casas, represent them as the most stupid and unenlightened beings in existence, but one remove from the animals of the field. Don Antonio de Ulloa, after indulging himself in a variety of invectives against this harmless race, proceeds to give the following picture, which it will be observed exactly describes a nation of philosophers. "Nothing," he says, "disturbs the tranquillity of their souls, equally insensible to disasters and prosperity. Though half naked, they are as contented as a monarch on his splendid throne; riches do not elate them in the smallest degree, and the authority of dignities, to which they are permitted to aspire, is one so little the object of their ambition, that an Indian will receive with the same indifference the office of a judge or that of a hangman, if deprived of the former and appointed to the latter. Nothing can move or change them. Interest has no power over them; and they often refuse to perform a small service for a sum of money, pointing to their mouths and saying they are not hungry. Fear makes no impression on them, respect as little."

The practice of taking profiles originated with Philip of Macedon, who had but one eye.

Diogenes Laertius in his lives of the ancient philosophers says that Thales maintained inanimate objects possessed souls, instancing the magnet as furnishing a proof of this theory.

Men in general do not distinguish properly between dissimulation and hypocrisy. The former consists in disguising what we are, the latter in pretending to be what we are not. The first is often necessary in the common affairs of life, the latter is always contemptible and wicked.

A man was indicted for felony in stealing a book, but obtained his acquittal by pleading that it was nothing but plagiarism.

The happiness of mind can be nothing but knowledge.

A rogue being indicted for stealing a man's hat off his head, confessed the fact; but insisted that the hat was not the property of the person who wore it, according to the maxim Quæ supra nos nihil ad nos—"the things above us are nothing to us."

We talk of the extravagance of modern ladies; Herodotus says that the revenues of Anthylla, in Egypt, a city of considerable magnitude, were always given to the wife of the governor for her expenses in shoes.

Gaffarel mentions a person who was born with the figure of a fish on his leg, drawn with such perfection as to resemble the work of a master. This fish, whenever the person ate any of his species, put him in terrible pain.

Augustus Cæsar was born with his body spotted with moles. Those on his breast were so disposed as exactly to represent the constellation of the great bear.

Those who maintain their disciples, will never want converts.

There were no less than three hundred different opinions among the ancient philosophers respecting what constituted the summum bonum, or chief good.

In Egypt a physician, according to Herodotus, never attempted the cure of but one malady. Every disease had its especial doctor, who devoted himself to that alone. What a contrast to our "universal doctors!" In China a physician receives no fee until the patient is cured. If such a rule were followed here, how many of our doctors would be out of the hospital in a few years?

One would suppose that bigamy might have escaped the lash of the law, since it is a crime that always carries its own punishment with it.

It was said of a rich miser that he died in great want—the want of more money.

In the year of Rome 695, the Roman senate decreed that Ptolemy, King of Cyprus, should be publicly sold as a slave habited in his royal robes.

Bellerophon is said to have overcome the monster Chimera by the aid of the winged horse Pegasus. Perhaps he be-rhymed him to death.

The Abbe Mariti in his travels through Egypt, Palestine, and Cyprus, gives us the origin of the phoenix. He says the palm tree, from its superior beauty and usefulness, is called the phoenix, and that when they cut down one of these they burn the stump, from the ashes of which arises a vigorous young shoot.

Mycon, a young man of Athens, was changed into a puppy by Ceres. Quere—was he the first dandy?

Next to the love of those I love, I prize
The hatred of the wretches I despise.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

A SKETCH.

'Twas a bright moment!—Mirth play'd in the eye,
And filled each breast—and dwelt on every tongue;
For there the young and beautiful were met,
Whose gladsome hearts had never known a pang.
Fashion was there, in richest garb, and wealth;
And wit, inspired by gaiety and smiles,
Flowed sparkling forth. Pleasure triumphant reigned,
And every bosom glow'd beneath her power.

Not every bosom—no! for one was there
To which that giddy scene conveyed no joy;
The bleeding heart finds not relief in mirth,
And hers had felt a wound which could not heal.
Far from the thoughtless throng removed she sat,
Alone and friendless. The deep trace of time
And sorrow was upon her brow. Her breast
Had known the charm of summer—but, alas!
Winter had come that ne'er should have a spring.
Life has one spring—and only one—and hers
Had pass'd for ever; it had borne one hope,
The brightest—dearest—loveliest of earth;
But, almost at its birth, it died! and now
She lived to bathe its wither'd bud with tears.

Unseen I gazed upon that lonely one—
Her eye had lost its brightness—and her cheek
Was pale with grief—mirth dared not venture there.
She look'd on those around her—and if once
She caught a glance from others—she would strive
To smile, lest her sad looks might mar their joy;
But the strong effort only served to prove
How kind, yet truly wretched, was her heart.
It fail'd and left a look of such deep woe,
That in my very soul I pitied her.
She could not smile! true, smiles by no means show
The bosom happy, or the mind at ease;
Smiles may be worn when o'er the troubled mind
Brood shades and midnight in their darkest gloom;
But she could wear no mask, and no disguise,
Though oft, and long, and painfully she tried;
Her look, her slightest glance, was too, too clear,
To doubt that anguish prey'd on all within.

Once she had been like one of the gay things
That sported now before her. She had been
The pride of scenes like this—and then had won
The gaze of admiration from the throng
That crowded round her. She had seen them stand
Entranced to hear the music of her voice. Ah! then
Each youth was emulous to serve. She heard
Her praise from every tongue—and it had been
The theme of poets in their proudest songs.

'Twas not because all were so distant now
That she was sad—no, but she thought of one
Who always met her at those scenes of mirth;
His form would rise—and deathless mem'ry clung
To every action, and to every word.
In those glad moments he had spoke of love,
And she had fondly listen'd and believed.
She seem'd to be his only charm of life,
The being that he worshipp'd and adored.
Ah! had she known man more, she would have known
That love's sure spark lies in the deep heart hid,
Too deep to make a flaming outward show.
At first 'tis faint, perchance almost unseen,
And months, it may be years, must needs pass by,
Ere it be kindled so that time—nor tears—
Nor earthly power—can quench its sacred fire.
The love that lives in words but rarely speaks
The secret of the heart. She knew it not,
And gave her young affections all to him;
And each to each in sacred contract vow'd
Unfading constancy. That solemn pledge
They call'd on heaven to witness. Then he dwelt
With seeming rapture on the day that soon
Should see her his. Oh! she was happy then,
And every word was treasured in her breast.

Misfortune cross'd her path—"riches took wings;"
The pomp of wealth was hers no more—and yet
She sigh'd not—what were gaudy toys to her?
If he, her heart's first chosen, were but hers—
She wish'd no greater wealth. 'Twas paradise
Where'er he was. Winter was mild as spring—
The poorest cot a palace. This was love!
And he was hers. But ah! deluded one!
She saw him—oh how changed!—his brow was cold,
His tongue spoke not of love. He bow'd—pass'd on,
And left her. That proud glance was all she saw,
It chill'd her very heart—and froze each stream
Of joy and peace, that once flow'd sparkling there.
And yet she blamed him not; she never spoke
One word to wound him. No—for she had loved,

And even then, base ingrate as he was,
She loved him still. How could she then reproach?
She only pray'd that he might never feel
The anguish that she felt; but that his life
Might be as peaceful as her own was sad.
Ah! had it been his lot—had he been left
By fortune, e'en in poverty and shame,
She would have flown to cheer him. Woman's heart
Clings closer in distress—and when it loves,
Truly and warmly loves, it loves till death;
Ay—and if passions can survive the tomb,
If aught of earth at last may enter heaven,
Though not to pain, it must be woman's love.

She knew her life was passing fast away,
And others knew it—yet she never told
The melancholy cause. A few more pangs,
A few more secret sighs and tears—and then
She felt that she would slumber in the grave.
Oh! if there be a wound that needs relief,
Yet spurns it; if there be upon the earth
A poison'd arrow, that can pierce the soul,
'Tis that which woman feels—when left to weep
O'er buried hopes, and unrequited love.

LETTERS FROM RUSSIA.

SKETCHES OF THE CITY OF ST. PETERSBURG.

Addressed to a gentleman of this city:

NUMBER TWELVE.

St. Petersburg, 1830.

A LITTLE below the exchange, in the line skirting the Great Neva, stands the museum. It is a plain, lofty building, and exhibits some beautiful specimens of petrifications, corals, and minerals; but its variety of beast, bird, and fish is not to be compared in number, preservation, and arrangement to Scudder's; and there is a shameless, gross display on one side, that ought never to be permitted in a museum of natural curiosities. Among the quadrupeds I found by far the largest black bear I have ever seen. He is a monster in size. Here also are a towering elephant, with his Indian rider in costume perched upon his back, and the entire skeleton of a mammoth, discovered by Professor Adams on the shores of the icy sea. We were shown specimens of his hair, found at the same time, which could not have measured less than three-quarters of a yard in length. The figures of some Chinese, Japanese, Tartars, Laplanders, and jugglers attired in their native costumes, with their simple ingenious boats and sledges, as also a favourite servant of Peter the Great, seven feet high, and his pet zany, a diminutive dwarf, with very curious or rather no hands and feet, were attractive; but the objects of the greatest interest to us we found in the upper story, being such as related more immediately to the great monarch himself.

In one room we were shown the stuffed skin of the horse he strode at the famous battle of Poltava, apparently in full gallop, with the saddle, bridle, and accoutrements of the day exactly as they were used; and just ahead, as if starting on a chase, were the faithful dogs that attended him on his shooting excursions. Here also are numerous models of vessels and machines without number, made with his own hands, and very handsomely done too, showing Peter to have been an ingenious and skilful workman. In this and an adjoining room are preserved the telescope and nautical instruments, turning lathe, chisels, augers, hammers, hatchets, handsaws, and files, all of which he had used more or less during his active and busy life. Most of these tools bear the marks of good service. They are arranged and kept in the same state in which they were left at his death, and form an assortment sufficiently varied and complete to set up a dozen mechanics of our day in their different branches. From the second hall thus occupied a door opens to an inner room, before passing the threshold of which the soldier in attendance admonished us to take off our hats. We readily obeyed, and on entering found the wax figure of the czar sitting opposite us, in an easy chair, as if prepared for our reception. He was dressed in a kind of sky blue bombazine, of the same cut and fashion that a good citizen well to do in the world would have put on of a summer's day to see company. His skin was pallid, the face destitute of beard or the least expression, and his head covered with a great mop of hair, giving him just such an appearance from his shoulders upward as I have often seen in a young gawky peasant. No one can accuse the artist in this case of flattery; indeed I should pronounce it a most scandalous representation of the great original. It makes quite a contrast to the portraits that are preserved of him. In these he is represented as a fine, bold-looking man; the expression of his countenance sufficiently portraying those traits of character that render him so justly celebrated. His height is here preserved, which I found to be six feet seven inches; and in a corner stood several of those cudgels, with which he so potently belaboured the shoulders of his subjects. They were handsomely turned canes enough, apparently of sound oak or hickory, and, strange to say, not one of us were willing to test a thump over the back from them, although wielded by the weak hand of one of our degenerate days. In a recess hard by hangs quite an assortment of his wardrobe. The clothes seem to have been faithfully worn, and were not a whit better than those of an old seventy-six farmer, and much in the same style. A flapped hat, with one side of the brim torn off, and the other in tatters, decorated one peg, from another was suspended a slit coat, graced with buttons nearly as large as a modern tea plate, though of a different substance; a patch was stuck on a pair of his indispensables, and the heel of a cow-hide shoe was run down, the upper-leather on one side taking the place of the sole, and nearly worn through, while his toes might have peeped out at the rip of its fellow, and made any discoveries that the wide world had to offer. But Peter's mind was above such trifles, and while other monarchs were exhausting their invention to give a new fashion to a coat, and puzzling their wits on the tie of a shoe, his powerful genius and example were exerted in civilizing and adding largely to an already powerful empire, and tracing plans that it will be the glory of his successors to their remotest generations to carry into effect.

The walls around this little room were hung with portraits, among which were czars and czarines of an early age; but the one which riveted my attention was that of the beautiful Catherine the first. You will recollect her sad early history, and her rise from the rank of a Livonian captive to that of the empress of all the Russias, her estimable disposition, and the influence she possessed to the last over her implacable lord; an influence always exerted to do good, and to shield from his vengeance those unhappy beings who had incurred his vindictive wrath. Peter could never withstand the entreaties of this adorable woman; and when resolutely determined upon carrying his bloody mandate into effect, he absented himself from the palace, and denied Catherine his presence till the execution of the fatal orders had placed the victims of his displeasure beyond the reach of the prayers and tears of this kind-hearted intercessor. Her portrait is just such a one as your imagination would paint—a figure inclining to the en bon point, with graceful neck and bosom, large beaming eyes, and lovely placid features, exhibiting the benignant care and expression of a Madonna.

In the rear of the museum, apart from any other building, stands a rotunda, exclusively occupied by the famous Gottorp globe. To get within it you enter a narrow door, and ascending a low flight of steps, take your seat a little below the centre, when you will find room for a dozen persons or more. A wheel immediately commences turning, and in the space of fifteen minutes you will have crossed the dreaded line, gone round the world, and again find yourself on terra firma, at the point from which you started, and thus be able through after life to tell of the wonders of the great deep, the marvellous appearance of strange lands and people, and the twinkling of innumerable stars, the complicated evolutions of the planets, the phases of the moon, and the track of the sun. How clever to sit in an easy chair, and see and learn all this in less time than an ordinary man would take in the digesting of a pinch of snuff! but, joking apart, this globe is really a great curiosity, and a half hour's inspection of it will give one a clearer and more accurate knowledge of the solar system than a month's poring over books. Something similar ought to be placed in every university throughout the land.

Directly in front of the Isaac-bridge rises an enormous building, occupied by several colleges of science and the St. Synod; and in the rear of this, and fronting the first line, is the military establishment of the noble cadets. These buildings and the enclosed grounds occupy a whole square, at least half a mile in length by one quarter in breadth. The sons of the nobility are alone admitted to this institution, and are obliged to enter at the early age of seven, and remain till twenty-one, when they take their degrees and join the army. The establishment is very complete, having its own church, hospital, cabinet of natural history, and riding-school. The pupils amount to several hundreds. They wear a low round cap and gray uniform, and besides rigid drilling, the military and other sciences, are taught to speak and write in French and German with fluency. An open square next presents itself in the line of the Neva, adorned with a triumphal obelisk, commemorative of the victory of Count Orloff over the Turkish fleet in the Black sea. Bounding this square, on the south-west, rises the academy of fine arts, a magnificent building, presenting its façade to the water, and forming a quadrangle of upwards of four hundred feet. Its columns are of the Doric order, a low dome surmounts the top, and above is placed the figure of Minerva. This academy was established as early as 1764, by Catherine the second, and was well endowed by her munificence, her successors confirming its revenue, and in some instances adding thereto. The pupils receive a careful education; and though they may not yet boast of a Raphael or Michael Angelo, they have displayed great taste in sculpture, painting, and architecture, and have left in this and other quarters of the empire, admirable and enduring specimens of their genius and execution.

Still bordering the Neva a considerable distance down, you come to the academy of mines, established for the express purpose of training a corps of scientific and intelligent officers to superintend the numerous mines found throughout Siberia and the Ural mountains, and to aid in the easier and fuller development of their inexhaustible treasures. The enlightened liberality of the Russian government in forming this establishment, is worthy of all praise. The sons of the most respectable citizens and even of the nobility, embrace the privilege of a free education here, in strict reference to this profession, upon finishing which they receive a lieutenant's commission in the army, and immediately repair to their stations. Their emoluments are ample, and if they distinguish themselves in the least they are rapidly promoted, and after a certain time of service are allowed, if they choose, to retire on a pension. Notwithstanding the privations and hardships they must endure before they can honourably retire to enjoy what is at first looked upon as so enviable, they generally get so attached to their profession, as to prefer continuing actively engaged in it, receiving full pay and promotion, to a more easy and indolent life. This is but one among the many establishments instituted by this keen fore-sighted government for the cultivation and development of its vast resources, and I don't know when I have been so highly gratified as in my visit to the academy of mines.

The first hall we entered was adorned with a full-length likeness of Alexander, and devoted to the instruction of the pupils. There were a great variety of models displayed here, such as hydraulic works, and machines for washing out the gold and sinking shafts. The second room is also occupied for instruction, and was set round with specimens of the different minerals, and curiosities extracted from these regions. Among other specimens we were shown a lump of gold, found (that is, fortunately dug out the day previous by one of the miners, and placed by the flattering superintendants in his way before he made the rounds,) by the emperor Alexander on his visit to the mines, weighing nearly seventeen pounds, and so pure that the professor who attended us thought it would not lose over twenty per cent in refining. A garden is attached to the rear, and within it is dug a deep circuitous passage, over-arched and made perfectly dark, for the practical demonstration of the science to the students. Here each one of our party lighted his flambeau, and boldly descended. The delusion is quite perfect, for the different strata of earth and minerals are firmly attached to the walls just as they are originally found; and as you grope your way through the damp cold passage, it requires no great stretch of the imagination to fancy yourself in a real mine of Siberia.

THE CENSOR.

THE LITTLE GENIUS.

No. 104.

The bridegroom may forget the bride
Was made his wedded wife yestreen;
The monarch may forget the crown
That on his head an hour has been;
The mother may forget the child,
That smiles see sweetly on her knee;
But I'll remember thee, Glencairne,
And all that thou hast done for me.—Burns.

"THERE is in some minds," said the Genius, "a fine principle of fidelity, which perpetuates the existence of impressions. In others, incidents, unless connected with their progressive plans and interests, pass lightly away, and are forgotten. Feelings of admiration or of gratitude are preserved by many, of which the object may be totally unconscious; and buried under a multiplicity of other thoughts they would go down into the oblivion of the grave, unless some accidental occurrence to which they are linked by association, call them forth from the depths of the character like a precious and beautiful relic found in the neglected corner of a modern mansion."

"But," observed I, "one animated with gratitude or love for another would always seek his society."

"Not so," replied my companion. "Many causes may arise to separate them. True, every man seems to act from his own free will, but the course of each is, nevertheless, guided by the current, gentle and invisible, perchance, but nevertheless irresistible. Thus individuals are brought in contact, and compelled to toil together through existence, totally unadapted to make each other either happy or contented, while in other instances, they whose society would be productive of mutual gratification, never meet in life's wanderings, or only meet to part. You resemble ships at sea bound to different ports, and wafted by opposing winds. It would be agreeable for you to sail together, but it would be inconsistent with the object for which you are formed. But see—the mirror has spread itself out before us. A moment's silence and you will discover my meaning."

As a ruffled stream settles again into stillness when the breeze dies away, and the shapes and colours before confusedly reflected in its waters, fall at length into the soft and living picture of surrounding nature, so the agitated mists in the mirror arranged themselves in quiet order and vivid distinctness.

A rural scene appeared, evidently situated at a distance from the elegance, fashion, and restless action of a city. A low and humble house stood at the end of a wide grassy lane. Moss was on the roof. Pleasant orchards were near, and tall elm trees. On a branch, a robin was trimming his wings, and his warble ever and anon was heard. In the distance, and softened by the haze, stood a village and a white church, whose spire was gilded with the rays of the setting sun.

I gazed a few moments in silence. I had but just left the busy streets, whitened with banks of snow, and my ears rung with the ringing of sleigh-bells and the voices of fashionable gaiety—and this tranquil summer picture struck me with a fairy contrast, and reminded me of years and years gone by when in early boyhood I had moved in such a place and at such an hour.

"You behold," said my companion, "one of those secluded dwellings where the treasures of learning are served without ostentation to the lowly youth of your happy country. Beneath that unassuming roof, and clothed in the garments of the poor, many a young heart beats with germs of genius and virtue. But the period of their thralldom is over, and the elastic mind, bent down with the labour of study, is prepared to rise again to mirth and pleasure."

As he spoke, a burst of noisy merriment told that the toils of the day were done; and, with faces of eager joy, natural enough on the occasion, the crowd burst forth to freedom sweetened by restraint. But among the joyful multitude who dispersed themselves over the green and pursued their various sports, I noted one upon whose features appeared the marks of sorrow, for many as are the deep regrets with which the scarred and worn heart of man yearns for the peace, the innocence, the ignorance of boyhood, yet its sky, even as every other, is shaken by the mimic tempest, or overshadowed with infant gloom. The boy was poor. No affluent friends waited to lead him by the hand to the high and glorious places of the world. Scarcely one kind heart was crossed by recollections of his image, sympathy with his loneliness, or interest in his welfare. A remote relation had placed him at the academy, partly from a cold sense of duty, and partly from the pomp of ostentatious charity, which so long as it shone forth conspicuously to admiring thousands, never listed whether the object was wounded or benefited by the manner of its application. The master of the establishment was a correct and moral pedant, in whose rude and unfeeling bosom he found no refuge either from his own thoughts or the neglect of others. The same fate which had thus sent the boy adrift without friend, or money, or hope, had also cast his person in a repulsive mould, had formed his tongue awkward to express, and his understanding slow to comprehend. No beautiful face attracted to him the gaze of admiration, and of the spurious pity of which it sometimes is the foundation. His voice had no sweet tones—his mouth no expressive smile—his manner no winning grace. He was rough, ungainly, unattractive, and the tears which now came up from his very heart, did not moisten beautiful eyes or tremble upon long lashes, but rolled down his cheeks in the homely language of ordinary grief.

"Poor, little, solitary, wretched boy!" said the Genius; "although denied the outward charms of person, he has a human heart, and what heart will not bleed when wounded? The pedagogue, his tyrant, has lost his patience and beaten him, because he has not accomplished all that has been effected by those who had naturally stronger faculties and quicker perceptions."

While he was speaking, the unhappy outcast, with a book containing a lesson as opaque to the eyes of his understanding as the rock was to his physical vision, wandered away from the rest, whose happy shouts were heard, as the ball rose in the air, or the rapid top hummed itself to sleep upon the smooth and much worn ground. He sat down on a stone and turned his face towards the sky, where the sun had just gone down, and the tears were almost dried from his eyes as he gazed, and then, as a companion approached him and saluted him with an unfeeling remark or a heartless joke, the tears flowed again.

Presently a boy, gifted with all the grace of manner and beauty of person in which the other was deficient, and endowed with the superadded blessings of affectionate and wealthy parents, wit, capacity, and genius, left the play and came softly and sat down beside him, put his arm around his neck soothed him in a low tone, and persuaded him to strive again at the repulsive task, which had been so long and closely associated with misery and mortification that his very soul loathed it. He pointed out the easy parts and explained the dark, and by the aid of his kind and soothing manner the irritated mind of the dull boy was calmed, and his swelling feelings were hushed, and a light broke in upon him of knowledge, and gratitude, and happiness. Then the scene vanished.

"And now," said I, smiling through a sort of moisture which had gathered in my own eyes, for even so simple an instance of pure generous feeling and unimportant misfortune is touching, "I suppose our poor little friend is to appear a great man, and to rescue his noble patron from some awful calamity."

"No," said the Genius, "human scenes are not always performed in so dramatic a style. Though life is full of changes, you must not suppose every poor youth will rise to eminence, nor every promising one suffer ruin. Time has gone on with them in its usual routine. The rich boy grew up into a rich man. The promises of his early days have all been realized. He has lived a life of pleasure and virtue, and never again met the abandoned object of his infant pity. Genius has hallowed his name, and triumph followed his undertakings. The other never overcame the obstacles with which accident opposed his progress. Beauty never invested his form, happiness never warmed his heart. He has been always poor, always humble—but look once more in the mirror."

It was one of the gloomiest pictures of life. A crowd were assembled in a lofty apartment. They consisted of the great and powerful of the land. A lovely female, arrayed in deep mourning, was there, with two beautiful children. At one end of the chamber stood a coffin. Death's awful seal was stamped on the altered features of the tenant, but a glance told me that the sad faces, which appeared one after another, and gazed with awe-struck rivetted look, as if they could never cease gazing upon the white tranquil forehead, the closed eyes, the cold, serious, stiff features, came to take their farewell of him—the once gentle and lovely boy. Then all the thrilling ceremonials were finished—the solemn prayer was said—the wife and children had paused before the noble prostrate form with feelings too sacred and deep for the intrusion even of imagination. And one was in the act of drawing over the features the snowy gauze and closing the coffin lid, when he, the unhappy boy, the poor labourer, entered with hasty step among his superiors, and fixed his eyes on that face, which had never met him since. A paleness came over him, and a tremor was at his heart.

"True, living, faithful gratitude," said the Genius, "has existed in his bosom unchanged. The circumstances of their respective situations in life have hitherto kept them asunder. They have passed in the streets as strangers to each other. No opportunity has occurred even for the acknowledgment of the debt of kindness contracted in that quiet spot, when the sun was slowly sinking. But although unpaid, unspoken, it has not been forgotten, and it is good for you to know that these qualities belong to human nature, to see true generous feeling exhibited, although in a shape entirely unconnected with the important events of life. They afford at once a model for your own actions, and a support on which you may rest your confidence in the high nature and destiny of man."

NOTES BY A TRAVELLER.

NUMBER THREE.

December 3, 1829.—At sea.

It is evening. Every thing is calm and tranquil. A voyage at sea has been aptly said to cut one off for a time from all plans of life. There is nothing around to awaken recollection but the stars, which strew the broad and lofty pavement of heaven with the same shapes, whether the gazer be wandering through the pleasant places of the earth, or tossed on the lonely ocean—whether he be wretched or happy, there the imperishable records of power are shining silently forever.

The ship goes along lazily through the water, creaking and rolling. The dark heavy waves are tumbling around, and their curling tops show dimly white through the shadow. Last night at the same moment I was in the full flash of merriment, light, and music. Gentle friends were around me. I shall probably never see them again. We pass through the world as we ramble along the winding paths of some forest; where bright birds light near us, or sweep by on outspread wings, but are lost among the thickening branches, even while we gaze on the richness of their plumage, or hush our breath to drink in the music of their song.

These reflections passed in my mind this morning as the ship won its way out of the offing, and I dwelt deliberately, one after another, upon the pleasant scenes which I had witnessed in the streak of blue land fast receding in the west. One gets scandalously sentimental at such a moment. A little man in a white hat called for a glass of toddy—pretty girl gone down the cabin sick—steward ringing the supper bell in the companion way. Partly from the pressure of tender recollections, and partly from the motion of the vessel, I experienced an indefinite sort of a suspicion that I was not very hungry—was soon, however, dreaming in my berth.

December 4th.—A fresh breeze. Sky overclouded—cold and rainy. Reading till dinner time. Dispatched a reasonable quantity of apple pudding. Nothing can be more grateful to the palate at sea than fruit in all the forms of its preparations. Stretched myself on a settee, and sleep and dreams came over me. I was in a large dining hall, very hungry, and consequently particularly delighted to behold some ten or a dozen aproned waiters skipping about a well-furnished table like those good and obliging genii mentioned in the Arabian Nights. There were all sorts of dishes tempting to a languid appetite, to say nothing of several large covered silver tureens, (a fine effect they have by the way upon a hungry imagination) potatoes so dry and mealy that they fell apart if you did but look at them; oysters fat and plump, the very picture of health and happiness, and a world of nameless little knick-knacks in the divine mystery of cookery—the golden custard, the luscious pie, clusters of grapes, and heaps of other delicious fruits, which, however unimportant to moralists and philosophers after dinner, may, nevertheless, by a very simple combination of circumstances, be rendered decidedly agreeable topics of reflection. Then the lordly sirloin of beef took its station at the head of the table, and a sensible looking gentleman, after having turned up the cuffs of his sleeves, introduced a fork into it—laid open several slices with the skill of a practised carver—and rested his eyes on me, on the very point of preferring a pleasing and natural interrogatory, when, with a sudden shock, I was dashed from my slumbers and found myself in the opposite side of the cabin, amidst chairs upside down, trunks rolled over, and various other symptoms of a general revolution. A heavy gale had arisen. The sea was running in mountain waves, and our good ship was pitching violently. With the aid of hands as well as feet I succeeded in crossing the floor, sometimes climbing, sometimes descending, and sometimes bringing my head in contact with divers objects with a momentum, not at all in accordance with my ideas of personal comfort. After having been wandering through hushed forests and reclining on the banks of sleepy brooks, I was desirous of beholding this same nature, that we poetize so much, in one of her angry moods. A total darkness soon overspread the scene—only cheered by the light in the binnacle, and the breathing of the heavy billows as they lifted their fiery heads high above the lofty stern. During the night the wind increased to a tremendous gale. It seemed scarcely possible for the ship to ride it out. The rolling rendered walking a perilous enterprise, and occasionally as the vessel lurched, the crockery crashed, the women screamed, chests, chairs, boots, and all the moveable articles not absolutely lashed, were rolling to and fro across the floor "as life were in them." Whatever were the thoughts of the men, they kept them to themselves, but the agreeable anticipations of the ladies were confided so freely, and in such an elevated tone to whomsoever might be pleased to listen that, although no caves-dropper, it was impossible for me to misunderstand that they were rather discontented with the prospect. Divers questions were put to the steward, both principal and deputies, as when the storm would end—did he think the ship would overset or go down—and did he ever know of such a gale before. The worthy individual, not being himself exactly satisfied with existing circumstances, afforded them but very vague and contradictory information, from which no more could be gathered than that we were undoubtedly at sea, and in a gale of wind. His natural humanity did once so nearly conquer his fears as to induce him to offer some consolation to a charming little woman, whose beauty was quite improved by her terror. He assured her, upon his honour, that the waves were subsiding, the winds abating, the moon and stars coming out as fast as possible; but he had not yet finished his veracious statements, when another lurch laid the vessel on her beam-ends—a gigantic wave swept and thundered over the deck and into the cabin—the crockery again crashed—the fair females raised their voices—and as the groaning and labouring ship righted, the gale grew more fiercely violent and blew a hurricane, screaming and whistling through the rigging, and so the steward lost his character as a man of integrity. I never heard any sounds before which I could exactly compare to the shrill, constant, shrieking of the whirlwind through the shrouds. After a sleepless night, varied with crying, crashing, and splashing, the trampling of rapid feet on deck, the shouts of the captain through the trumpet, the noise of the vessel rushing through the water, and the awful tumult and thundering of the wind and billows, morning at length dawned. Most of the passengers clung to their berths. No breakfast was served. The cabin was too dark to read. I resolved to see what was to be seen, and, wildly as my imagination may have exaggerated many of the pains and pleasures of life, I never conceived a scene at once so appalling and awful, yet so grand and sublime. The wild element seemed in the paroxysm of rage and madness. Its broad and mountainous billows were lifted far above the deck, and each seemed inevitably destined to overwhelm the comparatively feeble and petty fabric in whose frail bosom so many adventurous human beings had trusted themselves to its mercy. The colour of the water was entirely changed. Sometimes in the trough of the sea it assumed a deep and inky blackness—then the snow white froth curled and foamed upon the breaking waves, and presently gave way to a bright indigo blue, while far and wide the surface of the ocean smoked—that is, gave off the vapour exhaled in consequence of the coldness of the air. Even on the solid earth, the sight of those dark heavy masses of vapour, hiding the face of day, their lowering bosoms fraught with the principles of wreck and ruin, hushes the mind into an emotion of solemnity, if not of fear; but, tossed almost at random upon the ocean, and cut off from the world, when the springing of a plank may overwhelm you, one feels with singular force his perfect helplessness and utter abandonment. It must be with something of a similar sensation that the unarmed and solitary passenger struggles in the very embrace of some ferocious beast; although even in such a situation there is something to do, by which the attention may be in a measure diverted. But, the victim of shipwreck, in the full and dreadfully clear possession of his intellectual powers, has to sit passively and deliberately down, and amuse himself by considering whether he had better leap off at once into the boiling brine, or lash himself to the deck, and pass some fifteen or twenty days in that posture, not only without anything to eat, but with the ulterior prospect of becoming himself food for fishes. In the midst of this din of contending elements, while I was clinging to a rope to keep from being washed overboard by the waves, a beautiful little land-bird, drenched with the rain and almost frozen, came tremblingly and alighted upon the vessel's deck. In the absence of all other occupation, and perhaps a little flighty from the danger of our situation, I desperately proceeded to compose the following rhymes, which I committed to paper when the storm died away the next night, and the pale moon sent down her struggling beams, dim and beautiful, upon the white tumbling surface of the ocean. I have taken, however, a poetic licence not warranted by the bird's real fate. The poor little creature found but a brief resting place on the ship, from which the fierce tempest soon drove him. He durst not commit himself more confidently to the mercy of man, and I suppose his troubles were soon over.

Welcome, poor, feeble, fluttering bird,
Scared by the pelting, pitiless clouds,
Though here but dreary winds are heard,
Shrill screaming through the naked shrouds.

Full oft upon the crimson rose,
Have lightly pressed those tiny feet,
Where silent leafy-woods disclose
Blue sky, clear brook, and fragrance sweet.

And many a lonely one; like thee
From scenes of joy, a wanderer driven
Adrift on sorrow's cheerless sea,
Copes with the angry storms of heaven.

But not like thee, thou trembling thing,
Do all a place of shelter find,
To rest their weary, shivering wing,
And hide them from the wintry wind.

But struggling long, with fainting soul,
At length they sink upon the deep,
Where tempests rage, and billows roll,
But break no more their dreamless sleep.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

AFTER the unceasing jingle of bells for the last several weeks, through all hours of the day and night, none will be hardy enough to deny that we are emphatically a sleigh-riding community. During the prevalence of snow, the theatres were, of course, generally not well attended. The managers of the Park, however, have boldly entered into a conflict with the elements, and the struggle between Cinderella and the sleighing has been long and arduous. The opera, however, possesses a manifest advantage over the roads, from the fact, that while the latter are rapidly growing worse, the former is continually advancing towards perfection. True indeed, at the commencement, some trivial and natural occurrences did a little mar the general success. At one time, although every possible exertion was used by the enterprising and indefatigable Mr. Barry to procure a living rat for the coachman, yet, in defiance of the most ingenious and expensive display of trained chimera, those perverse and foolish reptiles were not sufficiently convinced of his pacific intentions to enter into any definite engagement, and the character was consequently performed by a stuffed semblance, who could not be expected to sustain it with either grace or spirit. Besides, at one representation, when the fairy, with the design of metamorphosing Cinderella's awkward servant into a magnificent nobleman, waved her magic wand with more dignity than effect, and exclaimed, "appear and disappear," the attraction of gravitation, and other obdurate principles of natural philosophy, proved rather too powerful for her influence, and, instead of shining forth immediately a gay and richly-caparisoned knight, Mr. T. Placide, from an inconvenient disposition of the slip-noose around his neck, seemed on the point of closing his theatrical career in a very ignominious and disagreeable manner, when the cord gave way, to the unequivocal gratification of himself and the sympathetic audience, with no more fatal consequence than a tumble head over heels, accompanied by an affecting exclamation of "halloo!" which was received with "unbounded applause."

But now this charming opera has completely surmounted all similar obstacles. The most incredible transformations take place with a beautiful and dream-like facility, living fairies float on the bosom of the air, above the branches of the forest, and the most heavenly music comes, sweetly softened by distance, from—no one can tell where. In truth, the light and agreeable fancies of this far-famed eastern story, so familiar to the mind of childhood, have been embodied on the stage with extraordinary effect; and while its magic wonders delight the youthful imagination, the genius of Rossini has succeeded in rendering it captivating to all. It is acknowledged that Cinderella offers an attraction superior to any thing of the kind ever before produced in the United States. It is an experiment on the taste of the community, in the course of which much labour and expense have been incurred, and in the successful result of which all lovers of good music should feel interested. If the public support warrant it, we may hope to be hereafter entertained by similar costly and delightful exhibitions, and that elephants, rope-dancers, and such refined and intellectual treats as Punch and Judy, may be hereafter banished from the stage.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

NUMBER ONE.

SIR—Permit me to thank you for the stand you made in your paper a short time since in behalf of the good old mode of paying visits and reviving friendships on new-year's day. It is a practice hallowed by time and sanctioned by its salutary consequences. It brings long estranged friends to remember and visit each other; it gives life and gaiety to a dreary inclement season; it is, in short, a social, honest, old fashioned custom, and as such I honour it, at least in others; for a habit of indolence has, I confess to my shame, prevented me from following it myself for a few years past.

And who are they that, as I have heard it ramoured in the fashionable circles of this city, are about setting their faces against a venerable usage consecrated by the example of our ancestors? Why, sir, people that have no ancestry themselves—no respect for long cherished customs, and no right to set any other example than that of a becoming humility. People without any claims to refinement but what originate in pride of wealth, and who are neither entitled by birth, education, manners, talents, or taste, to take the lead in our society, to which they have already imparted an aspect of vulgarity. Such as these have no other ideas of refinement and gentility but what they borrow from abroad, and fancy it a sufficient sanction to any folly or indecency that it is the fashion in Paris or London. They cannot conceive for a moment that real good breeding is founded on a nice sense of propriety, and depends not on the fashion of the garments or the splendour of equipages, which only throw a cruel sunshine on vulgar habits and vulgar minds.

I have long had my eye upon this knot of would-be fashionables, who seem to take it for granted that the possession of money is a patent of nobility, and that wealth is a sufficient offset against ignorance and ill-manners. But yesterday risen from the depth of obscurity and insignificance, they affect to take the lead in fashioning our manners and directing our amusements; and, as if conscious of their recent origin, they make war upon venerable customs, which appear to excite their spleen, only because they are more ancient than themselves. I would have these people take warning—become more modest in their pretensions—play the fool if they like among themselves—tickle each other's vanity in a corner, and leave the really respectable portion of the community to their ancient and long-cherished amusements. If they do not, I promise them a future harvest of ridicule that shall cure their attempts at innovation. The good city of New-York shall not be surrendered to the dictation of purse-proud arrogance, nor be overrun by ignorant pretenders to fashion without a stout resistance on my part.

In the mean time I call on all the descendants of our old independent burghers—all who reverence the usages of their ancestors—all who have any ancestry themselves—all who love to see one cheerful day at least in the year, in which the old may become young again, and the young ones laugh for joy—all that despise the petty arrogance of would-be pretension and ignorant vulgarity, I call upon them all to buckle on their armour in defence of the honest jolly new-year. For my part, I intend to bestir myself, if I live till the next birth day, and visit every body I have ever known, except the low bred people who have no respect for ancient customs. Prepare your new-year cookies and cherry bounce, Mr. Editor, for I shall certainly beat up your quarters. Your constant reader,

THE LAST OF THE COCKED HATS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

NUMBER TWO.

SIR—Having been assured that the periodical press governs the world, and that in a short time we shall want neither kings, lords, commons, congress, president, mayor, or common council, I am induced to lay before you my unhappy situation, in the hope that you will either interfere in my behalf, or at least publish this letter as a warning to others.

I came to town the other day with ma to spend the winter, leaving pa at home to take care of the children. We took lodgings at a public hotel where there are plenty of boarders, so that we never want company, and every thing is delightful. I do love living at lodgings, and so does ma. Every thing is done to our hands; there is no trouble to take care of the house, and all that sort of vulgarity; and we have nothing to do but sit at the window and read novels, walk in Broadway, spend money, and flirt with the gentlemen. Ma has got two beaux already—foreign gentlemen—one a duke, the other second cousin to a ci-devant, which I believe means German, or African prince, I don't exactly know which; and I—but my modesty will not permit me to tell you how many humble servants I have at the hotel, besides waiters and chambermaids.

But this is not what I intended to write to you about. You must know pa mortgaged his farm to our bank to raise money for our winter campaign, and gave me a hundred dollars to buy dresses with, that I might appear as became the daughter of the first judge of the county. The next day after we arrived ma and I went to a fashionable milliner's before breakfast, to witness the opening of a new invoice of dresses and bonnets from Paris. Well, after losing our breakfast, we were so long making up our minds, we fixed upon two most beautiful bonnets and two most elegant dresses, which the milliner assured us were of the very latest Paris fashion. Well, I could not sleep that night, for we were going the very next evening to a grand party at Mrs. Flash's, the most fashionable lady in town. Well, when we got there, would you believe it? Miss Flash, who had been in Paris only six months before, solemnly declared that our dresses had been two good years out of fashion! Ma fainted away, and I fell into hysterics. What shall we do, Mr. Editor? The dresses are to be sure very handsome; but we can't possibly wear them you know without disgracing the first judge of the county. Ma has written to pa to mortgage another piece of land; but you know what slow people lawyers are, and half the winter will be lost before we get another supply. Ma talks of running in debt for a couple of new dresses, if she can get any body to trust her. In the meanwhile we are ashamed to show ourselves any where, and I have had no other resource for these five or six days but reading the Water Witch, and wondering at the charming talent of the author at making such a long story out of nothing.

Dear Mr. Editor, do give it to the wicked milliners who impose upon the country ladies by selling them old-fashioned dresses for new. Will you, that's a nice man. Your disconsolate,

PATTY PRISM.

NUMBER THREE.

FRIEND MORRIS—You editors know, or what is just the same thing, pretend to know, every thing. What shall I do? I am tired of myself, and every thing else. I have nothing to do, nothing to say, and nothing to think of. When the sun shines I walk up and down Broadway, and manage to create a little excitement by wondering at the fashion of short petticoats in cold windy weather; when it rains I go to bed. Every day I live is longer than the day before, and Sunday the longest of all. Can you tell me how to get rid of Sunday? I used to get in my gig and let my horse go just where he pleased, till one Sunday he shipwrecked me across a chain in front of one of the churches. It was rather a lucky affair though, for I sprained my ankle and was confined six weeks. You can't think how I enjoyed myself—first, in anticipating the pleasure of getting well, and secondly, in the recollection of being sick. The contrast was exquisite.

But this happiness could not last for ever. In a little time I resolved myself into myself again. I was becalmed in the boundless ocean of nothingness. The fiend envy, beset me sorely. I envied the sawyer the delights of sawing wood; I envied the porter his burthen—it was so much lighter than being a burthen to himself, as I was—and, upon the word of a miserable gentleman with nothing on the face of the earth to do, I often pined after the delights of climbing up to the top of a chimney, and crying "sweep all up! sweep all up!" to the tune of Di tanti palpiti.

If I could only get rid of my money, I should be happy. I should then be forced to do something. You can't conceive the pains I have been at to arrive at this happy consummation of poverty. I spent money like dirt, and had nearly got through my estate, when behold! I awoke one morning and found myself as badly off as ever. A bachelor uncle had died and left me a swamp in the outskirts of the city that was worth more than all I had spent. But I was not discouraged. I set to work again with great vigour, and flattered myself I was doing very well; but as my evil stars would have it, my swamp increased in value faster than I spent the money. For two or three years we ran against each other; but the swamp distanced me at last, and I gave up the contest in despair, though the corporation improvements assisted me out of a few thousands every year.

In the hope that fate would relent at last, I engaged in divers speculations, such as buying country bank stock, in hopes they would break in time. But all in vain—they stood like Catakil "amid the wreck of matter and the crush of worlds," while every other bank was crushing around them. Next I formed an intimacy with a knowing gentleman about Wall-street, whose advice I followed on all occasions in the investment of money, in the reasonable hope of being ruined at last. But my fate still followed, and every thing I touched turned to gold.

As a last resort, and in a moment of despair, I found out a man of rather doubtful character, whose affairs were in a most beautiful confusion, and who wanted to borrow an ocean of money. He was the very man for me, and I became responsible for him in all I was worth, assuring him at the same time that if he would only run away, I should be eternally grateful. But the unfeeling wretch demurred to this trifling proof of gratitude, and cruelly insisted on paying me, when shortly after two or three Indiamen, belonging to him, arrived with rich cargoes.

In short, friend Morris, I have done all that man could do to get rid of his money, and yet I grow richer every day. What shall I do? How shall I manage to make it absolutely necessary for me to do something? By the way, don't you want a printer's devil? I think I have a sort of literary turn, and if you will only try me a few weeks, I will pay more for the privilege of working than all the rest of your devils receive in a year. Pray think of it and let me hear from you soon, or I shall certainly be tempted to make away with myself in matrimony. I have a remote hope that if I can only meet with a fashionable young lady, well brought up, and au fait in the secret of spending a gentleman's estate, I may possibly, with her assistance, get rid of my money faster than it increases. But, upon the whole, I think the project of the printer's devil preferable. Therefore let me hear from you as soon as possible, for I should not be surprised at waking some of these mornings without the least inclination to get up and dress myself. Your trifling friend,

NUMBER FOUR.

SIR—As I was walking alone by myself the other evening, when you know it was as dark as Jerusalem, a great strapping fellow came behind me and threw a rope with a slipping noose round my neck, exclaiming at the same time, "Ah ha! have I caught you at last, Mister Potter?" Luckily the rope would not shut close enough to choke me. I assured the man he was mistaken, my name was not Potter, and then I cried murder. The people came to my rescue, and then only think of the fellow! he protested he was a cartman and took me for his horse which had strayed away, at the same time he showed the rope, which was a halter. The people, I suppose, being all in league with him, laughed at me and my horse. I told Mr. Editor, don't you think he contemplated my ruin? Yours, &c.

TRIMBLE TIMBERSOME.

P. S. I wish you would make a little rout about the danger of females being out of evenings. It has an excellent effect in keeping the women from gadding. My wife and daughters stay home and keep me company ever since the alarm of the slipping nooses.

TO A RELATION IN THE COUNTRY.

NUMBER FIVE.

New-York, January 30, 1831.

MY DEAR FRIEND—I received your letter yesterday, and am delighted to hear my green-house plants have escaped the late frosts. Pray take good care of them till I come home, and I will pay you for your trouble by sending you all the news and telling you all my adventures. I am sure they will make you laugh, for they are nothing but a budget of blunders from beginning to end. I can hardly help laughing myself when I think of them.

The first blunder I made was in mistaking a servant for his master. You must know it is the fashion for the young gentlemen of ton to drive their own servants about town, I suppose in order to show their humility. I was walking with Fanny Flutter in Broadway when a beautiful little waggon, with a pair of beautiful little ponies passed by, with a gentleman, as I thought, loling on the back seat, in a most easy and graceful manner.

"My heavens!" exclaimed I, "what a beautiful equipage, and what a handsome gentleman in it—who is he?"

Fanny laughed louder than I thought became a lady in the street, and answered as soon as she could—

LITERARY NOTICES.

Remarks on the Character and Writings of John Milton, occasioned by the publication of his lately discovered Treatise on Christian Doctrine. By William E. Channing.

(Second notice.)

THE want of room in the last Mirror forced us to reserve a part of the article upon Mr. Channing's interesting essay. We did it, however, with less reluctance from the fact that it consists principally of extracts, in a great measure disconnected. There is a fine air of boldness in the following, which illustrates how entirely the author rests on his own reason; how unswayed he is by those prejudices and habits which attract the weak into beaten paths.

"From Milton's poetry we turn to his prose. We rejoice that the dust is beginning to be wiped from his prose writings, and that the public are now learning what the initiated have long known, that these contain passages hardly inferior to his best poetry, and that they are throughout marked with the same vigorous mind, which gave us Paradise Lost. The attention to these works has been discouraged by some objections, on which we shall bestow a few remarks.

"And first, it is objected to his prose writings that the style is difficult and obscure, abounding in involutions, transpositions, and Latinisms; that his protracted sentences exhaust and weary the mind, and too often yield it no better recompense than confused and indistinct perceptions. We mean not to deny that these charges have some grounds, but they seem to us much exaggerated; and when we consider that the difficulties of Milton's style have almost sealed up his prose writings, we cannot but lament the fastidiousness and effeminacy of modern readers. We know that simplicity and perspicuity are important qualities of style; but there are vastly nobler and more important ones, such as energy and richness, and in these Milton is not surpassed. The best style is not that which puts the reader most easily and in the shortest time in possession of a writer's naked thoughts; but that which is the truest image of a great intellect, which conveys fully and carries farthest into other souls the conceptions and feelings of a profound and lofty spirit. To be universally intelligible is not the highest merit. A great mind cannot, without injurious constraint, shrink itself to the grasp of common passive readers. Its natural movement is free, bold, and majestic, and it ought not to be required to part with these attributes, that the multitude may keep pace with it. A full mind will naturally overflow in long sentences, and in the moment of inspiration, when thick-coming thoughts and images crowd upon it, will often pour them forth in a splendid confusion, dazzling to common readers, but kindling to congenial spirits. There are writings which are clear through their shallowness. We must not expect in the ocean the transparency of the calm inland stream. For ourselves we love what is called easy reading perhaps too well, especially in our hours of relaxation; but we love too to have our faculties tasked by master spirits. We delight in long sentences, in which a great truth, instead of being broken up into numerous periods, is spread out in its full proportions, is irradiated with variety of illustration and imagery, is set forth in a splendid affluence of language, and flows, like a full stream, with a majestic harmony which fills at once the ear and the soul. Such sentences are worthy and noble manifestations of a great and far-looking mind, which grasps at once vast fields of thought, just as the natural eye takes in at a moment wide prospects of grandeur and beauty. We would not indeed have all compositions of this character. Let abundant provision be made for the common intellect. Let such writers as Addison, an honoured name, 'bring down philosophy from heaven to earth.' But let inspired genius fulfil its higher function of lifting the prepared mind from earth to heaven. Impose upon it no strict laws, for it is its own best law. Let it speak in its own language, in tones which suit its own ear. Let it not lay aside its natural port, or dwarf itself that it may be comprehended by the surrounding multitude. If not understood and relished now, let it place a generous confidence in other ages, and utter oracles which futurity will expound. We are led to these remarks, not merely for Milton's justification, but because our times seem to demand them. Literature, we fear, is becoming too popular. The whole community is now turned into readers, and in this we heartily rejoice; and we rejoice too that so much talent is employed in making knowledge accessible to all. We hail the general diffusion of intelligence as the brightest feature of the present age. But good and evil are never disjoined; and one bad consequence of the multitude of readers is, that men of genius are too anxious to please the multitude, and prefer a present shout of popularity to that less tumultuous, but deeper, more thrilling note of the trump of fame, which resounds and grows clearer and louder through all future ages."

One more extract—and although, like Sinbad, when he leaves the valley of diamonds, we regret that we can only carry away so small a part of the brilliant gems which are here so profusely scattered around, yet we trust, if not from our remarks, at least from these instances of Mr. Channing's extraordinary talent as a writer, our readers may be induced to examine more fully than we have now room to do, his claims to a more extended, though not a higher fame, than that which he has already acquired.

"We have enlarged on Milton's character, not only from the pleasure of paying that sacred debt which the mind owes to him who has quickened and delighted it, but from an apprehension that Milton has not yet reaped his due harvest of esteem and veneration. The mists which the prejudices and bigotry of Johnson spread over his bright name are not yet wholly scattered, though fast passing away. We wish not to disparage Johnson. We could find no pleasure in sacrificing one great man to the manes of another. But we owe it to Milton and to other illustrious names to say, that Johnson has failed of the highest end of biography, which is, to give immortality to virtue, and to call forth fervent admiration towards those who have shed splendour on past ages. We acquit Johnson, however, of intentional misrepresentation. He did not, and could not, appreciate Milton. We doubt whether two other minds, having so little in common as those of which we are now speaking, can be found in the higher walks of literature. Johnson was great in his own sphere, but that sphere was, comparatively, 'of the earth,' whilst Milton's was only inferior to that of angels. It was customary, in the day of Johnson's glory, to call him a giant, to class him with a mighty, but still an earth-born race. Milton we should rank among seraphs. Johnson's mind acted chiefly on man's actual condition, on the realities of life, on the springs of human action, on the passions which now agitate society, and he seems hardly to have dreamed of a higher state of the human mind than was then exhibited. Milton, on the other hand, burned with a deep, yet calm love of moral grandeur and celestial purity. He thought not so much of what man is, as of what he might become. His own mind was a revelation to him of a higher condition of humanity, and to promote this he thirsted and toiled for freedom, as the element for the growth and improvement of his nature. In religion, Johnson was gloomy and inclined to superstition, and on the subject of government leaned towards absolute power; and the idea of reforming either never entered his mind but to disturb and provoke it. The church and the civil polity under which he lived seemed to him perfect, unless he may have thought that the former would be improved by a larger infusion of Romish rites and doctrines, and the latter by an enlargement of the royal prerogative. Hence a tame acquiescence in the present forms of religion and government marks his works. Hence we find so little in his writings which is electric and soul-kindling, and which gives the reader a consciousness of being made for a state of more lofty thought and feeling than the present. Milton's whole soul, on the contrary, revolted against the maxims of legitimacy, hereditary faith, and servile reverence for established power. He could not brook the bondage to which men had bowed for ages. 'Reformation' was the first word of public warning which broke from his youthful lips, and the hope of it was a fire in his aged breast. The difference between Milton and Johnson may be traced, not only in these great features of mind, but in their whole characters. Milton was refined and spiritual in his habits, temperate almost to abstemiousness, and refreshed himself after intellectual effort by music. Johnson inclined to more sensual delights. Milton was exquisitely alive to the outward creation, to sounds, motions, and forms, to natural beauty and grandeur. Johnson, through defect of physical organization, if not through deeper deficiency, had little susceptibility of these pure and delicate pleasures, and would not have exchanged the Strand for the vale of Tempé or the gardens of the Hesperides. How could Johnson be just to Milton? The comparison which we have instituted has compelled us to notice Johnson's defects. But we trust we are not blind to his merits. His stately march, his pomp and power of language, his strength of thought, his reverence for virtue and religion, his vigorous logic, his practical wisdom, his insight into the springs of human action, and the solemn pathos which occasionally pervades his descriptions of life and his references to his own history, command our willing admiration. That he wanted enthusiasm and creative imagination and lofty sentiment, was not his fault. We do not blame him for not being Milton. We love intellectual power in all its forms,

"That elegant gentleman lolling on the back seat is no less a person than Mr. Barnabas Dump, who whilom used to stand behind my chair and change my plate."

"He must have had a sudden rise in the world," said I.

"Yes, he is promoted to the high honour of being young Paddle's coachman, in which capacity it pleases his master to drive him about, instead of being driven about by him."

"Why this is reversing the order of nature," said I.

"No," said she, "it is only restoring the order of nature. Fortune, by some strange blunder, has given Mr. Paddle a carriage, and fashion has placed him just where he ought to be—in the seat of the driver."

"I am so mortified at my mistake," said I.

"Why so—I assure you it is a very natural one. Few people can now distinguish between the master and man, either by their dress or their manners."

Fanny, you know, is very satirical against the beaux. She was a belle some ten years ago.

The next blunder I made was about the ladies we met in walking Broadway. I almost blush to tell you—but—but—they were dressed so fine, with feathers in their hats—only think, feathers to walk the streets in! and wore such short clothes—that—that—poor me! I actually thought they were no better than they should be! Only think of my making such a blunder! But I must say in excuse that I had read in a great many books, and heard my father say—who you know has been much abroad—that in Paris and London no respectable women are seen walking the streets dressed as if for a ball. It is only the wretched outcasts of the sex that render their misfortunes more conspicuous by this flaring, unfeminine style of dressing. Fanny laughed at first at my mistake, and laughed ten times more at my excuses.

"It is so odd and old fashioned to hear one talk so," said she when she could speak.

But the strangest blunder of all was one I committed at a great ball, where the people were dressed still finer than in the streets. I can't tell for what reason, for they were so crowded together you could see nobody. I was so near being suffocated that I hurried down stairs, where I staid in a room without fire till I caught a sore throat. Here I saw a great many young gentlemen. But first I must tell you of an odd thing I observed at this party. Almost all the gentlemen wore spectacles, as I was assured, in consequence of having spoiled their eyes by hard study. No wonder there are so many beautiful poets and romance writers among them. But it is time to tell you of my blunder—the last, at present, on my list, though I dare say it won't be the last long.

A great many of the young men carried their hats under their arms, and little black sticks in their hands, just as the slight-of-hand men used to do. Do you know, I took them for conjurors?

"Conjurors!" said Fanny, laughing; "no, no, I assure you they are no conjurors."

"But what do they want of these conjuring rods then?"

"How new you are," said Fanny. "What under heaven do you suppose these young fellows would do at parties if it were not for their moustaches, their hats, and their conjuring rods? They don't dance, they don't talk, they don't think of any thing but themselves—and if it were not for adjusting the moustache, running their fingers through the hair, and slapping their legs with the conjuring rod, what would become of the poor creatures?"

They said Fanny was jilted a good while ago by a great beau who had travelled.

Well, I've got through my list, but I dare say I shall soon run up another, of which you shall know the items all in good time. Adieu, my dear cousin, and believe me, all the young gentleman's conjuring rods can't conjure you out of my heart.

Epitaphs.

Ah! seek not, reader, worth like his to learn
From chiselled tablet, or from "storied urn;"
For who to senseless marble can impart
The faintest impress of an angel's heart?
The widowed hand which consecrates this stone,
Would make her love, not his perfections, known;
For all a husband, parent, friend, should be,
All heaven approves or man admires—was he.

ON A GOOD MAN.

'Twas all he wished for, all his soul's desire,
To virtue's crown by virtue to aspire.

and delight in the variety of mind. We blame him only that his passions, prejudices, and bigotry engaged him in the unworthy task of obscuring the brighter glory of one of the most gifted and virtuous of men. We would even treat what we deem the faults of Johnson with a tenderness approaching respect, for they were results to a degree which man cannot estimate, of a diseased, irritable, nervous, unhappy physical temperament, and belonged to the body more than to the mind. We only ask the friends of genius not to put their faith in Johnson's delineations of it. His biographical works are tinged with his notoriously strong prejudices, and of all his 'Lives,' we hold that of Milton to be the most apocryphal."

It may be thought that, from the recently published works of this gifted writer, selections might have been offered, more interesting to the ordinary reader, upon subjects more immediately within the range of the general observation and interest. There may be ground for such an opinion, as several contributions from his pen have appeared in the Christian Examiner, of a highly exalted character. We would particularly designate the eloquent and philosophical treatise called forth by the publication of Scott's Life of Napoleon, in which the character of the modern Alexander was most ably discussed. But although the production, which has at present elicited our remarks, also originally appeared in the same journal, yet from the indistinct knowledge and interest of the public, respecting the prose writings of Milton, it was neither so universally read nor favourably received. The dazzling and romantic career of the hero was yet fresh in their recollections. He had just streamed, like a comet or a meteor, across the political heaven, and the light of his track had not faded. All listened with eagerness to anecdotes, histories, and disquisitions respecting him. Even as his name had filled the world, so his bodily form and features every where struck the eye. Here his calm face gazed down in marble or bronze; here his form at full length, with folded arms, seemed contemplating the wonders he had wrought among nations. We could not pass the streets without beholding Napoleon crossing the Alps—freezing in Russia—triumphant in Austria—arrayed in the magnificent insignia of royalty—or musing alone on his ocean rock. Every where the successful and wonderful soldier addressed himself to the sight and kindled the fancy. Milton, on the contrary, was a hacknied theme. His prose writings were just rescued from darkness and the dust, and were found to consist of theological disputes, upon points which the wisdom of later times has settled or their liberality has disregarded. It was our wish to call attention to that power of mind, by which our author has been able to invest his uninviting subject with a fascination, attractive even to the young and thoughtless.

Journal of a Residence and Tour in England, Scotland, and France, by N. S. Wheaton, A. M. pp. 520. Hartford, 1830.

Travels of every description seem daily to meet with less indulgence from the reading community. The public are growing most unreasonably fastidious on this subject, and receive the accounts which travellers give of their appetite, their breakfasts and dinners, the price they paid for them, and such interesting details, with much less avidity than these important statements formerly awakened. For ourselves we entertain none of these vile prejudices. We think that the man who kindly undertakes to inform his fellow-men of what he has eaten in his travels, and to improve their understandings by his own comments thereon, has a most unalienable right so to do. Others, however, have as undoubted a right to animadvert upon his publication, especially when, as in this case, the preface informs us that the author is utterly indifferent as to its reception.

Mr. Wheaton, rector of Christ church, Hartford, has recently published a journal of travels in England, Scotland, and France, which we had looked for with a more than ordinary degree of expectation. His advantages as a traveller were great. The object of his mission afforded him access to many distinguished characters, and it is to the journal of such tourists that we recur with peculiar interest. It is in their power to bring before their readers statesmen, clergy, and orators of other countries, and to unlock the sentiments and feelings of foreigners toward this nation. If they are men of intelligence and observation, and other objects do not engross their attention, a rich harvest of valuable information may easily be gathered. This the public have a right to expect. Most of Mr. Wheaton's time in England, it seems, was spent in attending church. Much of the first part of this volume, therefore, is occupied in clerical details. The author has given us an account of the personal appearance, manner, emphasis, gesture, inflexions, tone, pitch, compass, and strength of voice, matter and method of every preacher from "brother Miller up to the bishop of Durham," (together with the particular degree of edification he experienced from each,) with a fidelity and accuracy unequalled since Napier's treatise on Logarithms. But Mr. Wheaton did not go to England solely to go to church. This, though laudable, was still a collateral object of attraction. Every traveller either sets out with or soon finds some object which in a manner discloses the bent of his mind, and upon which his whole soul centres. One man discovers and points out the defects of a government, another holds converse with the littérati of the age, another portrays manners and customs, and in short the favourite purpose will develop itself on every page.

The leading, attracting object which characterizes our author's travels is, (so far as we can discover from its constant recurrence, from its commencing every chapter and meeting us at every turn,) to bring to light the enormous extortions of English innkeepers and waiters, and to deprecate in the strongest language the multifarious ways of filching sixpences from a man's pocket. So happily has our traveller succeeded in satirizing these transatlantic lacqueys, that we think not a soul of them can ever again look an American traveller in the face. This is undoubtedly a worthy object of research and exposure, but proceeding, as it appears to us, from rather a singular source. Should a footman, or valet, or retailer of tape, see fit to publish his travels, his lamentations on this species of abuse, or something equally lofty, would not excite surprise; but to see a man of education, a follower of the noblest profession, return from Old England's classic soil, with which every thing interesting in modern history and literature is so closely interwoven, to dole out a miserable tale of the pence that have been wrung from his unwilling gripe, verily, affords the reader a specimen of the moral sublime, equalled only by the travelled tailor, who, having arrived at Niagara's majestic fall, exclaimed, with enthusiastic rapture, "What a place to sponge a coat!" We think we hear Mr. Wheaton, as he wanders through Westminster Abbey, or lingers at Milton's tomb, or hurries through Stratford-on-Avon, exclaiming with noble excitement, "what a place to sponge a traveller!"

But to proceed with the journal. After discharging a most unreasonable bill at Dick's, and paying at another place little less than five dollars for a dinner, principally of roast beef, after giving two guineas a week for lodging, and two shillings to a rascally police-officer, after having thrown sixpence at a beggarly menial of a museum-keeper, with about the same feeling (as he expresses it) with which one would throw a bone at a snarling dog, after paying every bill, (of which he takes good care to give his readers an account, accompanied with an episode on extortion,) after being hooted at by an unmannerly scoundrel of a waiter, to whom he refused the customary fee, and a thousand other adventures of equal peril and importance, our traveller finally leaves England, and proceeds to France. Paris, he opines, would differ little from other large cities if divested of the palaces, gardens, and monuments. But alas, alas! he finds the French not a whit better than the English. In his touching words he says, "I find my ignorance of the language a serious evil in the article of douceurs and expenses." Not understanding French enough to dispute and parley with the cabriolet drivers and café-keepers, his slippery sixpences still vanish as rapidly as ever, and this is the only subject upon which he feels the want of the French language. Woe to these gentry, say we, if he had understood their dialect! But enough of this. Mr. Wheaton by interlarding every chapter with execrations and denunciations against a custom which has ever existed in England and most foreign countries, and which every gentleman expects, has rendered his journal (otherwise pleasing) distasteful, and not unfrequently disgusting. His style is sprightly, often classical; and he sometimes kindles with an emotion which, on any topic but waiters and sixpences, would reflect much credit on his sensibility. His description of the "Pomfret Statues" is a happy specimen of playful humour, while that of Oxford and the house of commons, presents a fair sample of his graver writing. We really feel much indebted to him for his minute account of orators and the style of oratory, as exhibited in the house of lords and commons, as well as other popular assemblies. His portraits of the members, and particularly Brougham, are fine. The untiring industry of that distinguished individual, which enables him "to labour in the court of king's bench all day—debate in the house of commons most of the night—be in the exchequer often—before the privy council whenever it meets—mingle much in society, and yet find time for literary pursuits," makes him an object of admiration to all; and Mr. Wheaton's brief account of the appearance and manner of this statesman is one of his happiest efforts. His remark, that nearly all the master-spirits of the British parliament have been distinguished as scholars before they became eminent statesmen, is undoubtedly correct; and his application of this fact to young men who have the misfortune to consider themselves born bright geniuses, is well worthy the attention of every aspirant after usefulness and distinction.

On the whole, much correct observation is displayed in his volume, and, but for the unaccountable mania for sixpences, and a little too much of the caviling spirit toward the clergy, his journal would have assumed a far more elevated rank among this class of productions than is at present the case. One word as to the general moral tendency of travelling, to which Englishmen and Americans are so prone, will close our already too extended remarks. We are not of that number who think that travelling changes the man—

"Cœlum non animum mutant, qui trans mare currunt."

"How many a light, empty shell of a young man," says a distinguished author, "comes home full, if not of sense, at least of something bearing the semblance of sense. How many a lout returns enlivened into a conversable being." It seems to increase and give vigour to a man's natural propensities and habits, rather than to create any new traits of character. Does he set forth with a carping, caviling, fault-finding spirit; he travels to find fault and returns to cavil. Does he leave his country with a soul which, "bounded by a nutshell, would feel itself in infinite space;" he comes home with his aspirations if possible confined to a smaller sphere. Does one of those beings of the human family cross the ocean who, as Webster defines them, dress like a doll and carry their character on their backs, (and but too many of these abuse this incalculable privilege;) it returns a more finished, superfluous puppy than it went over. Does the traveller leave his native shore with the noble ambition of scolding waiters, and disputing their demands for sixpence; this lofty trait is more fully developed, and his twopenny controversial talents reach their highest perfection. On the contrary, does a man of true greatness appreciate the full advantage of observing mankind and manners; he returns from his travels with his mind expanded, his views elevated and enlarged, and frequently becomes an object of respect and admiration.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

THE proprietor of this journal respectfully announces to his readers that THEODORE S. FAY, Esq. will hereafter be associated with him in the editorial labours of the New-York Mirror. Mr. Fay is so favourably known as the author of the communications under the initial F., that we feel confident this arrangement will afford general satisfaction. The proprietorship remains unchanged.

February in New-York.—This month derives its name from the Latin februius, alluding to the expiatory sacrifices which were offered up at this season by the ancient Romans, for the purifying of the people. By the Saxons it was called Colewort, or Wortspring, because that species of plant first sprouted in this month. In the year 1812, being leap-year, February was distinguished by five Saturdays, beginning and ending on that day. "For forty years before," says Shallust, "the same day of the month had not corresponded with the same day of the week; and a considerable majority of the millions who at present inhabit the earth will not witness the circumstance of five Saturdays occurring in February."

In all countries this month, like every other, is marked by phenomena, avocations, duties, and recreations peculiar to itself; varying, however, in accordance with circumstances and location. Among its phenomena may be mentioned the entrance of the sun into what was anciently called the twelfth sign of the zodiac, or pisces, and the circumstance of one day being added to it every four years. These signs were, by the ancient poets, not inaptly denominated inns, or baiting places for Sol, as he travelled the circular turnpike in his chariot of fire. Rail-roads and steamers were not then in fashion. This idea has been quaintly alluded to by one of our own poets, in the following lines:

"The scaly star, pisces, soon greeted his eye,
"His old stopping place, if the ancients don't lie,
"Who counted this inn as the last on his route,
"Is sign is so tempting—a fine salmon trout!"

With respect to the duties and recreations proper for this month, they must necessarily vary according to situation and the different callings of mankind. The husbandman devotes it to securing the safety, nourishment, and comfort of the rational and irrational beings committed to his charge, and in making preparations for the approaching seed-time; the merchant is anxiously awaiting his expected stock of spring goods; the tailor is equally impatient for the new fashions for spring suits; while the lawyer gravely pockets the fees for his winter suits. Balls and sleigh-rides furnish the requisite "excitements" for the rural lasses, while soirees, assemblies, routes, little Rosciuses, and big elephants, attract our city belles.

But the present February is, and is to be, distinguished by new and extraordinary circumstances. In the first place, and for the first time in several years, it made its entrance amid the "tinkling of sleigh-bells," and beheld a bridge of ice uniting the ancient city of New-Amsterdam with Communipaw in the Jerseys. In the next, it is to present us with the grand phenomenon of a nearly annular and almost total solar eclipse! The saucy moon is about to interpose her little form right between our goodly earth and its parent sun; and which of us will be so ungallant to her ladyship as to imitate the ancient philosopher, when he bade the conqueror of the world to stand out of his light? This eclipse must portend something, "if philosophy could find it out;" and we advise the ladies not only to guard their necks from slip-nooses, and their feet from snow-water, but also their hearts from still more dangerous snares. The late unusual fall of snow didn't come for nothing—and many soft things may be whispered in ears that are protected from the weather by a buffalo-skin, in spite of the envious jingle of a collar of bells, or the deafening shouts of some modern Jehu in a box-coat and fur-cap.

But "February in New-York" was to be the subject of this article, for here it is distinguished by one ancient custom which the rest of mankind, in no section of the globe, have ever thought fit to emulate. But it is unnecessary to describe in humble prose what has already been painted to our hand in "tuneful measure," in the following extract from Woodworth's poem of "Quarter-day":

"While yet Aquarius, from his ponderous jar,
With liberal hand, on winter's frosty shrine,
His gelid offering pours, libations rude
Of noxious vapours, sleet, and hail, and rain;
While yet the town in desolation lies,
The streets delightless, save the tuneful hum
Of tinkling sleigh-bells; and while yet the clock
Of annual tenure strikes three-quarters past,
With 'note of preparation,' now the search
For tenements begins. Now rents increase,
And half our population, or for that,
Or business, or for fashion, must remove,
And with bright May begin another year.
'Tis the strange mania that disclaims a cure,
Though its impolicy great Franklin urged,
And sad experience demonstrates the fact:
Now on the poetic and lintels of our doors
Appear the mystic scrolls, uncouthly traced,
Putting to blush orthography and sense;
But plain enough to let the passer know
Their vast import—'a house, or rooms to let.'"

Education.—It is gratifying to perceive that the subject of education in this country is annually gaining higher importance. Men of acknowledged talents and education are frequently engaged in compiling and composing volumes, to be used in institutions of learning, and for the general advantage of the rising generation. We are not among those enthusiastic advocates of modern improvements, who believe that the art of writing may be taught in six lessons, or that any short cut has been, or can be discovered, to the steep and arduous summit of the hill of science; but we are fully impressed with the conviction that much yet remains to be accomplished in simplifying school-books, in placing more select and better adapted models before the youth, and especially in elevating the profession of the teacher to that respectability and rank which as well as any other, it should hold in the public estimation.

The emoluments of a school-master should equal if not exceed those of any other citizen, and he should stand so high in society as to render the station, not only tolerable, but enviable to those individuals who, in other occupations, reap both pecuniary reward and reputation.

He should be in every respect a gentleman, as well as a scholar; and no parent should commit his child to the superintendence of any individual whom he would not be willing to receive freely upon equal terms as his friend and associate. How far this desirable and rational state of society differs from that which actually prevails, it is not our present intention to discuss, but only to congratulate our fellow-citizens upon the evident impulse given to the public mind in relation to a subject so influential upon the prosperity and happiness of the nation. The late Governor Clinton, amid the multifarious duties of his political situation, never relaxed his exertions to increase the number, and improve the character, of schools; to provide every possible facility for diffusing knowledge, in its simplest and cheapest form, throughout the remotest parts of the state; and his unremitting and successful efforts to promote every internal branch of physical improvement, entitle him less to the gratitude and admiration of his country than the zeal with which he toiled to multiply the sources of information among the people; and to encourage, and exalt the standing of those in any way connected with her literary establishments. We do not hope that the system of universal education will work the miraculous consequences which many philanthropists so confidently anticipate. The clashing interests and passions inherent in human nature will still create the various forms of crime and misery, which the experience of past generations proves incidental to the mortal state; but improvements may be certainly wrought, sufficiently valuable to encourage every effort in the cause. Our republic, perhaps more than any other government at present in existence, is dependent upon the intelligence of the great body of the people. The late important and startling collision between the highest branch of our national power and one of the members of our confederation, and which almost sanctions the melancholy opinion that the revolutionary convulsions of the old continent are felt in the foundations of our own, affords a practical illustration of the truth which we would advance.

In case these events should assume a more alarming aspect, and individuals in authority should lose their distinct comprehension of, and pure interest in, the general welfare, amid the temptations of highly excited and personal passions, an appeal to the good sense and enlightened intelligence of the nation could alone ensure our political existence.

A new custom.—There is at present, on a visit to this city, a painter of much celebrity, who, in the good old days of Knickerbocker and Salmagundi, was often "wont to set the table in a roar." Among numerous instances of his facetiousness, preserved by fame, we hope there are not many readers too splenetic to laugh at the following, which, with a little aid from the imagination, is irresistible. One day observing a Spaniard, just landed, of colossal stature and genuine grave and Spanish dignity, stalking through Broadway with a box of cigars under his arm, he slyly took his station immediately behind him, at the same time imitating his strut and demeanor. He then, by signs and motions, directed every acquaintance he met to follow his example, and, as he was almost universally known, by his own exertions and the combined and geometrically increasing endeavours of his companions, the unsuspecting foreigner was soon heading a procession of some hundred or two of individuals, all mimicking the haughty strides of their leader. His surprise and indignation, expressed in broken English, when, on turning down Courtland-street, the extraordinary and unaccountable length of his train burst suddenly upon him, must have been not the less amusing from the seriousness with which our wag replied to his numerous inquiries "that it was a custom, in New-York, for the citizens to attend foreigners of distinction home, and smoke a cigar with them on the first day of their arrival!"

Charitable institutions.—However philanthropic may be the object of the various plans, conceived by the benevolent portion of society, for the relief of the poor and wretched, the greatest degree of caution and prudence is necessary to prevent their producing consequences unexpectedly evil. It is generally acknowledged that unregulated and gratuitous donations, except to the sick or aged, have a tendency to confirm habits of indolence, and to attract, from other quarters, crowds of the idle and destitute. Similar institutions should be under the superintendence of officers appointed by government. They should be constructed upon principles advanced by the wise and learned, on due deliberation, and their endeavours should be as powerfully directed towards the prevention of evil as its correction. Among the objects calculated to excite sympathy, but which, in the multifarious concerns of a great and populous city, are in danger of being overlooked, there is one possessing strong claims upon our attention, although associated with guilt. We allude to the desolate situation of the convicts released from prison. Many of them have suffered years of confinement for crimes perpetrated in early youth, into which they may have been led, more from the fatal influence of bad example and pernicious company, than from any inherent vicious propensity. A boy, committed at the age of twelve or sixteen, for a term perhaps of fourteen years, finds himself at twenty-six or thirty cast out upon society, with a curse branded on his forehead. No matter what moral effect so protracted a confinement may have wrought upon him, no matter how deeply he regrets the thoughtless error of his boyhood, and how earnestly he is desirous of performing, honestly and industriously, the duties of a citizen, he is shunned as a pestilence. They of whom he seeks labour find contamination in his touch. He is necessarily thrown among associates of the worst description, until absolute want and desperation prove too powerful for his principles, and drive him once more to violate the laws. This might be obviated by an institution in some way connected with the state-prison, established for the purpose of affording employment for those released from confinement, many of whom are excellent tradesmen, and need only encouragement, and means of applying their skill as artisans, to become good citizens and honest men.

Connecticut Mirror.—We perceive, with much pleasure, that this journal has been placed under the editorial charge of Lewis G. Clarke, Esq. The selection of this gentleman to fill a station but recently occupied by Mr. Dwight, of the Daily advertiser, Mr. Stone, of the New-York Commercial, and the late gifted Brainerd, is a flattering testimonial of the light in which his character and literary attainments are regarded. We know him to be a gentleman, a scholar, and, moreover, a fine writer, whose application and talents cannot fail to sustain the extended reputation which this gazette has already acquired from the exertions of his predecessors.

Buried alive.—The papers state that a Miss Jane Darley has been recently liberated from the four courts' marshalsea, Dublin, after having been imprisoned during a period of thirty-four years. The original debt for which a human being was thus incarcerated alive in a sepulchre, reared by the hands of civilized men, in the midst of a splendid city, was eleven pounds! During the last seventeen years she was confined for the fees and rent due to the marshal!

New-York University.—The council of the new university met on Monday last. The following gentlemen were unanimously elected officers:—Albert Gallatin, president; Morgan Lewis, vice-president; John Delafield, secretary; Samuel Ward, treasurer; and James M. Mathews, chancellor. The preliminary arrangements necessary to the establishment of this institution are rapidly progressing, and its success may now be confidently anticipated. If properly directed, it will form a very important feature in the character of our city.

Portrait of Bishop Hobart.—A fine engraving, and we are happy to add, a striking likeness, of this deeply-lamented prelate, will accompany the forthcoming "Memorial of Bishop Hobart," now in the press of the Messrs. Swords of this city.

The Vesper Bell.—At the request of numerous subscribers, this popular piece of music has been placed on the last page. Our next numbers will, successively, contain several choice selections from the opera of Cinderella, copied from the original score, and never before, we believe, published in this country.

The Daily Sentinel.—The editor of this paper has convinced us that we had mistaken the purport of the remarks of their Paris correspondent. We find the passage before alluded to will not bear the construction which we too hastily gave it. In closing this controversy, we are pleased to say, that unlike the great majority of editorial bickerings, it has been conducted by the Sentinel with courtesy and moderation—always excepting the misapplication to us of the word aristocrat.

Dr. Drake.—We copy the following posthumous effusions of this fine poet from the New-York American. We are almost tempted, after the example of our contemporary, to publish some exquisite stanzas, by the same writer, from a manuscript in our possession, and are only prevented by the hope that a revised and corrected edition of the works of Dr. Drake will, ere long, be given to the world. The extracts, it will be perceived, are from three different pieces.

See through the clouds that roll in wrath,
Yon little star benignant peep,
To light along their trackless path
The wanderers of the stormy deep.

And thus, oh, Hope! thy lively form
In sorrow's gloomy night, shall be
The star that looks through cloud and storm,
Upon a dark and moonless sea.

When heaven is all serene and fair,
Full many a brighter gem we meet;
'Tis when the tempest hovers there,
Thy beam is most divinely sweet.

The rainbow, with the sun's decline,
Like faithless friends, will disappear;
Thy lights, dear star, more brightly shine,
When all is wail and sorrow here.

And though Aurora's stealing gleam,
May wake a morning of delight,
'Tis only thy enchanting beam,
Will smile amid affliction's night.

Unveil her mind, but hide her face,
And love will want no fuel;
Alas! that such an ugly case
Should hide so rich a jewel.

The heart that revels in passion's dream,
But feasts on its own decay;
As the snow-wreath welcomes the sun's warm beam,
And smiles while it melts away.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

ALTHOUGH the following sketch makes no pretension to the studied and stately style of composition so much in vogue at the present time, yet it is characterized by a pleasing grace and lightness, which cannot but prove acceptable to the admirers of easy and natural writing. It inculcates a useful moral, which, it is to be regretted, in the fugitive pieces of modern poets, so seldom forms a leading object.

THE TEAZINGS OF IMAGINATION.

THE muse has tried to teach me, but, alas!
I'm dull and so unapt to learn; and yet
Unskilled, as I confess I am, I love
Her swift winged thoughts to aim at—though I scarce
By any chance can hit—they fly so fast.
But, as I said, attempting is a pleasure;
And though, in some slight hope of praise, I write,
My end is chiefly to amuse myself.
Indulge my humour then, I pray you, friend,
And, if my words offend you, turn your head.
My theme is jealousy: he I write of
Was a Spaniard—named Ancisco.
In Florida his home was, near St. Pierre.
No house was ever prettier set;
'Twas in a valley of an oval form;
Spacious in size, but of proportion just—
A carpet, of soft sod, light green, was spread,
Embossed with ornamental orange trees;
And round were placed high serviceable hills,
Which screened in winter from cold rushing air,
And in the summer by their shade refreshed.
Outside the valley and the entrance through,
You saw a river and boats gliding by,
Whence oft was heard the cheerful boatman's laugh,
Or wildest music (to the north unknown)
From a rude instrument—a wooden trumpet.
Reader, you smile, but by some Orpheus breathed,
When nothing moves, and silence reigns around,
And languid on the shady earth you lie,
Breathing the fresh air of a summer night
Beneath the lofty glittering dome of heaven,
In love, perhaps, and much to musing prone,
Its mellow rustic notes would force from thee
A tear—it hath such soul-awakening power.
But I am loitering sadly—let us on.
'Twas in the morning, in July, and, pleased,
Out on a cool and shady balcony,
Ancisco and his wife, young Nora, sat:
A curious contrast—youth in all its bloom,
And withered, withered age, just fit to fall.
But Nora was the prettiest blossom!
The choicest one you'd name her—never hues
More exquisite than those were on her cheeks,
Nor softness that invited mischief more;
You longed to touch them lightly—merely once
To feel how soft they were—and risk a stain.
And from her little throat—such notes—so full
Of love and melody! how strange, amidst
The many throats now framed, so few like hers!
But she was heaven's master-piece I think,
And gave new glory to her Maker's name.
Admiring her was then but pleasing him;
It surely was an act of piety.
How pious old Ancisco was, you now
Shall hear.
We left them in the balcony. 'Twas warm,
And in warm climes one should not dress too much.
Ye gods! a bust like hers you never saw—
Not though you've been at Florence. How the old Man smiled to think the Venus was his own!
But, as he thought and smiled, he raised his head,
And saw a stranger near and loitering—
Long gazing, passing on, and turning still Backward to gaze on Nora; a fair youth
With ruby lip, and restless glittering eyes,
Unlike to common dull reality—
Resembling more creations of the mind—
He looked like young Adonis, whom the queen
Of beauty loved to such excess. Alas!
It is no wonder the old man should fear.
He feared indeed—you would have pitied him.
Fled were his smiles; with hurried hands he hid
Her shoulders with her shawl, and her fair cheeks,
With juggling quickness, drew a veil before.
He shall not see her, thought he, for most men,
Will want, like children, what they see—and loth
Were I this stripling's tempted blood to trust.
"The flies are troublesome, my love, let's in."
He led her to her room—then closed the blinds.

"I fear the sun will be too warm," he said.
She kindly thanked him—"mimicked well," thought he.
It sadly chanced that day ('twas sad indeed)
He'd named an hour to receive some scrolls
Of paper—pressed by graven copperplates—
In short, bank bills; he'd sold a cotton crop,
And had a vision of new rustling notes.
His wife he loved, but loved his money too.
'Twas some way off—but yet he needs must go.
The time was near—he left her—closed the door,
And then he stood in doubt to turn the key.
Distrusting is but urging on to ruin:
He rightly deemed it foolish policy.
He scarce had left the valley, ere the pains,
The torturing anguish of his soul began:
'Twas rather rash—I would she were not there.
This fellow may be honest; but the young
Become corrupt in this lascivious land.
I saw a smile, too, in that fellow's face,
Where threat'ning mischief tried to hide itself!"
Sudden as light Ancisco homeward turned,
And in his rising madness wildly swore,
Were all the east to heap her treasures up,
They should not tempt him onward at that hour.
(Now such an oath from one like old Ancisco,
Who loved his money as he loved his life, Showed what a state his shattered wits were in.)
In furious haste he hurried back, and loud
In quick breathed anguish, cried, "Stay, Nora! stay!
Oh! torture not thy old Ancisco thus!
An erring, but a kind old man to thee,
Whose fault, suspicion, has from fondness sprung.
O! do not, by one thoughtless act of thine
Bring him to sorrow, and ere long to death,
For he can never live for men to smile
And spurn him as they would a wretch diseased!"
"Ancisco! 'twas a luckless day to thee,
Thy wedding day; it might be thought that thou
Hadst seen enough of life's companionship,
To warn thee what this matrimony was.
But should it be, as I too surely know,
I never more can live in this dull world—
Its charms are lost if she be false to me.
Of these few friends I still have left, I'll take
My leave, nor shall a tear be seen to tell
My suffering—nay more, I'll force a smile,
And sound the very notes of cheerfulness,
Although my aching heart be like to break,
And I will say we'll shortly meet once more—
I would not give their blessed spirits pain,
And yet, without one parting look, I could
Not leave the few I cherish here.
"But no! the boasting dastard shall not live!
Though endless flames I writhe in for the dead,
I'll strike a poinard to my rival's heart!"
Furious his haste—his arm upraised, he seemed
A spirit of destruction on the earth.
One overwhelming theme now bore along
The soul from all it else might linger near;
It seemed beyond the sense's power to dwell
On aught beside; unheeded was the light
That, passing through the thin and silken clouds,
The eye undazzled loves to look upon.
To him the partial grove no fragrance sent,
Nor music from its gay musicians;
He saw not—heard not in his rapid course.
Impatient of delay, he did not knock
At Nora's door, but, with a maniac's strength,
Struck one rude blow, and broke in twain its bolts
With insolent profanity—and glanced Around with madman's gaze—but Nora was Not there! (alas, he sought her but in vain.)
"I cannot find her," said he, in dismay,
And then in each apartment quickly searched.
"I left her in her chamber. Can it be
That all her fondness has been woman's guile?"
Dubious he stood, (for hope was lingering still)
And questioned now was every ink slave.
"Unseen, perchance, she yet may have been there;"
And then he searched the rooms again, but found
Her not. "Help! help!" he cried; "he among you
Who finds his mistress is that moment free;
His master shall his endless debtor live,
And whatsoever he name, I grant the boon.
At home—abroad—seek every haunt around.
Sure are ye all you have not seen her go?"
Not one had seen her on that morning pass.
"Perhaps she's walked unto the river's side—
She sometimes strolls that way. But feed not thus,
Thy soul with hope, old man, thy Nora ne'er
Shall come to thee again—thy Nora, who Thy love—thy pride—thy fairest treasure was—
Why am I blasted with this curse, O heaven?"

He paused. "She is not there—but still to know
Is better than to doubt our misery."
He went despondent toward the river's bank,
(The pretty stream I mentioned—that ran near;)
Beneath a beach, whose thick-leaved branches leest
One hallowed spot with coolness and with shade,
A lady sat, the smooth stream sketching, and
The lazy boats, that silent moved along.
"Can it then be? 'tis she! by heaven, 'tis she!"
He cried, and smiled in ecstasy. It was His Nora. Midst her harmless task disturbed,
She rose and listened, like a timid fawn;
But, when her eyes Ancisco's met, a ray
Of joy brought out their brilliancy—
No gems such sparkling lustre ever had.
With tones of heaven's own love and purity,
She calmly asked him if he thought her lost?
And thus, it seems, imagination's jest
Had been to tease this self-tormenting dolt
With visions false—her own creation all.
The youth had looked, 'tis true—but never thought
Of robbing one who never him had harmed—
And Nora had not even seen him pass.
I thank thee, reader, if thou'st read my verse;
And, if approved, why then I thank thee more;
If neither, stand we as we did before.

TASSO IN PRISON.

And Tasso is their glory and their shame.—Byron.

WE translate, from the "Courrier des Etats Unis," the subjoined sketch of a visit to the author of "Jerusalem Delivered" in prison. We cannot introduce it to our readers more appropriately than by a short history of the life of this ardent, impassioned, unhappy child of song.

The life of the man of genius is seldom one of true enjoyment. "He does not love the world, nor the world him." He is not fit for that sharp and anxious strife, that jar and din of clashing interests in which it is his fate to move. Most men of genius are of that temperament known as the nervous—all are subject to that morbidly excited state of feeling, too strong to be regulated by the sufferer's reason, too dear to his affections to be avoided even while it is destroying his mind and body. They dream away their lives in visions they never expect to see realized, which, pure and bright and beautiful as they are, are yet painful from their contrast with every-day experience, and which wear away to no purpose the strength and substance of the soul. In the pursuit of their favourite objects they "lose and neglect the creeping hours of time," and waste lives given them as a season of trial and probation in sickly vanity, in melancholy musings in visionary triumphs. This is the price they pay for the late fame that descends on their sepulchres—this is the price that was paid for the "Jerusalem Delivered." Such a character as we have tried to describe, was Tasso—a man, if ever there was one, "of imagination all compact;" helpless as a child in the business of life, with a mind too fine and fragile to bear the rude encounter of the world, and too weak to guard reason on her throne when the frenzy of love, fear, or hate shook her empire. He was of the vain, sensitive, irritable temperament of Rousseau, a constitution which, from the false views it took of the world, the obstinacy with which it clung to its delusions, and the extreme acuteness of emotion it indulged to the destruction of every healthy feeling, trembled on the very brink of madness. But Tasso's, unlike his, was always a pure and gentle spirit, a celestial inhabitant condemned to live out of its sphere, like Ariel imprisoned in the pine, unable either to alter or to endure its fate.

Tasso was born in 1544, at Sorrento, near Naples. At the age of nineteen he composed his Rinaldo, a romantic poem, dedicated to Luigi D'Este, brother of Alfonso, Duke of Ferrara.
He gained great reputation by this, his first work. Alfonso invited him to his palace, where he entertained him for a while with ostentatious generosity. Literary patronage was hereditary in this family; but in Alfonso it was selfish and degrading rather than liberal, and he encouraged Tasso's rising genius only for the sake of the reputation he knew he himself would earn by his munificence.

We have spoken of Tasso's unhappy temper. When he came to mix in the gay and busy life of a court, he felt himself out of his place; he was awkward and confused, and became irritable, morose, and petulant. He conceived a violent passion for the duke's sister, Leonora D'Este, which he wanted prudence to conceal, or to express with caution. This was a crime sufficient in itself to draw down the vengeance of a haughty Italian prince, and pretexts for gratifying it were easily found. Tasso is said, among other things, to have drawn a knife on a servant of the duke's in his palace, an offence, as we know, severely punished at that day in most courts. Dreading the consequences of this fault, which his busy imagination magnified tenfold, he fled in terror throughout Italy, presented himself without money, without attendants, without a passport, at the gate of Turin, where he was for a long time refused admittance. He was kindly entertained by the duke of Savoy, but fled from his court in vague fear of treachery. His love led him back to Ferrara, where he was thrown into confinement. Some say that he was thus punished for having one day, in a transport of ungovernable passion, kissed Leonora before the whole court. Whatever be the cause, it is certain that Alfonso shut him up for seven years in the hospital of St. Anne.

In this confinement Tasso's ever active brain became overwrought. At one time he fancied himself poisoned, at another the victim of magic; he saw a thousand horrible undefined shapes of terror haunting his pillow and fitting round his dungeon. Many memorials of his captivity are preserved, some the ravings of madness, others the more plaintive notes of a suffering and broken spirit. Of the latter kind is the following fragment, said to have been written on his prison wall.

"O, traveller, that to Pindus takest thy way,
Where hangs my harp upon a cypress tree,
Salute it in my name and say,
That I am old in years and misery."

While he was yet in prison, the "Jerusalem Delivered" was published, without his consent and from an imperfect copy. It excited great applause, and still more violent contests among the Italian critics. In these disputes, enfeebled as his mind was, Tasso took an active part; he roused himself from his sick bed to alter, not indeed to improve his poem, for the new version, called "Gerusalemme Conquistata," with four additional cantos, was every way unworthy of him. After a time he was restored to liberty and the world, though never again to hope and pleasure. The Medici, the rivals of the house of Este in literary glory, interfered to rescue him, and all Italy interposed in his behalf. After seven years' confinement he was liberated, but his lofty aspirations were checked, his high hopes crushed, the spring of his spirit was broken, and he never afterwards attempted to soar on the "seraph wings" of inspiration. Such were some of the trials which wounded unto death the "thrilling frame," and crushed the "eagle spirit" of this child of song, and which darkened his life, though they could throw no cloud over the brightness of his genius.

THE MADMAN.

Two strangers of distinction just arrived at Ferrara were visiting the hospital, or rather prison of St. Anne, wherein are confined those whom misfortune has deprived of reason. The head of the elder traveller was completely bald, and his countenance presented an union of naiveté and acuteness, good nature and dignity. * * * The cavalier who accompanied him seemed his junior by some years. His perfumed locks hung in curls under a cap glittering with jewels. A short cloak of scarlet velvet, richly embroidered, was gracefully arranged on his shoulders, showing, however, a doublet faced with ermine, and the large and brilliant rings of a costly chain of gold. His hand, covered with a silken glove, rested on the pommel of a sword suspended round his neck by a satin scarf, and the clang of his silver spurs disturbed the silence of the long corridors he traversed.

"Etienne de la Boetie," said his companion to him in French, "this jailer seems to me as stupid as he is hideous; certainly he cannot give us any information as to what we see here. I am sorry for it, for my curiosity is greatly excited by the strange appearance of this place."

At these words a young Italian, who was walking in the gallery, approached them, and addressing them in French, offered to be their guide in their visit to the hospital.

"I can explain to you," said he, "the nature of the complaint of all the unhappy wretches who are confined here."

"The offer is so courteous that the Seigneur de Montaigne and myself hasten to accept it," answered Boetie.

Their new guide, Strozzi, conducted Montaigne and his friend through a long passage formed by narrow dungeons, before each of which he paused to explain with much ability the peculiar species of insanity under which its tenant laboured.

His just reflections, and the agreeable form in which he clothed them, charmed the two strangers, and woke in their hearts a crowd of thoughts which sometimes overflowed in tears.

The poet and Montaigne were about pursuing the sad train of their reflections, when they were suddenly interrupted by a voice from a dungeon, the door of which creaked on its huge hinges as it opened. A man, covered with rags and bowed down by suffering rather than age, issued from it cautiously, casting around him looks of anxious inquiry. His hair and beard were in disorder, but his pallid and withered features were still noble and imposing.

He advanced mysteriously towards the strangers, and taking a letter from his breast, "As you are christian men," said he, in a low and earnest tone, "carry this letter to the princess Leonora D'Este."

Boetie exchanged a smile with Montaigne and Strozzi, and, not to irritate the delusion of the unhappy being who addressed him, took the letter.

"You think me mad," said he, "and do not distinguish me from the degraded beings among whom I have been thrown! Alas! I hardly know myself how I have preserved my reason among the odious torments to which I am subjected. Hurried away from the midst of a brilliant court to breathe the poisoned air of a dungeon, torn from the sweet dreams of glory, friendship, and love, to groan for seven years in solitude, or among madmen and tortures, and to curse the fatal gift of genius and the glory of my name—who could long bear such a life? In the name of the mother of God," cried he, embracing the knees of Montaigne, and bathing them with his tears, "in mercy put an end to my misery! Tell Leonora in what a horrid abode I languish, and she herself will come to rescue me. But you hesitate, you fear her brother—well may you fear him, for his vengeance is terrible, insatiable. Well, then, tell Conza, tell the prince of Mantua, tell Cardinal Cinthio, the friend of my childhood, that here, here, under another name—"

The harsh voice of the jailer was suddenly heard, and the echoes of the dungeon repeated the sound of his heavy and hurried steps. The poor prisoner shuddered, was silent, and ran in terror to hide himself in his dungeon, which the brutal jailer closed upon him without interrupting the canzonetta he was humming to himself.

"The disorder of this madman," said the young Italian to the sympathizing travellers, "is to fancy himself beloved by a lady of distinction. Sometimes he waters with his tears letters which he fancies he has received from her; sometimes he speaks in the accents of despair of festivals, tourneys, and triumphs. Sometimes he sings verses, and traces them on his prison wall whenever a little light is granted him as a favour, for there is nothing furious in his insanity. His is a deep melancholy, a gloomy, unalterable sadness. His verses are always addressed to the imaginary object of his passion, and the letter he has given you is, I doubt not, filled with expressions of tenderness."

"Tis even so," said Montaigne, who had been reading it. "He writes to the princess of Ferrara as though the august Leonora returned all his ardent affection! He reminds her of their nightly meetings, and doubts not but that she will hasten hither to deliver him, as soon as she knows his captivity. Poor human nature," added he, with a sigh, "all that I have seen here is a weighty argument in favour of that bold saying of Pliny, that 'there is nothing more contemptible or more haughty than man.'"

Soon after a vague, confused noise was heard in the hospital, and the Cardinal Cinthio, whom Montaigne had seen at court the evening before, entered hastily, followed by the prior Antonio Mosti. His features expressed the most intense emotion, and a spot of angry red glowed on his visage. The prior took his enormous bundle of keys from the jailer, and opened himself the massive door which had just been closed on the unhappy captive, who still occupied the minds of the strangers.

Cinthio threw himself in tears into the arms of the wretched prisoner, who eyed him with a sort of gloomy and stupid joy.

"O, my friend!" exclaimed the cardinal, as soon as his sobs would permit him to speak, "was I to find thee thus!" Then turning to the spectators of this touching scene, "Strangers," said he, "see how the duke of Ferrara rewards genius! Tell your countrymen, tell the universe that Torquato Tasso has groaned seven years in this den of infamy while all were lamenting his death. Come, my noble friend," added he, "fly this accursed spot, Rome has palms and triumphs in store for thee."

After their departure, Montaigne, a little confused at his mistake, was silent. Finally, taking leave of Strozzi, he thanked him warmly for the politeness with which he had acted as their guide.

"How is this," asked the latter, gravely, "are you going to leave me without worshipping me?" Montaigne looked at him with astonishment. "Dull mortal!" continued the young Italian, "has not my sublime genius which has caused your admiration, has not the gift of tongues which I possess revealed to you my mysterious divinity? Down on your knees," he shouted the next moment in fury, seizing Montaigne by the throat, "down on your knees, profane wretch, or I'll strangle you!"

Boetie and the jailer rescued Montaigne from the hands of the madman, and as he was dragged off to his cell, "My friend," said Montaigne, adjusting his robe, "verily we have no cause to hold up our heads proudly and boast of the perfection of our reason, since we have admired the talents of a madman, and taken the greatest genius of Italy for a lunatic. Of a truth Socrates was in the right when he professed that he knew but this one thing, that he knew nothing; Pliny was right when he wrote 'there is nothing certain but uncertainty,' and I am right in repeating after them, what do I know?"

THE CENSOR.

THE LITTLE GENIUS.

No. 105.

THE thirsty feeling of revenge has ever been a stranger to my bosom. I have seen it infuse into the young, the wise, and the noble, the savage recklessness of a ferocious beast; but I could not comprehend how one familiar with the passions, frailties, and temptations of human nature, could suffer such a feeling for one of his fellow-creatures to agitate his bosom. It might, I thought, spring up unwarily in his heart; but all the kindlier elements of his disposition and reason, would prompt him to crush it in its bud, or tear it up by the roots, long before it could reach maturity, and exercise its powerful influence over his actions.

The Genius showed me a man in a dimly lighted apartment, sleeping on an ottoman. The moon shone through the high arched casement, and painted its form on the rich carpet. I was awed by the solemnity of night.

"It is enough," I said, "to put all the unruly passions of the world to sleep."

"Behold," said my companion, "how it acts upon others."

As he spoke, the door opened softly, and admitted a tall form, wrapped in a mantle. The cowl fell from his face, and I beheld a countenance which betrayed the ravages of satanic feelings. Pale and ghastly, the intruder cast his sunken eyes around, till they rested upon the sleeper; then a light passed over his features, and he drew up his commanding form with the dignity with which intense passion sometimes invests the most ordinary child of nature. With a half-stifled, sardonic laugh, he grasped a glittering dagger, plunged it, with dreadful force, thrice in his victim's bosom, uttered a deep groan, and covered his face with blood-streaming hands.

"The base villain!" broke from my lips; "the cowardly, craven, assassin. How could nature create a monster so hideous?"

"It is true," said the Genius, "that, in consummating his vengeance, he has violated the laws of heaven and earth, but you are ignorant of the inducements which have driven him to this fatal deed."

"No inducement," I exclaimed, shuddering, "could be sufficiently strong to excuse, for a moment, such murderous hatred; only a heart deformed by nature could prompt it."

The dreadful scene vanished, and the Genius also disappeared. I mourned over the iniquity of others, and, rejoicing in my own humility and wisdom, went forth among my fellow-men.

From some accidental cause, I made an individual, whom I had once loved, my deadly enemy. His bitter denunciations excited my pity and horror. My offers of explanation were received with haughty scorn.

To one unused to the actual pressure and struggle of the world, whose hours have rolled on in silence and solitude, destitute of hardihood of mind and bodily strength to sustain him in the broils of men, and who, amid the still places of nature, has imbibed a nervous fear of inflicting an injury, and a horror of suffering an insult, there is a perfect wretchedness in the conviction, that his image and character are associated in the mind of another with contempt, hatred, and revenge. Wild dreams startled me from my midnight slumber into a wakefulness, clear, and dreadful, and the flashing eyes of my unrelenting foe, as I had last beheld them, seemed to glare upon me, and the thought of his hate filled my mind, as if there were no other object to think on. In all my subsequent plans he crossed me with a marked design of effecting my ruin. The few friends, in whose society I seek relaxation and pleasure, were poisoned against me; and at length my burning cheek and throbbing pulse betrayed my full capacity for angry passion.

We met again. It was in a scene of mirth, fashion, and pleasure. Again those scornful eyes flashed upon me, and the curling lip breathed defiance.

Now my whole character was changed. I no more pitied his error, and sedulously endeavoured to sooth his irritation. The calmness of philosophy, the lofty pride of virtue, the cool superiority of wisdom, were gone. Hitherto my mind had slept like the tranquil summer sea. Now it swelled like the same element, when the spirit of the tempest heaves and darkens its turgid billows. A witty sarcasm cut me to the soul. The laugh of ridicule rung, hideous, in my ears. I attempted to speak, but my parched lips were glued together. A gentle girl hung on my arm. I had been half bewildered in the dreamy happiness of her gaze, when this intruding fiend struck me with the curse of demoniac passions. To make his insult to me more broad, open, and intolerable, he passed his hand roughly through her ringlets. An electric fire ran through my frame; and, reckless of consequences, I aimed a blow at his temple. His superior skill and strength easily baffled my efforts, and the next moment I was prostrated and trampled on. My giddy brain retained no other impression. Shame had stung me like an adder—nay, with a thousand times the reptile's deadly venom; for the fang which had wounded me could not be withdrawn, but clung, deep and rankling, in my bosom. The burning, unquenchable thirst for revenge had gone into the depths of my soul. It not only mastered my mind, it absorbed it. I had no other design—no other hope. The innumerable charms of nature, which once thrilled me with perceptions of exquisite beauty, the flashing midnight stars, and orient moon—the green light of woods—the voice of birds and waters, no longer brought tranquility to my troubled soul. I trampled on the gentle flowers, over which I once bent in admiration. I turned away, sickened, from the pencilled colourings of the early day; and, though I moved in crowds silently, and seemed calm, my forced mirth resembled verdure on the side of a volcano, while the discordant elements of destruction are burning in its bosom.

One turbulent night I left my pillow, and rushed through the tempest with uncovered head, reckless whither my hasty steps led me. I reached the ocean beach. The blackness of the grave was over all nature. Furious billows shook the shore, streaks of lightning rent the vault of heaven, and crashes of deep thunder threatened universal ruin.

"Storms are around me," I said, "and in me; wherefore should one be more unlawful than the other? If one bestows upon me a kindness, I never forget it; why should I not remember injury and insult. There is a lesson in these crashing clouds. Children of the same nature which has roused the conflict in my own heart, peal on, and be a fitting knell for the fate of my mortal foe. A joy, like the swift and fierce lightning, announced my bloody resolution. I rushed, as in a dream, to his dwelling. I felt not the earth on which I trod. It seemed as if evil demons had lent their invisible wings, had cleared away every obstacle, and placed me over my enemy. He was reposing, like the other, in a dimly-lighted chamber. A beautiful boy with golden hair rested his rosy cheek upon his, as if a honey-kiss had ushered in their gentle dreams of love. The sight of an innocent and beautiful child is, of all others in creation, most strongly contrasted with wickedness and wild passion, and appeals most sweetly and forcibly to the heart. A feeling of tenderness crept into my bosom. It was but for a moment. I remembered the degradation I had suffered, and tearing the lovely infant from its resting-place, I raised my dagger, when a strain of the softest and most delicious music ever heard by mortal arrested my mind. My arm remained uplifted in the air, held by some superior power. I struggled in vain to speak, to move, to breathe, when, as I uttered a groan of anguish, the whole scene disappeared. I found myself alone in my apartment. The fire gave a cheerful light, and the Little Genius stood before me.

"Beware," he said, "how you repose too much confidence in your own wisdom. If heaven has blessed you with a peaceful life, be grateful, not proud. Crimes should be punished, but criminals pitied. Many a man, after a life of pleasure, lays his aged head in an honoured grave, whom accidental circumstances might have sacrificed on the scaffold. Observe with moderation, the wonderful and varying consequences of evil passions in others; but remember that you are not so much elevated above your fellow-creatures as to be free from their temptations, and sheltered from their dangers." AN OCCASIONAL DISSERTATION ON BACHELORS.

WHEN I was young—which means when I was fourteen—I regarded all manner of old bachelors with utter detestation; and, for once in a way, the prejudice of boyhood was founded upon reason. The efficacy of those reasons is demonstrated by their result: their propriety I have no leisure to discuss. They are, good or bad, briefly these: I. My ancestors, to a man, committed matrimony in the very bud of their various existences; as a natural consequence, I inherited the family propensity, and abhorred an opposite creed. II. As I said, my forefathers, to a man, were early wedded; but it so happened that a woman—one dear, affectionate maiden aunt, whom heaven assail!—did, nevertheless, retain both her hand and heart in her own good keeping; and I, coming under her especial charge at an age when the mind is most susceptible of impressions, and the "young idea is taught how to shoot," had the full benefit of her particular opinions on the aforesaid subject of bachelorship. The precise tenor of those opinions I cannot, in good faith, divulge: suffice, what nature had implanted, she was careful not to blight; and, in the very frenzy of mutual exasperation, we breathed many an anathema on those malignant recluses, who,

"With nought to love them, and with nought to love,
Do stand upon the desert earth alone."

These, however, were the prepossessions of childhood; I am now "turned of twenty," and entertain very different views: not that I yet tolerate old bachelors, but I date my proscription something beyond their thirtieth birthday. Moreover, my devout abhorrence of them is much qualified; for, a personal inspection of the merits of the case has convinced me of the fallibility of early impressions, and that the sin of singleness does not originate exclusively with the objects of its contumely. On this score the ladies have much to answer for. Caprice and coquetry are the proximate causes of much misanthropic solitude. A proud man, once refused, shuns the risk of repeated refusal by a systematic caution, with which love acknowledges no sympathy and desires no alliance; and any man, once jilted, lights his cigars with love-letters, and denounces the sex indiscriminately. Another cause is more universally influential than either: the present fashionable reserve on the part of a lady until she discovers a gentleman's intentions. That this custom was superinduced by the occasional coquetry of our own sex, I cannot deny; but this joke, like every minion of fashion, is carried entirely too far. The disappointed man and the modest one, (for there yet are modest ones) are both palsied by it. The one will not commit himself on an uncertainty; the other waits for proper encouragement until he grows gray in the service: consequently their declaration never comes, or comes too late.

Now, so far as these causes and effects exist, so far are bachelors exculpated from the disgrace which by-gone ages have heaped on their fraternity. Doubtless there are cases of wilful and unprovoked celibacy—and with such fellows I would people a state prison—but my deliberate opinion is, that the majority of bachelors, at the present day, owe their single wretchedness to the causes here specified, and I would therefore recommend, in this age of revolutions, a radical change in matrimonial tactics.

As it is neither my province nor desire to suggest a reform in these matters, I shall not enlighten my readers with a series of possibilities calculated to produce it. My only intention is to defend a calumniated portion of my fellow-men; and to proclaim that bachelors, as such, are not necessarily deserving of the popular odium. That they are a distinct class of beings, universally disagreeable and contemptible, I positively deny: that there are, among them, occasional instances of such repellent qualities, I as freely admit; but, at the same time, I contend they are by no means confined to unmarried men. Many a pest of society may be found in the bands of wedlock; many a scoundrel has an affectionate wife to blush for his villanies, and many a convict leaves a family of children to inherit his disgrace. The good and bad of this world are the production of no one sect or denomination; they abound in all; there is many a bachelor, as I trust, in heaven; and many a married man on earth of whom the earth is not worthy.

It cannot be denied that bachelors enjoy less of the sweets of life than other men. Their pleasures and pains lack the charms of participation and sympathy, and their affections eventually degenerate into selfishness. But, assuming, as I have done, that they are not usually the authors of their own unhappiness, they rather deserve commiseration than persecution; and in reply to female reproaches they may at least say with the poet,

"I am a wretch, but who hath made me so?"

In brief, then, if bachelors are wretched because (or not) ladies have flinty hearts, why, their fate is condemnation enough; pray let them suffer in peace. Let them hug their "liberty" and make the most of it. I would never molest an inoffensive man, nor insult an unhappy one; nor will I ever hear these proscribed (and in my opinion, much wronged) mortals calumniated without asseverating that, for the most part, they are very endurable chaps, and at least as valuable to society as certain persons who shall be nameless. THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

THE latest attraction here, has been the opera of Cinderella; and certainly nothing but a piece eminently attractive, could have overcome the natural obstacles which oppose the drama at this inclement season. The toils of five months have been most judiciously and happily applied by Mr. Simpson to the production of Cinderella at this time, and the event has proved that perseverance and enterprise are the surest roads to the favour of a discerning public. On Monday, Mrs. Austin announced this opera (being the sixth night of its representation) for her benefit, and with it the burlesque of Midas. The house presented a coup d'œil of beauty and fashion; and although a facility of locomotion, and a choice of seats, be to us frequently a consolation for the absence of our worthy fellow-citizens at the performance of an interesting drama, yet we did not regret on this occasion that we were compelled to become tenants of the last bench of a box in tier No. 2, as it furnished evidence both that the exertions of our prima donna and those of the manager, were duly appreciated. The piece went off with its usual célar. On the fall of the curtain, Mrs. Austin's re-engagement was announced for three nights, to continue the representation of Cinderella, much to our satisfaction, and (if shouts and exclamations be any proof) to the manifest satisfaction of the persons assembled.

We have already stated that, out of London, no theatre in the British dominions could secure to an opera a cast as efficient as that of the present piece at the Park theatre. A Boston paper has quoted our article on Cinderella, at length; and, without ascribing it to its proper source, has manifested great acerbity at our assuming for New-York the lead in this branch of theatricals. We are not aware in what points our theatrical establishments are inferior to those of other cities in the United States; but as regards opera, we are very confident that Boston is no more to New-York than Manchester is to London. In short, any competition on this point, at present, we can show to be useless. It must be allowed that we have the best prima donna in the United States, in Mrs. Austin. The admirable singing of Mr. Jones has been lauded throughout the Boston journals. Mr. Placide is the best buffo singer in America; and even in England, only two persons can be named, Mr. Penson and Mr. Russell, whom critics venture to compare with this gentleman. Mr. Thorne, who supports another strong buffo part, has obtained a reputation for this line of business in London. Mr. Richings, always perfect in his text, and often very happy in his representations, is consequently most important in a drama of this description. In addition to which, we have Mesdames Blake and Vernon, who both sing their difficult music respectably, and than whom two better comic actresses are rarely to be met with. Lastly, we have young Placide, who is playing, with tolerable success, the part of Barnes, because Barnes is performing a star-engagement at Boston. The chorus at the Park is by far the strongest in America; and we may likewise add, that the band is more numerous than any other, excepting that of the French company, and is in the constant habit of accompanying first-rate singers in first-rate music. Our position then is unassailable. At the same time, if we think proper to invade the territories of those opposed to us, we might ask, what operas have been brought out in Boston, which have not previously appeared in New-York? and even then, what has been their success? Can any manager in any town in the United States, venture to engage an operatic corps of the strength of that which is constantly supported at the Park theatre, without certain failure? In New-York, the manager can be successful only by keeping up that operatic force. Let any candid person draw the inference.

A new drama, called the Carnival of Naples, has recently been produced, in which Mrs. Sharpe sustains the principal part. This lady is a favourite of the New-York public, and should be attached to the Park. Her various qualities as a useful actress, have been and would continue to be better estimated during a permanent engagement than they can possibly be in her brief visits, as a star, into the hemispheres of our neighbours.

THE BELDAME'S AUGURY.

LAUGH on, gay boy, I love to look
Upon a face like thine,
Where I can read, as from a book,
Thy fate in every line.
Laugh on! laugh on! while yet ye may!
Enjoy the sunlight of thy day,
While yet its sun doth shine.
Life hath its seasons like the years—
Thine is the spring without its tears.
Laugh on! although thy brow reveal
No furrowed marks of care.
Though now thy brain in gladness reel,
Madness will soon be there.
The blight, the lightning, and the scath,
Full soon will o'er it sweep in wrath,
And on thy brow, despair
Will write, in language clear, the woe
Which thou and thine were born to know.
Ay, list thy doom. Thou art to be
A wanderer of the earth;
From shore to shore—from sea to sea—
Exiled from home and hearth.
Thy babes will learn to curse thy name;
Their mother turn from thee in shame;
And she who gave thee birth
Will leave thee to the foul disgrace
Thou wilt have brought upon her race.
Yes, there's a fate hangs over thee,
And all that are with thee entwined.
Fear, shame, remorse, and guilt, will be
The genii of thy stricken mind.
Peace will forsake—love fly thy door,
Nor ever ask admittance more;
And thou wilt seek to find
A balm to soothe thy grief in vain—
Joy ne'er will smile on thee again.

AMERICAN LITERATURE.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Albany, February, 1831.

GENTLEMEN—Having been much disappointed in the perusal of some of the later works of the author of the Spy, the idea occurred to me of reading them over again with some little attention, in order to mark their beauties and defects, and satisfy myself whether I had reason to be disappointed or not. Having finished the task, I thought it might be neither useless nor impertinent to embody my impressions in the form of a general and brief notice of his productions. I have done so, and have charged my friend * with delivering the manuscript into your hands. If you think it worth while, you are at liberty to publish it, with such corrections as may occur to you.

THE WORKS OF THE AUTHOR OF THE SPY.

We take occasion on the appearance of a new work from this distinguished writer, to say something generally on the character of his genius, and the grounds of his great popularity, both here and in Europe. It is after the reputation of an author is established—at least pro tem.—so far as to render him, in a great degree, independent of future praise and elaborate puffing, that the critic feels himself at full liberty to enter into a free discussion of his beauties and defects. While he is toiling up the steep of fame it seems ungenerous to impede or embarrass his exertions; but, once on the summit, we have a right to inquire how he got there, and what are his claims to keep possession.

The first attempt of our author in that species of writing in which he has gained so high a reputation, was a work entitled "Precaution." The scene was laid abroad, and the style, as well as the conduct of the story, exhibit all the faults, and few of the beauties of his subsequent productions. He was delineating scenes and manners which he only knew from hearsay or description, and he does not possess that creative power of the imagination, which enables some men to supply the absence of experience and observation by the mere force of abstract conceptions. "Precaution" excited, we believe, little attention, and was soon forgotten. But as the prosperity of one individual of a family often reflects light upon the more obscure branches, so has the success of the author's subsequent writings rescued his earliest offspring from oblivion.

The failure of this work most probably discouraged him for a time, as a considerable interval elapsed before he again appealed to the public in a manner which deservedly brought him into notice. The Spy laid the foundation of his fame. It was a domestic tale, of very decided merit; and it appeared at a fortunate period, when the vast success of the ci-devant "great unknown" had, as it were, ennobled a species of composition which had fallen somewhat into contempt, by being principally in the hands of inferior writers.

Public attention had likewise been drawn to American literature by the successful attempts of two or three young writers; it began to be seriously believed possible that American scenery, history, and manners might be made susceptible of beauty and interest; and that by some miraculous dispensation, American genius might possibly be capable of illustrating and embellishing them. Our countrymen were no longer frightened from being pleased with a domestic production; and even our critics had the unparalleled gallantry to be civil towards an humble aspirant after domestic toleration.

The fortunate incident of residing in a foreign land, has also often operated beneficially towards American writers. There is not the least doubt in the minds of a large portion of readers, that the human intellect is stunted, or, as Mr. Jefferson has it, "belittled" in this country; and that the only possible way of restoring it to anything like an equality with that of the people of Europe, especially of Paris, London, and Edinburgh, is to go and live among them; inhale the pure intellectual atmosphere of these great metropolitan mammoths; and, if not to associate with, at least to have now and then a peep at the giants of literature, who are "as plenty as blackberries," at the academies, and at tea-parties. We have heard this mode of getting endorsed by strangers on the other side of the Atlantic objected to, as carrying with it a sort of left-handed compliment to our friends. It seems, say these writers, like telling our "belittled" countrymen that their opinions are not worth consulting; that they are not qualified to judge of the merits of a book, but must receive their cue from their betters abroad. They add, that there is no excuse for an author publishing his works in a foreign clime, or appealing to a foreign tribunal, except that of feeling himself neglected or unjustly treated by his own countrymen. But doubtless this is the ignorant ebullition of minds not properly stretched to a comprehension of the sublime in puffing, and we record such vulgarisms only to mark them with our decided and eternal reprobation.

Since the appearance of the Spy our author has produced a work pretty regularly once a year, until they now amount to ten or a dozen; all but one, belonging to the same class of literature. These, with the exception alluded to, may be divided into tales of the land and tales of the sea. We shall proceed to offer our frank opinions on these, without feeling any solicitude whether they correspond with the decisions heretofore pronounced abroad, because we cannot bring ourselves to believe for a moment that the critics of Paris, or of London, or of Edinburgh, are as well qualified to judge of the truth of delineations of American customs and scenery as the Americans themselves. Of the Indian character, which occupies so large a share in the productions at present under consideration, and the sketches of which have been so highly lauded, they know little or nothing, except from these works. They must, therefore, necessarily found their decisions as to the skill in delineating it, solely on their ignorance of every thing but what is there told them. Those who have seen and been conversant with the Indians, in their primitive condition, are certainly much better able to judge respecting that singular race than the most erudite critic who has never been out of Europe.

On the authority of our own individual experience, we begin by saying, that our author's Indians are sophisticated, and not genuine aborigines. They may do in Paris or London, but they will not stand the test of actual experience and observation. They talk too much, and do too little. Now the Indian is by habit and situation a silent being; he despises a garrulous man, and never makes long speeches, except to his great father, or his great father's agents. He is much alone, and a man loses the habit of talking in solitude; he is a smoking, ruminating animal; and to represent him always talking in metaphors and figures, is to substitute the habit of our author himself, who is a great lover of long talks, at least in his works, for that of the Indian, who talks only when specially excited.

We have the same authority for saying that his Indians think and act as little like Indians as they talk like Indians. It is not the substitution of "he," or "the Indian," for "I," in speaking of himself; nor the perpetual repetition of "whiteman," and "redman," "Manitou," and "Great Spirit," that makes an Indian. The writer who wishes to delineate his character and peculiarities truly and forcibly, must identify himself with the situation of the savage, and draw from men, not books. The mere following of "a trail" through fifty or a hundred pages, and talking all the way, enables the reader to form but a bare and meagre idea of the rough, cunning, malignant, impracticable man of the woods. We think Miss Sedgwick has been more successful in this respect. Her Indians have something besides the red skin to designate them.

The Spy was succeeded by the Pioneers, to our taste one of the most pleasing of all the productions of our author. The subjects undertaken to be described in this work are evidently such as he had been familiar with in that period of life when the deepest impressions are received; and he has delineated them with a truth and nature seldom surpassed. The sketches of rural scenery, rural manners, and rural sports, the changes of our seasons, and every object and incident characteristic of our early settlements, are, for the most part, admirable. There is also a rich variety in this work. Natty Bumpo is an original, "not to be found in any of the books," and, with one exception, a faultless original—he talks too much and too long. The story is, however, marvellously lame; and the hero, as well as the heroine, somewhat uninteresting. There is a childish mystery in the conduct of this tale, of which the author seems to be enamoured, since he has incorporated others, if possible, still more flimsy, into his subsequent productions. Take it, however, all in all, we think it a charming performance, in spite of numerous blemishes, which would have been fatal to its reputation, had they not been redeemed by equal beauties.

The Prairie has the same faults in full, and the same beauties in a lesser degree. It is evidently written to follow up the success of the Pioneers; a dangerous experiment, since an author seldom if ever succeeds a second time in introducing a favourite character. The cream is generally skimmed the first time, and either the scum or sediment is served up at the second table. Our old acquaintance, Natty Bumpo, verifies this observation. He appears again in the Prairie, but with increased garrulity, and becomes heavy and tedious by repetition. Of this the writer seems to have been aware, for he kills him by a natural death at the conclusion of the story, apparently apprehensive that he might be tempted to murder him by inches in a future work. One of the faults of our author in fact, is a habit of copying himself, of giving his readers a second edition of the same characters. Nothing, for instance, can be more alike than the Red Rover and the Skimmer of the Seas. It is impossible not to perceive that one is a mere transcript of the other; and every reader must recognise their identity, notwithstanding they differ in size, and in the colour of their hair. The Water Witch is the same wonderful vessel we see in the Red Rover, and there is the same disguised damsel, acting pretty much the same equivocal part in each. The captain of the Coquette fills the same subordinate station to the Skimmer that young Master Harry does to the Red Rover. The Laird of Kinderhook is, however, we believe, without a parallel in any of these productions for stupidity. He has not the least agency in the plot. He does nothing, and says a vast deal to no purpose; and the only act of his life, that of jumping headlong on board the Water Witch, is entirely out of keeping. He is a mighty fungus growing out of a decayed tree, and adding nothing to its beauty, dignity, or fruitfulness.

Lionel Lincoln, we believe, was the least successful of all these novels, with the exception of Precaution. We have understood the bookseller suffered a great loss in its publication. It was an exceedingly improbable tale, the scene of which was not sufficiently remote, and the time of action too near, to afford the obscurity necessary to so bold a fiction. Next came, if we are not mistaken in the order of succession, the Last of the Mohicans, the Pilot, the Red Rover, the Wept of Wish-ton-Wish, and lastly the Water Witch, just published.

The Last of the Mohicans and the Wept of Wish-ton-Wish, are what may be termed Indian tales, and the characters and actions of the Indians constitute the principal features of both. We have already frankly expressed our opinion of these, let it go for what it is worth; it is unnecessary to repeat, or enlarge upon it. Our author does not excel in painting civilized men and manners; and, least of all, civilized women. His young ladies are deficient in vivacity and sentiment; and his gentlemen, at least those of a tolerably decent reputation for morals, want spirit and character. His rovers and bucaniers are somewhat more piquant.

Our author, like the whale and other great fishes, is supposed to be much more active and powerful on the water than on the land. His professional experience enables him to describe the various appearances of the ocean and the tactics of a ship, with all the accuracy of a log-book, though not with the same brevity. In delineating the humours of those amphibious animals, called sailors, he has in one instance, and we think in one only, been remarkably successful. Tom Coffin is an exceedingly well drawn character, and indeed our author seems to have concentrated all his experience of this kind upon this single man. There is, we think, not another tar in all his subsequent works that can claim to be rated on a ship's books as more than an "ordinary seaman." As to those excessively odd, alias mysterious creatures, the "Red Rover," and the "Skimmer," we cannot allow them to be called sailors. The only classification we know of that will suit them is, that of "half horse half alligator," applied to the Mississippi boatmen before the invention of steam-boats gradually annihilated that class of oddities. We must withhold our testimony of admiration from such heroes, either on land or water. We are inclined to think, that if works of fiction have any influence on manners and morals—and if they have not, what are they good for?—such examples, held up as they are to the admiration of the reader, must give a wrong direction to the imagination of young people. The class of light-fingered gentry, who make free with the rights and property of others, we think cut but a poor figure in society, every where else but in a modern romance, where they seldom fail to carry away all the honours. If an honest gentleman, of good morals, and happy disposition towards the rights of others, happen to be introduced into this sort of tales, it is only to tire the reader with his dulness; to be placed on all occasions in situations quite ridiculous; and to act as a sort of foil to the splendid success of the knight of the post. Indeed, it seems quite indispensable to the full glories of a popular work of imagination, that the hero should be a pirate, a highwayman, or a pickpocket; and unite in himself the utmost sensibility of feeling with the most consummate hardness of heart. It is earnestly to be hoped that none of our romantic young ladies will, in their idolatry of this species of errant knights, take it into their heads or hearts to elope with some of the irresistible heroes of the quarter-sessions.

The original of this sort of heroes is, we believe, to be found in the Newgate Calendar. From thence they were adopted into Sir Walter Scott's tale of the Pirate, the hero of which is, if we recollect right, an exceedingly sentimental freebooter, who is capable at the same time of two very opposite feelings—a disinterested love for a lady, and a disinterested craving for the property of other people. We believe that no such character ever existed; nor has it ever occurred to us, in the experience of a long life, passed in various scenes and occupations, to meet with a man who combined with the vices of a villain the capacity of feeling a pure and honourable affection for a virtuous woman. Such a character is the creation of bad taste, or bad feeling, or wantonness, sporting with the morals and credulity of inexperience, and aiming at a preposterous originality, by bringing together such moral incongruities as are presented for our admiration in the Corsairs, the Paul Cliffords, and the Skimmers of the Sea. This custom of concentrating all the interest of a work of fiction upon these knights of the post, seems gradually gaining upon the public favour, so that we should not be greatly surprised in a few years to find the reading ladies turning their backs upon every hero, who had the least respect for the laws of the land or the precepts of morality.

For a long chace or a long story our author is almost without a rival. Witness the never-ending manœuvres of the mysterious vessel in the Red Rover, whose "tracery appears upon the clouds," through nearly two whole volumes, and whose vague, unpurposed evolutions can be compared to nothing but a kitten running round after her tail. Witness, too, the extraordinary mystifications, inexplicable "hide and seek," and incomprehensible escapes of the Water Witch, and her incomprehensible commander, who, through the greater part of these volumes, appears to have no other object in running his vessel into difficulties, than to show how easily he can get out of them, and make a fool of honest Captain Ludlow of the Coquette, who indeed seems to be introduced on purpose to be made a fool of by all parties.

In the power of delaying a catastrophe, which seems every moment inevitable, and lengthening a tale that appears obstinately determined to come to an end, he is also peculiarly distinguished. He travels with a drag-chain to his wheel; and contrives by the most studious, provoking delays, to excite a fidgety impatience to get on, which doubtless many readers mistake for an intense interest in the story. Like travellers on a deep and miry road, we are half mad to arrive at the end, not so much on account of any anticipated pleasure, as from the intolerable fatigue of the journey.

The main causes of the slow progress of the narrative, and the paucity of incidents in the story, are a love of talking, and a habit of unfeeling minuteness in his descriptions, that, if not soon corrected, will undermine and eventually destroy his popularity. Natty Bumpo, who is represented as enamoured of solitude, is incessantly making long speeches; his Indians talk like members of congress, or city aldermen at a meeting of the common council; men, women, and children, black, white, and copper-coloured, all talk, while the story either makes lee-way, as we sailors say, or stands stock still. This is perpetually occurring at moments when the crisis of the narration demands that it should proceed rapidly, without looking either to the right or to the left. Three-fourths of the "Water Witch," consist of this eternal verbiage; this idle talk, which we must be allowed to say is not redeemed by either sufficient humour, wit, or vivacity to afford apology for its impertinent intrusions on the progress of the story.

The talent of our author for description is superior to his talent for conversation. What he has seen he describes with great truth; we almost feel inclined to say, with too much truth. Monsieur Voltaire observes, with strict justice, that "the secret of being dull, is to say all that can be said on a subject." To our taste there is too much of excessive minuteness, too much of enumeration, of uninteresting and insignificant particulars in almost all his descriptions of land, water, ships, men, women, dress, &c.; in short, of every material object. He seems to dwell on every thing that comes in his way, after the manner of people who talk for hours upon one single topic, however uninteresting, simply because they don't know what to talk about next.

In order to exemplify our censures, we will give an extract or two, taken at random, from the Water Witch. The first comprises a special catalogue of the hero's wearing apparel, when he makes his first appearance in the ferry-boat; pushes people about without ceremony; deprives the coxswain of the helm; quizzes an alderman; takes command of the vessel; and finally tumbles a countryman from a bench, lies down in his place, and snores lustily, after the manner of men who pay little attention to the comfort and feelings of others, and a vast deal to their own.

"The dress of the stranger was quite as remarkable as his person. He wore a short pea-jacket, cut light and tastefully; a little, low, rakish cap; and full, bell-mouthed trowsers, all of a spotlessly white duck; a material well adapted to the season and the climate. The first was made without buttons, affording an apology for a rich India shawl that belted his body, and kept the garment tight to his frame. Faultlessly clean linen appeared throughout the opening above, and a collar of the same material fell over the gay bandanna, which was thrown with a single, careless turn around his throat. The latter was a manufacture then little known in Europe, and its use was almost entirely confined to seamen of the long voyage. One of its ends was suffered to blow about in the winds, but the other was brought down with care over the chest, where it was confined by springing the blade of a small knife with an ivory handle in a manner to confine the silk to the linen; a sort of breast-pin that is even now used by mariners. If we add, that light canvass slippers, with foul-anchors worked in worsted upon their insteps, covered his feet, we shall say all that is necessary of his attire."

Genius of Dutch painters and man-milliners! dost thou not turn pale with envy at being thus outdone in thine art? The only parallel of this list of a gentleman's wearing apparel which occurs to our recollection, is in the anecdote of a careful wife, who, previous to her good-man's commencing a journey, gave him a memorandum of his clothes, to which she discreetly added at the bottom, "and one man with one eye," lest he should forget himself some time or other.

The next specimen we shall offer the reader will illustrate the author's predisposition to long talks, as well as his total neglect of nature and probability, in placing such a speech in the mouth of a Dutch alderman of the last century, addressed to his negro slave:

"Thrift, Mr. Euclid, thrift is your true philosopher's stone;" commenced or rather continued in a rich, full mouthed Dutch, the proprietor of the dwelling, who had evidently been giving a leave-taking charge to his principal slave before quitting the house; 'thrift hath made many a man rich, but it never brought any one to want. It is thrift which hath built up the credit of my house, and, though it is said by myself, a broader back and firmer base belongs to no merchant in the colonies. You are but the reflection of your master's prosperity, you rogue, and so much the greater need you look to his interests. If the substance is wasted, what will become of the shadow? When I get delicate you will sicken, when I am hungry you will be famished, when I die you may be—where—Euclid. I leave thee in charge of goods and chattels, home and stables, with my character in the neighbourhood. I am going to Lust in Rust, for a mouthful of better air. Plague and fevers! I believe the people will continue to come into this crowded town until it gets to be as pestilent as Rotterdam in the dog-days. You have now come to years when a man obtains his reflection, boy, and I expect suitable care and discretion about the premises while my back is turned. Now, harkee, sirrah! I am not entirely pleased with the character of thy company. It is not altogether as respectable as becomes the confidential servant of a man of a certain station in the world. There are thy two cousins, Brosa and Cobus, who are no better than a couple of blackguards; and as for the English negro, Diomed, he is a devil's imp," &c. &c. &c.

And so the worthy alderman goes on for a page and a half. We are bound to believe the learned Euclid listened with profound attention, though we doubt if the reader will pay him a similar compliment.

It is in this way, by incessant interruptions of minute description and tedious dialogue, that about one-fourth of the first volume of the "Water Witch," is filled with a conversation held in crossing the ferry from Broad-street to Staten Island. The introduction of Lord Cornbury in two separate instances, each of which occupies several pages, can be referred, we conceive, to no other motive than a desire to swell the book, and disguise its real poverty of incident and invention. "The Green Lady of the Sea," who makes her responses in most marvellously obscure quotations from Shakspeare, is another "weak invention," to create a little meagre mystery, and consume time. To us she seems fraught with childish ridicule. In this and other queer mysteries by which all his works are disfigured, this novelist has probably paid tribute to the public taste rather than followed his own. Yet we cannot but think, that with his popularity and influence, he might have ventured to reject this paltry expedient of common-place writers. He ought to aspire to setting the example of a good taste, rather than follow a bad one. We forbear a smile at a little foppery, in occasionally giving his readers, not one in ten of whom, probably, understands the language, a specimen of his improvement in French since he went abroad. At the same time, we protest against this interlarding a book with scraps of a foreign tongue, except it be in quotations from classical authors. It is bad breeding in a man to speak in company in a language which not one in ten understands, unless he can speak no other; and it is, we think, little better to puzzle one's readers in the same manner.

Our author certainly can write English, though his style wants simplicity as well as brevity. There is a mannerism about it which savours of affectation, and produces stiffness. He seldom goes directly towards his object, but purrs round, and round, and round, seemingly afraid he will catch it, and peradventure burn his fingers. He approaches it in circles, and is a long time getting to the centre. It is not that he stops to indulge his feelings, exercise his imagination, or give a momentary sport to his humour and vivacity. These are delightful interruptions of a story; they embellish its incidents; and we hold a man cheap who does not sometimes exhibit them in his writings. But the delays here alluded to are not of this sort; they are the embarrassments of long dialogues and minute descriptions, given in a style redundant with words, neither happily disposed nor very expressive. This fault is particularly conspicuous in his last work, which, in a great degree, consists of immeasurable dialogues between the Alderman, Captain Ludlow, La Belle Barberie, the redoubtable Skimmer, Lord Cornbury, Black Euclid, Lame Bonnice, Blind Cupid, and divers gentlemen of colour, whose gibberish is quite equal to the exquisite slang of Paul Clifford and his worthy associates. To us it is inconceivable that an author of genius should fancy himself delighting the world by filling page after page with words which not one of his readers, unless they belong to the same caste, can either pronounce or understand.

With the same frankness with which we have pointed out the faults of this writer, and with far more pleasure to ourselves, we will now proceed to state where, in our opinion, his chief strength lies. No one that we are acquainted with, has described the peculiar features of American character and scenery, so far as he has gone, with more truth and exactness. Within certain limits he is a man of keen discrimination, of sagacious observation. Setting aside the fault of excessive minuteness and eternal repetition, his descriptions are admirable. Deficient as he is in the conception and conduct of a story, he excels in particular scenes, where he concentrates his recollections and experience upon one single object, and one single moment. He winds up a storm, a sea-fight, a chase, or a shipwreck, with great spirit and effect, in spite of occasional delays, to indulge in the inveterate habit of prosing. The whole of the chase through Hell-gate, the subsequent battle, the attack of the boats, the conflagration and explosion of the Coquette, and the terrible suspense of the party on the raft, are of a high order of description, and almost repay the reader for wading through the preceding pages. Yet even these fine details are disfigured by the introduction of the puerile mystery of the "Green Lady," the horrible and gratuitous incident of the shark, and the intrusion of our old enemy, in the shape of a long talk. On the other element, our good mother earth, our author is not so successful in concentrating the interest of his story. He has not the aid of the same vast machinery, the same combination of sublime materials; and if he had, he would not be able to use them with the same power and skill. It is in comparing the two that we are struck with the important aid he receives from the excellence of his ready-made materials. His tales of the sea would be tame and uninteresting, were it not for the grand phenomena which he is enabled to summon to his assistance; and many a reader mistakes his admiration of the works of the Creator, for wonder at the talent of the mere mortal, who has shadowed them to his imagination. It is these single, isolated descriptions, of which there is seldom more than one in each of these tales, which constitute their chief, if not their only merit. There is not another faculty exhibited in all or any of them of sufficient power to sustain their popularity.

In thus pointing out what we conceive to be the faults of our author, we have been influenced principally by a hope that he will condescend to mend them, as well he can, we do not doubt. He owes it to his country, of whose literary reputation abroad and at home he is one of the pillars, to do all in his power to maintain his station, and even to rise still higher. If he only give himself time, and take ordinary pains, we have no doubt but he will be able, being an excellent navigator, to steer clear of those really exemplary blemishes, which have made it sometimes a matter of wonder to us, that he has escaped condign punishment in the courts of criticism. The talent of describing professional scenes is certainly a very desirable one; but, though a powerful ingredient in the composition of a tale of fiction, something more than this is required to constitute a claim to stand almost at the head of the writers of his country, and close by one of the most successful authors the world ever saw—we mean Sir Walter Scott. To constitute a great writer in the walks of fiction, he must unite, with the knack of describing what he has seen, the power to invent; the faculty of judgment to arrange; and the combination of all the constituents of a consummate intellect, in bringing about, by striking and natural means, a striking yet natural catastrophe. Hitherto we think our author has been much overrated. It remains to be seen whether, by any future efforts, he will be able to make good a lasting title to the elevated rank which has been conferred upon him.

That he will do so, we feel considerably assured; but, if our anticipations are to be finally realized, it must be by his forgetting his popularity for a season, and writing as if he had a reputation to gain as well as to lose. In short, he must forget that a good-natured public is for the present, perhaps, willing to take just what he gives. All that he requires to make him worthy of the situation to which he has been raised—not indeed by foreign bayonets, but by foreign pens—is to discipline his style into something like brief simplicity; to cut down his dialogues one-half, and infuse a little humour and vivacity into the remainder; to mingle somewhat more variety in his scenery and characters; to indulge occasionally in something besides mere talking and description; and finally, to collect and arrange the principal materials of his story before he commences it. We have heard it boasted by some of his indiscreet admirers, that he composes his works by piecemeal, writing a chapter here and a chapter there, without order or connection, trusting to Providence for cementing them afterwards together into something like order and consistency. If this be true, we admire his faith, but make somewhat light of his discretion. In that case, we can readily account for the glaring defects of his stories, and the vast disproportion of idle and extraneous matter which, we presume, is put in to fill up the chinks, as we sometimes see old hats and petticoats stuck in broken windows. Such playing with the public will answer perhaps for a time, and so long as it is ready to submit to a willing deception. But non omnibus dormio—the public don't sleep for every body, nor for ever. It is high time for our author to be prepared for the waking. S.

REPORT OF DEATHS.

The total number of deaths in this city last year was five thousand five hundred and thirty-seven.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

Letters from Correspondents.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Messrs. Editors—We young ladies don't mind blabbing every thing to you editors, because we know you can't keep it to yourselves, and nobody tells their own secrets without wishing to have them repeated again. My secret is, that I have an inclination to be married, provided I can get a husband to suit me. I don't approve of advertising in the newspapers, as is the fashion just now; and yet I should like the gentlemen to know what sort of a young woman I am, and what sort of a husband I shall expect. Now, Messrs. Editors, if you will only promise to be silent about my name, I'll tell you all, and you may put it in the Mirror, for the information of those concerned. I wish you, at the same time, to take particular care to caution the public against a certain class of young women, who, though they don't belong to good society at all, manage to get husbands, nobody knows how. There is hardly an old maid to be found among the plebeians, which is a thing I can't understand.

I am very handsome, in the first place. My waist, by the aid of my maid and the coachman, is capable of being compressed into a circle of four inches diameter. My hair is luxuriant, and curls delightfully. I bought it of—but I won't tell where, for fear every body should get just like it. My papa says I have almost ruined him in dress, so I leave you to judge whether I have a taste or not. I have a beautiful set of teeth. It's nobody's business where they came from; and when I have been in the country two or three months in the summer, I get quite a colour. In winter it is apt to go away; but this is the case with all young ladies in good society, and so that makes no difference. I have a sweet, pretty little foot, &c. which, in these times of reform and curtailment, is no small matter.

My education has been particularly attended to, and I do flatter myself it is no flattery to say, it is quite perfect. I can waltz so gracefully, the men say it makes them dizzy to look at me. I play the piano like Mr. Metz, and sing Italian in such a perfect style that people can't tell it from English. I have read all Lord Byron's works, and all his lives, besides the Roué, Paul Clifford, Moore's poetry, and every thing that has come out lately worth reading. I can pass a whole morning sitting at my window and doing nothing, without getting tired or out of humour, which I think is a proof that I have both temper and patience. I never spoil my thumb and fingers by sewing, or any thing of that sort, though I think I do remember—it's like a dream though, it's so long ago—I think I did once hem a pocket-handkerchief at boarding-school. My father lives in style, keeps his carriage, gives parties, &c.; but I must be candid, and confess, that as he failed only last year, he can't be very rich, unless he has become so by breaking. I have no fortune myself, but I defy any body to excel me in spending one. Finally, I delight above all things, in living at great hotels, where there is no trouble in house-keeping; and ladies have nothing to do but look out, and walk out, and improve their energies so as to keep up with the spirit of the age.

And now I will tell you what sort of a man I should like for a husband. As to his age, I don't much mind how old he is, provided he is over sixty—the more years the merrier after that. As to his character, that is a matter of indifference. As to his talents—people of talents, Mr. Moore says, always make bad husbands, and so I would, upon the whole, prefer a fool. He must live in a three-story house, with sliding doors, and marble mantel-pieces, either in Broadway, Hudson-square, Park-place, or some such genteel street. He must, of course, keep a barouche, a coachman with a gold-laced hat, plenty of servants, and an experienced house-keeper; for he can't expect me to know any thing about such vulgar matters. Finally, he must have no will of his own, except when he makes his will, and leaves me all he has in the world.

I don't think I am unreasonable in my expectations—do you, Messrs. Editors? A fashionable education now costs a fortune, and it would be very mean if gentlemen were to expect a fortune besides. I write this under a feigned name, but if you should hear of any one that answers the description of the man I could love, inquiring about me, I give you permission to furnish him with a clue to his happiness. Remember, to all others my name is ARAMINTA GAZELLE.

P. S. Don't you think it is a pretty signature?

P. S. For heaven's sake don't betray my real name to the town.

P. S. I beseech you not to believe for a moment I am one of those impudent vulgar things that advertise for husbands.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Messrs. Editors—In the times of the old heathens, it was the custom for men who felt themselves aggrieved, to appeal to posterity and the immortal gods; but now we appeal to the present age, and the editors of public journals, who are a sort of knights errant, armed with quills, and going about righting wrongs, and putting every tub on its own bottom. I shall follow the mode in the present instance, and solicit permission to complain to you of a grievance which I meet with almost every night of my life, and which makes such fearful inroads upon my enjoyments, that I am sometimes almost tempted to make away with myself.

You are to know that my favourite amusement is the theatre, where I am to be found almost every night, in the same seat of the same box, the manager having politely accorded me this privilege at all times. It is of little consequence to me what is the play or who plays; the force of habit supplies the place of every other excitement. I get through the evening comfortably, which, to an old bachelor without a home, is no small matter, I assure you.

I sometimes write a bit of a criticism, under a signature which shall be nameless, and have one now in preparation, which I flatter myself will make some noise. It is a parallel, after the manner of Plutarch, between the Princess of Siam and Master Burke.

Having told you what I am, I will proceed to detail the grievances, against which I wish you to put your gray goose-quill in rest, and run a tilt. The women! the pestilent, fashionable women, Messrs. Editors, are determined to be my bane, notwithstanding I have managed to keep out of some of their toils. They come to the theatre with hats on their heads big enough to overshadow a little German principality. Nobody that has the misfortune to sit behind one of these, need ever expect to see the stage, or indeed any thing else but feathers, and bows, and unpronounceable fripperies. If they would only keep this prodigious concatenation of incongruous matter still, it would be something; one might occasionally get a peep by moving from side to side, or dodging under the disk of the prodigious luminary. But this seems quite impossible—the majestic object is perpetually in motion—shaking, and nodding, and nodding this way and that, so that all attempts to avoid it are as a futile as those of some unfortunate mariner trying to get round Cape Hatteras in a gale. I have had such trials of skill with these hats as would amaze you, but all in vain. They form a perpetual screen between me and the stage, of which I have not had a full view since the invention of these unbecoming, unladylike appendages. The other night I begged of one of these hats, as a particular favour, to let me climb up to the top of one of its feathers, that, like little Zaccheus, I might see what was going forward; but it did not take the hint, for I heard it whisper it's neighbour something about "crazy man."

To these annoyances let me add the conduct of certain young gentlemen, I suppose we must call them so, by virtue of their fashionable coats, who are perpetually putting on their hats in the boxes, getting up, and straddling over the benches, and discomposing the company, nobody knows for what; or standing in the door-way, gaping about, and keeping it open, to the discomfort of every body. I never saw such ill-bred cubs. They should be sent to some bear-garden to learn manners.

When I was in Paris—"think of that, Master Brook!"—when I was in Paris, a lady, let her rank be what it might, who appeared at the theatre in such a hat, or a young fellow who behaved in the manner I mention, would have soon been taught a lesson of propriety and decorum, by the hisses of the audience, which equally presides over the actors and the spectators. Nothing can be in worse taste than these ill-shaped, ill-decorated, and disproportioned hats, any where; but at a theatre they are offensive to good manners, because they interfere with the enjoyments of others, by depriving them of their just share in the amusements of the evening. I wish the pit would take them in hand. If something is not soon done to relieve me from these annoyances, I shall be obliged to forsake the theatre and commit matrimony, for want of some better way of passing my time. I am your discontented friend, LAURENCE LONESOME.

ENGLAND.

The British parliament are discussing the propriety of sending a travelling committee to the East-Indies, to examine the state of that country. The subject excited much mirth among the learned gentlemen, but a distinct and accurate knowledge respecting that remote and important portion of their dominions must, nevertheless, be considered very necessary to its proper government.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

New-Year Day.—The innovation contemplated, touching the custom of visiting on this holiday, has sounded an alarm through the ranks of the merry and hospitable inhabitants of Manhatta. Several well-written communications upon the subject have been received. One correspondent attributes it to a wish, on the part of those who have recently "emerged from obscurity, to dispense with the impertinent visits of their former companions." This, however, is a mistake. In our community, there is no occasion to draw lines of distinction between families "just emerged from obscurity," and those whom wealth, or office, or the talent of some ancestor, has elevated to influence and importance. In a society organized upon aristocratical principles, where a certain class, termed the nobility, throng around the person of an hereditary king, while the honest, labouring part of the population find their progress to rank and equality with the rest opposed by insurmountable barriers, it is well enough to talk about families "emerged from obscurity," and others entitled to respect, from the fact that they have been fortunate enough to hold certain advantages for many generations. But we dwell in a republic. We acknowledge no "nobility" but such as have earned the title themselves, by industry, integrity, perseverance, education, or talents. He who, through a youth of embarrassment, toils successfully and honestly for the acquisition of wealth and respectability, in this country, stands, and ought to stand, upon an equality with any one, if his manners, and mental and moral qualities be such as to offer no interruption to the general harmony of social enjoyment. We cannot bear too strongly and continually in mind the fact, that we are, or ought to be, not only in form of government, and the character of our institutions, but in manners, customs, and feelings, a plain republican people. We have nothing to do with the stars, titles, and distinctions of Europe. We differ from every other nation on the face of the globe, and must adopt no foreign standard by which to measure our opinions. It seems as if the preading genius of freedom had pointed out this mighty continent to the immortal adventurer, that amidst its deep forests, and totally cut off from all the prejudices, passions, interests, perplexities and dangers, which entangle and overshadow the old world, we might lay a broad foundation, on which to rear the superstructure of a government, where human reason might operate freely, and the important experiment be tried, whether man is capable of governing himself. Notwithstanding the inveterate habit of self-congratulation upon this subject, which, not without justice, has been charged against Americans, this experiment has not yet been fairly tested. Fifty or a hundred years form but a brief period for the consequences of great political events and institutions to develop themselves. It remains for our children's children to judge whether we can effectually exclude from the confine of these states, the narrow and corrupting prejudices, the selfish and bigoted passions, the pride of ancestry, and the pomp of wealth, which form such prominent and absurd features in the history of former ages. There is among us (and peaceful be his ashes who first proposed it) a very obvious reason why there can be here no such monopoly of riches and influence, as have suffered the families of European kingdoms to enjoy such accumulated privileges. Our laws respecting primogeniture are based on such rational principles, that instead of pouring with all its augmenting abundance into one channel, on the demise of the head of the family, the fortune is distributed among the children, and thence flows down by innumerable streams, to enliven the great body of society, as the branches of a river irrigate and refresh the plains. Besides the great advantages universally gained by the free and rapid circulation of capital, the industrious are afforded new encouragements to persevere, and the idle have no opportunity of indulging indolence. Hence, the lapse of a few years produces striking revolutions in the pecuniary affairs of the city. Families are continually (as our correspondent has it) "emerging from obscurity," but others are descending, with something like the appearance of regular succession. Family pride may be a high and a noble feeling; but it should be cherished in secret, or appear only in endeavours to deserve, by personal demeanour, the reputation which, if justly earned, must have originated from the same cause. There is no disgrace in obscurity, unless associated with guilt; and no honour in affluence, unless accompanied by intelligence and virtue. No apology, therefore, will be deemed necessary, by our correspondent, for overrating men by their character, talents, and acquirements, rather than by the accidental advantages which may be gained and preserved alike by the deserving and by the unworthy. To return, however, to new-year day, from a digression which has unintentionally been extended to so great a length, we have no fears respecting the continuance of all its light and pleasant ceremonies; and, perhaps, there is no surer method of establishing them more firmly, than that pursued by the caprice of a few who have certainly a right to close their doors against their friends, whenever they find their society irksome, and their visits intrusive.

Chirography.—To look over the advertisements in the newspapers, one would suppose that the art of chirography had attained the summit of perfection. We learn from those voracious productions, that by some magical secret yet to be revealed, a neat running hand may be acquired in six lessons; and the most crabbed style of penmanship be immediately invested with grace and legibility. The truth of these statements seems rather inconsistent with the appearance of the manuscripts with which we are frequently favoured. Many of them leave the Chinese puzzle altogether in the shade. Articles of great value occasionally come to us, locked up in the most profound mystery, except in such sentences where (as if all the varieties of combination of which black marks on paper are susceptible, had been exhausted) the writer has accidentally adopted certain characters, bearing a remote resemblance to those in use among common people. Authors tell us, that the "glow of composition" will not allow them leisure to attend to their hooks and hangers; but they should remember the glow of reading is not quite so powerful an influence, and affords a tired editor but an imperfect clue through the intricate and fanciful mazes of their manuscripts. It is not, however, the editor alone who suffers, (although the antiquary's task in studying out the inscriptions of a long-buried monument or broken coin, is scarcely more laborious than his) but the additional time requisite for the compositor to decipher the hieroglyphic page, is a serious diminution of the profits of his daily labour, and must consign many a good communication to oblivion.

Moveable houses.—There are probably few places in the world, where the art of moving of every description, but especially houses, has been carried to a greater degree of perfection, than in this city. The successful manner in which numerous operations of this nature have here been effected, has excited much notice. Certainly those by whom the buildings were erected, never dreamed but that their work would stand till fire, revolution, or the slower hand of time, levelled them with the ground. By the following, however, we find a proposition to construct moveable houses, and a hint that they may be "employed in African expeditions!" We may yet live to see a prosperous city "moving" from its old site to some more agreeable climate, or richer soil; but we do not feel sufficiently acquainted with the subject to venture an opinion as to the practicability of Mr. Bloun's plan.

"A French engineer, of the name of Bloun, lately presented a memoir to the academy on the construction of moveable houses. Similar edifices have long been used in Sweden; but the mason as well as the carpenter has been employed in their construction. Those invented by M. Bloun, on the contrary, are entirely of wood, can be erected in a very short time, so as to be perfectly habitable, and can be transported with facility. One of these houses has been eight times taken down in the course of eight years, and has travelled over a space of a hundred and fifty miles. M. Bloun thinks that this kind of building may be usefully employed in African expeditions. The committee of the academy to whom his memoir was referred, are of a different opinion: they say that the extreme heat of the climate would soon warp the wood, and render the adjustment of the parts impossible."

The Vine.—The successful cultivation of the wine grape is so very desirable an object in the United States, that we are not astonished to find it has excited much attention. The moral effect which the introduction of light and cheap wines, as substitutes for the pernicious spirituous liquors so generally in use, on the body of the nation, would form a powerful auxiliary to the various methods by which the benevolent have attempted to reform the alarming evils of intemperance. It cannot be denied that the awful consequences of this vice, expressed in clear and strong language, and sanctioned by learned and influential members of the community, may awaken a few wavering profligates to a temporary sense of danger, and stimulate them to a weak resolution of amendment; but the disease has taken too deep a hold to be either written or talked away. Moral apothegms alone oppose but a feeble barrier to the mind already enervated by dissipated habits, and urged by immediate temptations; and the wretched victims need not only instruction but assistance respecting the method by which the remedy is to be wrought. We are, therefore, interested in the efforts now making in various parts of the country to promote this branch of agriculture. The papers inform us that a grape, of a very large and delicious kind, is now growing on the banks of the Ohio. It is a heavy and sure bearer, and flourishes luxuriantly on several farms, and, it is said, the cultivators expect, in a few years, to reap a profitable harvest, and to devote much time and care to the manufacture of wine.

Lectures on Literature.—We observe with much pleasure, that Samuel L. Knapp proposes to deliver a course of lectures (five in number) on English literature. They will comprise notices of standard works, from the early down to the late authors, embracing remarks on American writers, and also on the progress of letters in this country. The course is to commence at Clinton-hall, as soon as his historical lectures close. The encouragement of this species of exhibition is a very desirable object in a community abounding in amusements, of which few have equally strong claims on the notice, particularly of the young. If tolerable patronage were extended to them, (and female influence would operate powerfully in their favour) they would, no doubt, be much increased. All who have attended Mr. Knapp's previous lectures, will acknowledge how interesting similar subjects may be rendered in the hands of intelligent men.

Certificates.—The custom of giving certificates, at the request of every adventurer, by which attention and patronage may be attracted towards any particular thing or person, is nothing more nor less than a fraud upon the public. It is, however, a kindness to individuals, sometimes much in need of assistance, which few have the firmness to refuse; and very unequivocal falsehoods are often circulated under the sanction of this general practice. The most meretricious articles are thus frequently palmed off upon the unsuspecting and credulous, while others of genuine worth are disregarded by those more familiar with the manner in which these matters are conducted. A gentleman of this city lately furnished an example which might be adopted in similar cases. A company associated together, for the purpose of introducing, on speculation, a certain kind of coal, not particularly remarkable for inflammability, applied to him for a certificate of its good qualities. After some solicitation, he complied with their request, stating that "he had made various experiments with the coal in question; that he understood the state whence it was brought contained large quantities of the same; and he was, therefore, decidedly of opinion, that, at the general conflagration, it would be the last spot of the earth consumed, if it did not entirely escape ignition!"

A damper.—The learned compiler of a work upon Junius, in which an attempt was made to identify that shadowy and much-talked-of personage with Horne Tooke, from the striking similarity in their hand-writing, sent fac similes of the two gentlemen's penmanship to an engraver, requesting his opinion, in the form of an affidavit, respecting the singular resemblance upon which the theory was founded. The artist went before a commissioner and duly made oath, that "he had given the specimens the most careful examination, and could not detect any remote resemblance between them, except divers z's undotted, and l's uncrossed, and certain fanciful and irregular flourishes, meant for words, which appeared common to the manuscripts of all great geniuses."

Flattering compliment.—One of our fellow citizens, a very estimable gentleman, by-the-by, but an author of more than ordinary dullness, sent his book to a distinguished literary friend, and was highly gratified with the following reply: "I have perused your production, and beg leave to assure you it has not in the least changed my previous opinion of its author." The reader will remember the gallant's exclamation to a lady:

"Sweet is the veil, where in no sense resides."

A Comet.—One of these wandering heavenly bodies is distinctly to be seen in the south-east, from its rising at about four o'clock in the morning till day-light. It is said to be of a mild and gentle aspect. Not many years ago so extraordinary a visitor, at such a revolutionary period, would have been regarded as a very important sign of the times.

Stories of American Life.—A London paper, after eulogizing Miss Mitford's "Stories of American Life," enumerates, among her happiest efforts, tales and essays, several of which were written by gentlemen of this city!

Rightly served.—The Worcester Spy mentions that three young men have been fined twenty-five dollars each and costs, at Buffalo, for singing and using improper language in a stage, by which two respectable females were compelled to leave the coach. The names of these profligates should also have been published.

ARIA.

SUNG BY MRS. AUSTIN, IN THE CHARACTER OF CINDERELLA.—MUSIC BY ROSSINI.

[The following beautiful and plaintive melody is from the opera of Cinderella. They who have attended its representation at the Park theatre, may remember that the same strain is played previous to the appearance of Angelina in a vision to the prince. It is there impressed on his memory, and as it is introduced whenever she appears afterwards, it affects him visibly. There is nothing more exquisite throughout the opera than this little connecting chain of melody. It is first sung in the chamber of Mesdames Clarinda and Thibet, where they are adorning their persons before two mirrors, while Angelina, or Cinderella, as they nickname her, is sitting pensively by a fire. Rossini has charmingly contrasted the feelings of the two elder sisters with those of the younger. Their music is full of stirring vivacity in a bold major, hers replete with melancholy in a subdued minor mood. We find Angelina again chanting her old song, when she accidentally crosses her lover in the hall of her father. It is also introduced when she descends from her car as a princess and guest at the ball, and it attends her for the last time, when, in humble guise, she presents herself to try on the glass slipper.] B.

Andantino.

Once a King there chanced to be, Who to mar-ry, who to mar-ry, had a mind; So he sought a wife to find, And he'd his choice of fair ones three! Thus 'tis said, Scorn-ing wealth and charms a-lone, Vir-tue's call his heart o-bey'd, And he chose, he chose a love-ly maid To share his love and throne! La la la la, Li li li li, La la la la!

AUTHORITY.—I seldom resort to authorities in support of my opinions, not because I think myself wiser than others, but I never met with a writer who did not, in the course of his reasonings, furnish arguments in support of two entirely opposite systems.

LEGISLATION.—The multiplication of unnecessary laws is the worst and most vexatious species of tyranny. Despotism is nothing but restraints, and where these exist without just cause, there can be no true liberty.

DELAYS.—Inexperienced persons think when great plans only stand still, they must be going backwards. The truth is, however, that wise men are never in a hurry to force events. They know that patience works more wonders than activity.

ANACHEONISM.—Egmont, in his travels through Egypt and the Holy Land, says that a monk of the monastery of Mount Sinai told him there was in one of their cellars a cannon deposited in the time of the Emperor Justinian.

DANIEL BOONE.—In the summer of 1770 Daniel Boone was the only white man in Kentucky. In 1810 Kentucky contained upwards of four hundred thousand white inhabitants.

CUSTOM-HOUSE.—The first custom-house was established by the Athenians, at Scutari, formerly Chrysopolis, for levying imposts on the commerce of the Black Sea.

A SELFISH FELLOW.—He was so selfish that he could not bring himself to share even his thoughts with another.

AMERICA.—America was discovered by a blunder, christened by a fraud, and peopled by murder.

AN INDIFFERENT CHARACTER.—He never had generosity to acquire a friend, nor courage to provoke an enemy.

PITY.—Nothing is more common than to throw away our pity on persons much happier than ourselves.

VAUCLUSE.—The fountain of Vaucluse is converted to the ignominious use of turning a paper-mill.

STATESMEN.—Our American statesmen, at least too many of them, do not comprehend the dignity of silence.

SELF-RESPECT.—When a man is particularly pleased with himself, it is ten to one nobody else is.

A HARD JOURNEY.—The Russians assert that St. Anthony made a voyage from Rome to Novorogrod on a millstone.

PRECEDENTS.—Men who cannot reason resort to precedents, as if there were not more bad precedents than good ones!

THE GRAVE.—In the grave all are kings.

ASTRONOMY.—The science of astronomy probably originated in an idea universal in the east, that, by the assistance of the stars a knowledge of future events might be obtained.

DISCRETION OF JUDGES.—The discretionary power of judges is very often little better than the caprice of a tyrant.

A BLOCKHEAD.—A fellow who has not sagacity enough to sound the depth of his own mind and detect its shallowness.

POOR RATES.—Money given without charity, and received without gratitude.

A WEAK MAN.—Obstinate in trifles; unsteady in affairs of the greatest moment.

A SCOUNDREL.

Among mankind he occupies the place
That serpents do amongst the reptile race;
In bright disguise his deadly poison brings,
Coils him unseen, and silent creeps and stings.

THE RETURN.

I LEFT her in the glow of youth, a fair and gentle thing,
Whose griefs, if griefs she had, were like the fleeting clouds of spring.
The very sun seemed brighter yet when'er its yellow glow
Tinged the dark locks that clustering hung around her brow of snow.
Her eye was stranger yet to tears, save those by pity shed,
And virtue gave her holiest wreath to deck the maiden's head.
Such was she when adventure shaped my wandering course afar,
To where the starry banner streamed above the ranks of war.
I past to foreign climes, and years on noiseless wing went by,
Like shapes that haunt the slumberer's dream—like shadows from
And dark regrets came sadly to my solitary breast, (the sky,
For many a friend by death struck down—the loveliest and the best.
Once more along the dark blue sea my bounding vessel flew;
Once more upon the pilgrim's sight his native mountains grew;
And as he saw their rugged cliffs fling back the ocean's foam,
He felt, though all were strangers round, he yet retained a home.
I stood again within the walls where Emily had smiled,
A rose with leaves half folded yet—a young and laughing child;
I stood beside the antique hearth, where she had knelt in prayer,
Her hands within her mother's clasped, but what a change was there!
It seemed as though the spoiler's wing had rudely swept away,
Far, far into the gulf of time, the forms of yesterday,
So fresh appeared to memory's eye the well-remembered scene,
Though years, in all their dim array, like spectres stood between.
Ah! how my hoding spirit wept as each familiar spot
Recalled some image of the past mid busier scenes forgot;
The open door, the ready hand stretched out to cheer and bless—
The heart that never stay'd to ask the merits of distress,
Nor coldly spoke of errors past, but made the wretch its care,
Till misery half forgot her want and frailty her despair.
How fades the lustre of the eye, the glowing cheek how chill,
When flashes on the shrinking soul the certainty of ill!
The star of hope burns on awhile, and sheds a wavering beam,
A faithless and uncertain light, upon the wretch's dream;
While fell despair but waits to see the lingering rays depart,
To cast his cheerless dusky gloom around the human heart.
I gazed on the forsaken scene, where once the village throng
Had mingled in the merry dance, or breathed the rustic song;
Where age his brow relaxed, and like a summer eve serene,
Smiled at the living picture of what once himself had been.
Now all was silent save the autumn's melancholy blast,
That shook the sear-leaf from the bough as carelessly it past;
The weeds around the lonely steps in rank luxuriance grew,
The moss was on the broken seats beneath the spreading yew,
Wildly the honeysuckle clung around the latticed gate,
The garden all neglected spoke a language desolate,
The jasmine o'er the grass-grown path its snowy blossoms strewed,
The rose-bower seemed a mockery in such a solitude;
The shutter, by a single hinge, hung loosely on the wall,
And not a voice the silence broke of that deserted hall.
Beshrew the reckless spoiler, who—but why the tale repeat
Of virtue trampled in the dust, beneath the tempter's feet,
When lured by beauty's fatal charms and clothed with specious art,
The human fiend approached to prey upon the guiltless heart?
"Come rest thee in thy mother's arms," the wretched parent said,
As o'er the daughter's faded form she bent her aged head;
"From want and from unkindness thou wilt find a shelter there,
"And all the world's relentless scorn, if not from thy despair."
"Oh! might I bear thy brand of guilt, thine agony of shame—
"Pd bless the sneer that writhed my soul, and blackened o'er my name.
"The loud and heartless calumny—the whispered taunt should be
"As welcome as the balmy breath of summer wind to me.
"How would my spirit bound to meet accumulating ill,
"To see these lovely as thou wert, and know these spotless still,
"To hush these bursting sobs and tears—this beating tumult wild—
"Here, in my bosom hide thy face—my broken-hearted child." A.

LETTERS FROM RUSSIA.

SKETCHES OF THE CITY OF ST. PETERSBURG.

Addressed to a gentleman of this city.

NUMBER THIRTEEN.

St. Petersburg, 1830.

THE fortress is a hexagon, constructed in the most approved style of modern defence, enclosing the extensive area of the south end of the Petrovskoe Ostrof, and consequently facing the whole line of palaces along the Court-quay, on the opposite side of the Neva. It was originally possessed by the Russians to protect their frontier against the Swedish inroads; but is now no longer held as a position of defence to the town, as an enemy could approach and possess himself of it from any point on the land side, and the whole city must be demolished before a gun from the fortress could disturb his ranks. As an approach to it from either of the bridges would be circuitous, we shall cross in an open boat from the Admiralty-quay, and land at one of the front ramparts. You will find the granite walls very strong and thick, and mounting a numerous battery of artillery, surrounded on the land side by a wide, deep fosse, and defended in addition by a line of thick bastions. The mint coins the whole metallic circulation of the empire, and does its work in a perfect manner, and altogether by steam-engines, under the superintendence of an Englishman. The cathedral is situated in about the centre of the fortress, and is the burial-place of the sovereigns of Russia from the time of Peter the Great. The tombs are placed on each side of the altar, at the head of the church. They are perfectly plain in appearance, with the golden initials on the front, of the particular emperor or empress they may enclose, and covered with embroidered palls. Crystal chandeliers are suspended from the roof, and the walls are decorated with stands of colours, marshal's batons, keys of cities and fortresses, taken by the Russians since the foundation of St. Petersburg. We were shown several relics, and rather a curious one of Peter the Great, termed an ex voto, which simply consists of a billet of thanks he wrote, signed, and enclosed in an ivory ball turned by his own hand, and offered up at the altar of Almighty God for his relief from a severe malady at the waters of Olonetz, on the fourteenth of March, 1724. There is nothing particularly worthy of note in the architecture of this cathedral. Its spire is covered with an inferior gold or gilt copper, and rises with the cross to the height of three hundred and thirty feet. They still exhibit a boat, in a tolerable state of preservation, constructed by Peter; and as you pass from the fortress up the Neva, you are shown the hut he for some time inhabited, on first coming to lay the foundations of St. Petersburg. It is built of hewn logs, the interstices filled with clay, and has three apartments. In the first he held his levees; the second was his chapel, still adorned with the sainted image to which he paid his adorations, and the officiating robes of the priest; and the third was his bed-chamber. A little garden, fourteen paces by six, and just as he left it, runs down to the water's edge. For the better preservation of the hut, another building has been thrown over it.

The road for several miles into the country on this side is paved, and deals are laid down, which makes it a very agreeable carriage ride. The two branches of the river, the Nevka and Little Neva, divide in their course to the gulf into many rivulets, unite again and separate, thus forming innumerable islands, adorned with no less than three elegant palaces, belonging to the imperial family, and with the country residences of the nobility and citizens. The grounds are generally laid out in English style, and display meandering gravel-walks, fish-ponds, and quite a variety of flowers and shrubbery. Here also are public gardens and promenades, that are crowded to overflowing on a Sunday afternoon. On what is called the Apothecary island is the botanical garden, inferior only to that of Paris, and under the superintendence of one of the first botanists of the age. The number of plants in it is estimated at eighty-seven thousand. They are in a fine state of growth and preservation, and constantly augmenting.

Considerable difficulty is experienced in raising melons and other esculent plants in the gardens, and in order to succeed they are obliged to resort more or less to glass covers; for, notwithstanding the extreme length of the summer days, the gardeners assure me they may expect sufficient frost every month, July excepted, to kill their vines, and seriously injure all but the hardiest vegetables. The heat here at mid-day is almost as oppressive as in America, but the nights are quite the reverse, being invariably damp and cool. Much of the scenery about these islands is lovely and beautiful; the broader sheets of water arched with elegant bridges, and bearing the low gondola or streaming yacht over their clear, pellucid bosom, skirted with intervening forest scenery, and cultivated shores, adorned by splendid palaces and charming villas. The night at this season is no more than two or three hours of soft twilight; and maugre the annoyance of mosquitoes, I have not unfrequently spent the better half of it in wandering about, enjoying the quiet beauty of the scenery, and listening to the song of the nightingale. I had heard and read so much of the charm and variety of tone of this much extolled bird, that I naturally expected something wonderfully enchanting in its song; but I must confess that I was doomed (as one will often find himself when he goes abroad and hears and sees the reality) to great disappointment. The poets and naturalists who have so enthusiastically described them, cannot have visited our side of the water. For variety of tone and compass of voice, the nightingale is far inferior to the American mocking-bird; his high notes are loud, and to my ears somewhat shrill, and the middle and lower tones yield to the sweet song of the thrush, and the plaintive evening chants of the blue-bird and robin. Indeed, as a songster I should hardly rank him above the elegant, though (for what reason I could never divine) much slandered and abused cat-bird.

THE CENSOR.

THE LITTLE GENIUS.

No. 106.

No one can conceive what a source of delight I have found in this Little Genius of mine. Accident flung me among the charming, merry, and enlightened inhabitants of this great and busy metropolis an isolated, obscure, and unattractive student; of personal appearance so ordinary, that no woman's eyes ever cared to gaze on me twice, and destitute of the powers which nature has bestowed upon her more favourite children, and by which ugliness is sometimes hallowed in its association with intellectual greatness. The efforts of this enchanting being have cheered my solitude, and afforded me a method of linking myself, although remotely, with my fellow-creatures. To the tenant of a dungeon the blue sky and silver moon are not more welcome.

Yet I am informed there are many who declare this kind friend to be a fictitious creature—a mere child of my own idle fancy.

While I was musing on the inconsistency of the town, in sometimes swallowing with eager credulity the most monstrous impossibilities relative to other matters, and in refusing to receive as truth the simple accounts with which I have, with much diffidence, afforded them of the power and benevolence of the Little Genius, the sparkles which had announced his first visit again shone out brilliantly from the fire, and he once more appeared.

"Oh, ho! my friend student," he said, "so the sleigh-riding, music-loving, party-giving, pleasure-seeking inhabitants of this wonderful town of yours think you have created me out of the materials of your own imagination! Beshrew their unbelieving spirits! It is I who have lifted you from oblivion, and given you leave to reveal the secrets of my skill; and, if I pleased, I would afford them such incontestable proof not only of my existence, but of my familiar acquaintance with the minutest details, which they vainly think buried in utter oblivion, as to leave no further room for discussing the question of my reality. I could disclose many a hidden event, and correct many a droll error. You shall see one this moment, and we will amuse ourselves with the gravity with which these sage personages accuse their friends of being mistaken, while they themselves are running blindfold into the most grotesque excesses. There is no cause for wonder in my disclosures to you. Do not you fall into the blunder to believe that you alone are honoured with the acquaintance of superior beings. There are more little genii than one haunting the steps of the many ladies and gentlemen who read your hasty sketches, and disregard the high source whence they come. Not all like me appear in their proper person, nor do all advocate the cause of benevolence and virtue. Bad spirits, master student, pestilent, malicious, dark wanderers from scenes of gloomy woe are abroad, thwarting our honest plans; and let me tell you, that however rare the better sort break through the ordinary routine of nature for good purposes, there are few who have not received the visits of supernatural enemies in disguise. Should they come avowedly appertaining to a higher order of existencies, accompanied by all the magic paraphernalia of their mysterious power, their victims would take the alarm, and shake off their corrupting influence with horror. It is the prerogative of the good only to delight in appearing what they are, and to meet, without shrinking, the severest examination. But the wicked assume cunning disguises, that they may not arouse suspicion and provoke scrutiny. I will show you one of these evil genii, even as he passes unnoticed through society."

The glass discovered meadows, with boys at play.

"Mark yonder lad," said my companion; "nature has made him generous, sensible, and noble; but among his mates observe that tall, bold-looking boy, who treads amid the rest as if he were their master. Those two are friends; mark their actions."

The timid lad first pointed out to me, had just received a basket of fruit as a present. Beautiful grapes were clustering together; the rich peach, crimson, as if it blushed to be gazed on by so many eager eyes. The boy seized a handful of the tempting treasures, and was about distributing them among his companions, when the other, by a silent look, and unobserved shake of the head, induced him to pause.

"Fool," he said in a low voice, "keep it yourself, or you will repent it to-morrow."

The selfish feeling prevailed, and he swallowed his fruit in a corner.

Again he became embroiled in a quarrel with a companion, neither so old nor so strong as himself. His antagonist was a timid, friendless, unhappy orphan, whom physical weakness rendered impotent in his resentment, while it frequently subjected him to the insult of the brutal. The most benevolent in principle are sometimes goaded on to cruelties by passion, and he, first alluded to, in a moment of rage, struck his helpless opponent, and stung him with the coarsest reproaches; but when, after vain endeavours to retaliate, the orphan boy, with flashing eyes and burning cheeks, covered his face with his hands, and burst into tears; the proud, angry heart of the bully was touched; a thought of pity, even of love, came over him; his own eyes were moistened; he stretched out his hand, and was on the point of acknowledging his cruel impetuosity, and soliciting pardon, when the bold haughty friend, who had before volunteered his counsel, stood beside him, with a sneer upon his lip, and a scornful expression in his eyes, as he fixed their dark orbs upon him, and whispered—"coward." It was enough—the relenting boy blushed at his own momentary weakness, and derided his wretched foe with bitter invective.

He next appeared in manhood. It was a time of high political excitement. At first he had embarked in politics with the purest motives. He deemed the country needed the active assistance of every honest man. He scorned personal interest when opposed to the public good; and the fashionable words patriotism, freedom, and other lofty phrases, came often from his lips; but, as time rolled on, his views of life began to change, and the circle of his benevolent desires to contract. The reform of the human race appeared no such easy matter. He could not waste his precious time any more for the vague and remote consequences which might arise therefrom; and his narrowing schemes of political wisdom at length embraced only the near and dear among his own relations. Although the object of his labours had thus gradually undergone a total revolution, his exertions were not intermitted. He continued attached to a certain party; and, even while invoking the spirit of independence, he suffered himself to be bound to them, like a slave chained to some conqueror's chariot-wheels. He had gone so far with no reward, but now visions of office danced brightly in his imagination, and he almost grasped the wreath of fame and wealth, when it became necessary to put down an individual of the opposite party, whose really disinterested toils had ever been exercised for the national happiness, lest he should gain the reward which his philanthropy and wisdom merited. The custom of ruining an honest citizen did not die away with Aristides. It became the duty of our friend to advocate a measure which he perfectly well knew was inconsistent with the prosperity of his country; and to slander a man whom he knew to be all that was pure and noble.

He was sitting in his chamber—the pen was in his hand—but, after musing a moment, he threw it down. The freshness of youthful feeling came up in his heart—a sudden impulse, which made him blush at his systematic, habitual, licentious baseness.

"There is a contamination," he said, "in this worldly prudence. It makes me a party tool—a vile slave, to perpetrate filthy actions."

As he spoke his early friend stood by his side.

"They are talking of you in Washington," he said; "you are to be appointed—." The sentence was finished in a whisper. The politician's eyes brightened, he seized his pen, and taxed his imagination to invent falsehoods, and misrepresent truths, to deceive the people, and ruin their advocate.

Even while the hireling calumniator was thus perpetrating his slanders against truth, virtue, and nature, I noted that the form of his bold adviser underwent a sudden transformation. His audacious but handsome countenance became dark, grim, and hideous. Cloven feet grew out of his boots; wings, like those of a vulture, spread out from his shoulders, and as he vanished in a little clap of thunder, (all of which the learned politician was too busy to observe,) I perceived the friendly expression of his face change to a scowl of fierce hatred, and sullen triumph.

"You see," said the Little Genius, "how the world goes. Beware of demons in the disguise of friends, and tell your incredulous readers to look to their own families, and take care lest some evil spirit has them even now under his influence. F.

Sketches from the Diary of an Editor.

THE REVIEWER.

A NUMBER of well written articles have lately appeared in the public journals, as sketches from the diary of a physician. The idea is a good one. However interesting may be the descriptive essays of any general observer, it is impossible for them to compete with those furnished by an author of equal talents, upon a subject directly and continually within his view. Although he who practises the medical profession is, more than any other, brought into the most striking scenes, yet the follower of every profession might collect a store of simple facts, which, related in clear and strong language, would form valuable pictures of human life beheld in extraordinary situations. Among the rest, the calling of an editor affords much valuable material. He, too, possesses opportunities of witnessing character in new lights, of discovering the secret springs which act on the community, and of marking the striking contrasts between the tastes and feelings of different individuals.

It is scarcely possible to satisfy even an individual in all his moods of mind. His tastes will differ from yours in many instances; and when they are alike, the same subject, viewed from different positions, whence one sees the existence of much which the other does not suspect, will produce an infinite variety of opinions. How difficult, then, is the task of catering for the huge, capricious creature called the public. A monster with despotic power—responsible to no one—guided by no law—constructed of heterogeneous materials—gifted with desires and appetites inconsistent with each other—demanding to-day what he will loathe to-morrow—with power to blight with a glance, yet so thoughtless and destitute of that sort of prudence which an individual applies to the proper administration of his own affairs, that the weakest hand may sometimes lead him astray, for he has a great propensity to plunge into excesses. In truth the poor editor has a dire time of it, whose business it is to wait on this mighty monster, to soothe his rage, to please his variable taste, to put him softly on the back, and put him in a good humour with himself.

It is not, however, the public alone with whom the editor has to deal. There is a vast variety of under-machinery, against which he must work his way.

I was sitting in my elbow-chair, profoundly engaged in the duties of my avocation, surrounded with various new publications and piles of newspapers. Several splendid volumes were lying on the table, belonging to the class of Annals, Souvenirs, Tokens, &c. &c. of which the press has within a few years sent forth so great a variety. I was interrupted by a timid knock at the door, which presently opened to admit a tall, gaunt gentleman, with spectacles and a cane. Although apparently young, he moved with a staid air of wisdom. His face was lean and intellectual, and he entered upon my acquaintance with the formality of one on excellent terms with himself.

"Sir, I have taken the liberty to call on you. I am connected with the Cahawba Democrat, and wish to hand you a short review of Mr. Thompson's travels in Kamschatka. I think myself that it is one of my happiest efforts. Your paper is well established, and I believe has a pretty wide circulation, so I concluded to let you have it."

"Sir," said I, gradually unbending the expression of severity with which I had at first received him as an intruder, "you are very welcome, sir. Pray take a seat. I am happy to make your acquaintance."

"You are very good, sir," he replied, placing the manuscript in my hands; "I have read your journal with much interest, and should be happy to be considered as one of your contributors."

"Sir, you are very kind. It would give me pleasure, sir, to publish your communications. I suppose, if I should wish, in overlooking the article, if I should wish—wish to retouch—to revise—to—"

"Oh, sir, any alteration you are perfectly welcome to make which your experience dictates."

"I have no idea that any will be necessary."

"Whatever you please, sir. The piece is so so—no great things—but I think it will make some talk. Do not let me interrupt you, sir, you appear to be engaged. I wish you good morning, sir."

"Good morning, sir," said I, fairly rising out of my capacious elbow-chair, a thing which I never do except on very particular occasions, "good morning, sir."

He gathered up his cloak, adjusted his spectacles, suffered a slight disposition towards the angular to intrude upon the elegant perpendicularity of his person, and made his exit.

"A very agreeable, well-behaved, intelligent, young man, I declare," said I, "very much of a gentleman. I am fortunate this morning."

I looked slightly through the piece, which grew in my estimation.

"'Delightful delineations of life and manners'—'discovers the finest natural taste, highly cultivated by study'—'would bear a comparison with the highest flights of genius among the ancients'—'bids fair to become the most extraordinary writer of this age.'"

Fine sentences these—fair, clear hand—excellent grammar. Here, Peter—tell Mr. MacNiven to leave out the "important statements respecting a young and unprotected female," and I shall have a review, under the head of polite literature."

"The men are waiting for copy," said Peter; "they've got the unprotected female almost set up."

"Can't help it, Peter. I must look over this manuscript and point it. The deuce take the people! They don't know a comma from a note of interrogation. Here's an essay on the importance of instilling virtuous principles into the young—very short—and let me see. 'The importance of virtuous principles—comma—instilled into youth—comma—future happiness—welfare in life;' it's all pointed. Take it up. I'll just look over this review, and have it ready in ten minutes."

And at it I went. The article I found to be tolerably well written; but the praise awarded to Mr. Thompson's travels became so fulsome, and his production was placed so far above every other publication of this or any other century, that I found it necessary to strike out, alter, and moderate, with considerable freedom.

It was then put in the hands of the compositor, and in the afternoon, I had just spread out a clean proof upon the table, when the erudite reviewer again made his appearance, as lean, perpendicular, and intellectual as ever.

"Good evening to you, sir," he exclaimed. "As I was casually passing this way, it struck me that I would ask the favour of a proof of my review."

"Certainly, sir. This is it. You will perceive, however, that I have availed myself of your polite permission to—to—that is—to—"

"To what?" asked perpendicular, with a stare of surprise and expectation.

I perceived his face darken a little, and a pair of very reasonably large greenish-looking eyes peered at me above the spectacles. I am a modest man, and can never summon up energy even to vindicate, with any degree of success, my own rights, unless I get slightly warmed in the argument. His stare and sententiousness combined, rather embarrassed me.

"Why, the fact is, my dear sir, you are—that is, you must be—indeed, it is impossible but that you should be—aware that—the greatest authors—the most renowned—and—so forth—in the hurry of writing—in the—"

"The glow of composition," he gravely interrupted.

"Exactly so, sir—in the glow of composition, they sometimes—"

"Oh yes, I understand—some trivial error in grammar—I hope you have carefully corrected any thing of that kind."

"Why, the truth is, my dear sir, your article is really—but—in one or two trivial instances I thought that you a little overdid the matter, and—"

"Sir?"

The crisis had arrived—I had got along so far tolerably well, so I buttoned my coat, took a pinch of snuff, looked cool and indifferent, inhaled a long breath, and was preparing to go at it again; when the learned reviewer, who had been looking over the proof, exclaimed, with an expression something similar to that of Hamlet, when he perceived the ghost of the old gentleman,

"Why, thunder and lightning, sir! what's all this? why, you've ruined the article for ever! the very best passages, those I had set my heart on, are cut out!"

"I am sorry, sir, that you are dissatisfied with—"

"Dissatisfied, sir? I am dissatisfied, sir! I am offended, sir! I am insulted, sir! You have put words in my mouth which I never used. I won't have this published so. I will withdraw the copy. I'll publish it in the Cahawba Democrat."

"It's too late. The paper is nearly ready for press."

"I wish it was ready to go to the devil, sir! Let me tell you, you overstep the limits of your right, sir, and the decency of a gentleman, and the modesty of nature, in thus presuming to—"

"Stop, sir," said I, once more rising from my elbow-chair, for the impudence of the fellow made me mad; and when any one takes advantage of the natural civility and diffidence of my manner, to probe me too far, I fling modesty where the rascal wished my paper. I hate a quarrel as a very troublesome, undignified, stupid piece of business; but a bully is a yet greater object of contempt.

"I regret, sir," I said, "that any difference of this nature should have arisen between us. You told me to alter your piece, and I have done so. I am responsible for what appears in my columns. I will not afford you—nay, sir, hear me out—any medium for the circulation of opinions which may be false. The book which you praise so enthusiastically, I never saw nor heard of. I have, therefore, cut out some of the most extravagant encomiums. Who your friend Mr. Thompson is, I know not; but I shrewdly suspect his book is unworthy such unlimited praise."

"You are unfit, sir, to conduct a public journal," said my companion, "and let me tell you—"

"Let me tell you, sir," said I, "there is the door. If you do not walk out of it, I shall afford you a shorter passage through the window."

The scene was rapidly approaching its denouement, when a third person, my worthy friend Mr. Smith, entered. He greeted my antagonist with a familiar nod, but received in return a salutation rather confused, which was no sooner given, than the elegant critic, after a fierce glance at me, withdrew.

"Who is that agreeable young man?" asked I, when he had disappeared.

"That—why, that's Thompson—Mr. Obadiah Thompson, the author of Travels to Kamschatka, who may, without any flattery on his own part, boast of having written one of the dullest productions that ever came from the press."

THE FINE ARTS.

LACY'S VERSION OF CINDERELLA, AND THE LYRICAL DRAMA.

ON the production and great success of this fine opera we cannot refrain from offering a few observations, from which we will endeavour to exclude the terms "critical or analytical," and other lofty technical phrases, as indulged in by more learned scribes, that we may exemplify our opinions in language comprehensible to all. That species of grandiloquence which delights in mystification, and an ostentatious display of which would scarcely interest the reader, even were he able to understand it, is too much in vogue among those who set out with the resolution of enlightening the world upon the various branches of the fine arts. The names of numerous composers might be easily procured—learned men, whose works enjoy a dignified repose in European libraries, although they are seldom intruded upon the notice of the public. But we will not "make the judicious grieve" by any unnecessary enumerations. They do not care to learn that some great musician entertained a high opinion of Mr. Rophino Lacy, and lived in the same city with him, and that consequently the said Lacy must be a man of ability—that the ino at the end of Roph has had a most happy effect on his translation of Rossini's operas—nor to be told that because Mr. Lacy used to lead the ballet, and play a first violin at the Italian theatre in London, and has actually sat in the same orchestra with Rossini, his success has been consequently extraordinary; and yet these circumstances, as things go, are sufficient to make him cut a most redoubtable figure in some musical biography. They are about as much to the purpose as the apposite reply—"Pray, sir, were you ever in Germany?" "No, sir, but my brother plays exceedingly well on the German flute."

Mr. Lacy's success must, therefore, be traced to some other cause. The opera of Cinderella is a close translation of the original works from which it is selected; in every morceau the exact sentiment is maintained, the situations are unaltered, and the dialogue is agreeable, and leads admirably to the introduction of the music. We thus attribute to Mr. Lacy ability of no mean order; and when we add that, out of three translations of Rossini's works, two have been highly successful, we think we have done enough for him in the way of eulogy. His first attempt was an adaptation of Il Turco in Italia, at Drury-lane, which failed, after two or three nights, because the drama was inefficient. His second essay was the French opera called Ivanhoe, the music by Rossini, which had a brilliant run at Covent-garden, under the title of the "Maid of Judah." His third, Cinderella, also came out at the latter theatre, and is now before the American public, and its success in both countries is the best comment on its merits.

The production of such works as the "Maid of Judah," the full score of which we have had an opportunity of perusing, and the success of Cinderella, are of first-rate value to the English lyrical drama. Indeed the last fifteen years have witnessed greater progress to perfection in it, than the previous century can boast. Since the death of Dr. Arne until the days of Bishop, opera actually stood still, and no work of any consequence appeared. The Beggar's Opera by Gay, Love in a Village by Bickerstaff, the Lord of the Manor by Burgoyne, the Castle of Andalusia by Arnold, with a few other light dramas with pretty music, were the only compositions destined to assist the splendid opera of Artaxerxes, the Mask of Comus, the dramatic works of Purcell, with the solitary effort of Locke, quoad Macbeth, in maintaining the pretensions of our lyrical drama; while at the same time our sacred music reared a tower of strength and fame, and the national melodies of Great Britain proved that a taste for music is our inheritance. Bishop was the grand reformist. To him we are indebted, in addition to his own masterly compositions, for cultivating the national taste, and opening our ears to the beauties of foreign authors. Through his exertions Mozart, Boieldieu, and Rossini were ingrafted on the stock of our drama, and introduced within the walls of our theatres with triumphant success. Emulation was the consequence. Weber and Winter, with divers works of Boieldieu, and those of Auber, succeeded; but, since the adaptation of Der Freischütz, which produced the composition of Oberon, expressly for Covent-garden theatre, Mr. Lacy has succeeded better than any other translator. This is no "stat pro ratione voluntas" on our part, but an opinion warranted and admitted by the public of New-York, which city alone, on this continent, has now the advantage of witnessing the various operas in routine as they are produced in London, and therefore her inhabitants are competent judges of the question. Rossini is now generally admitted to be the first dramatic composer of the Italian school, and of the age. Even the Germans, obstinate in their national prejudices, and justly proud of their great musicians, nevertheless prefer the operas of Rossini to all others, their own school excepted. This assertion is easily established by an examination of the monthly report of foreign music, as found in the London Harmonicon, which will prove that of Italian masters Rossini's operas are performed in Germany at least ten times for one of any other composer. The highly dramatic effects which this great master has so successfully studied, the beauty of his melodies, the richness of his accompaniments, in which no author of the same school can approach him, render his compositions irresistible even to those who admire Mozart and Weber. To the latter authors it has been customary to render praise for modulation of the most refined description, and their admirers claim for them in that respect superiority over Rossini. We are not prepared to dispute the point, as borne out by a general comparison of their works; but this we will venture to say, that Rossini can modulate, when the bent of his genius points that way, equal to either of them; to prove which, let the most obstinate sceptic examine the score of Guillaume Tell; nay let him take the English version of Cinderella, and we can there point out to him modulation not excelled by any composer. As for distribution of subject among the wind instruments, Mozart is deservedly esteemed; and Weber has been even said to have improved on Mozart's ideas; but Rossini, it must be allowed, has a playfulness and an originality in his introduction of fanciful imitations, which prove that he has studied that branch of instrumentation deeply, and with the greatest success. He has also found out the secret of writing to please the untaught ear; and, at the same time, of satisfying the most pedantic quid nunc, who has ability enough to understand fine composition, and candour enough to admit its worth. In short Rossini, by the novelty of his effects in instrumentation, of which a whole herd of imitators have arisen, and by a daring innovation on the hitherto undisputed rights of singers, has established a kind of school of his own. To make this clear to our readers, it will be obvious to them that our vocalists embellish music according to their respective tastes, and that one half of the graces introduced were never contemplated by the author; at the same time, certain passages are invariably marked ad libitum, or with a pause, where vocalists are expected to embellish the subject as they please. Rossini has completely taken this opportunity for display of talent away from the vocalist, and with the most scrupulous exactitude he has written such passages, or rolata, as he has considered calculated to embellish the composition; and he is said to be remarkably tenacious that singers should obey his mandates, and confine themselves to the text. We cannot give a stronger proof of the eminence to which this extraordinary musician has arrived, than by quoting the above well-known fact, for vocalists have generally ruled composers, and an endeavour by another to overturn their sway would have been hopeless. Indeed neither Weber nor Mozart have attempted it. We cannot close this article without complimenting the band of the Park theatre for their general precision, and for the ensemble which they manifest throughout the performance of this opera; nor can we point out any fault for amendment, unless it be that the trumpet occasionally brays forth notes which were never written, in place of those which ought to adorn his copy. This gentleman positively should learn to be more certain, or his place should be supplied by some person that is so. In the march which precedes the finale to the opera, he has distressed our ears more than once with most unseemly noises. The bassoon and trombone are both first-rate, and the quality of the first horn is delightful. The flute and clarionets begin to play well together, which, at the commencement of the season, we despaired of. Practice, and a vigilant leader, will do every thing for an orchestra. We would suggest to Mr. De Luce, that in beating time in certain places with his bow, though quite indispensable, it would be preferable to select the cover of a book, as the sharp sound of the wood of his desk is occasionally too distinct.

The song which we have selected for the present number is from the above opera, and is sung by Mr. Jones with great taste and expression. Although Rossini's airs abound in their own peculiar graces, yet the present one will immediately strike our musical readers, as differing materially from those compositions which have become the greatest favourites with the public: there is less brilliancy, and more of quiet, flowing melody; the more meritorious, because it has less of pretension. The accompaniment and symphonies alone are florid. It may not call down thunders from the gods, and cheers from the groundlings; but it sinks into the memory, and floats calmly in the imagination, mingled with the ideas of sylphs, fairies, and all that train of fanciful creations with which the scene abounds, and of which the words contain a description.

OBITUARY NOTICE.—We perceive, with regret, the death of Thomas Wills, Esq. a member of the New-York bar. He expired on his passage to Havana. We deviate from our usual practice in giving the following communication a place. The gentleman, whose premature decease has called it forth, was well known to us as deserving the praise which our correspondent has bestowed.

To those who knew the late Thomas Wills, Esq. eulogium is unnecessary. But to the many with whom he was not familiarly acquainted, and to those particularly whose business he was called on to transact, some slight testimonial of his industry and talents, may prove acceptable.

Dependent in early life on his own resources, he succeeded in struggling through every difficulty in procuring public confidence. While yet a youth, he attracted the attention of a gentleman, who aided and assisted him in obtaining a situation in the law office of one of our most estimable citizens. It was his first introduction to a life and society, of which at a later period he was destined to be a distinguished ornament. Here his attention and assiduity to business commanded the notice of numerous acquaintances, and here he studied, until subsequently he became competent to commence the practice of the law on his own account.

A faithful son—an affectionate brother—he felt it necessary to strain every nerve in order that he might rise in his profession. Ambitious and untiring, he applied himself in the most zealous manner, until his appointment to an important station in the court of chancery, brought him more prominently before the world, and opened to him new prospects of independence and honour.

It was now becoming evident to his numerous friends, that disease, the unfailing concomitant of overstrained exertion, was fast seizing upon him, and he was convinced of the necessity of a change of climate. The claims of others first, however, demanded his attention, until, by neglecting himself, he became his own victim.

"'Twas thine own labours gave the final blow,
"And help'd to plant the wound that laid thee low:
"So the struck eagle, stretch'd upon the plain,
"No more through rolling clouds to soar again,
"View'd his own feather on the fatal dart,
"And wing'd the shaft that quiver'd in his heart;
"Keen were his pangs, but keener far to feel,
"He nursed the pinion which impell'd the steel,
"While the same plumage that had warm'd his nest,
"Drank the last life-drop of his bleeding breast."

BYRON AT ROME.

BY W. G. CLARK.

"What are our woes and sufferance? Come and see
The cypress, hear the owl, and plod your way
O'er steps of broken thrones and temples—ye!
Whose agonies are evils of a day—
A world is at our feet, as fragile as our clay."

He stood by Tiber's yellow tide,
And marked the scenes around,
Where glorious temples, side by side,
Their sure decay had found;
Far, through the twilight's gathering haze,
The coliseum's wall,
The high—the proud of other days—
Seemed tottering to its fall.

And through the crush'd arch dimly swept
The bat's beclouded wing,
While lizards through the long grass crept,
Mid ruin's vanishing;
The ivy, with its clasping fold,
O'er frescoed chambers ran;
O'er trophied gates and shrines of old,
Wrecks of the dreamer—man!

And, from the wide Campagna's waste
The autumn's solemn wind
Came, o'er pale tombs, and piles defaced,
Wakening the thoughtful mind:
And as the musing Harold stood,
With sadness in his eye,
Old Tiber rolled his sounding flood
In hollow murmurs by.

And there, among the spoils of yore,
The dreams of wasted hours
Came, like bright clouds, his spirit o'er,
Or spring-winds over flowers;
Till sickening memories rushed along
Each pictured scene to shade;
And thoughts—a melancholy throng—
Their dark impression made.

There, with vast desolation near,
A lonely heart beat high;
A mighty heart—unknown to fear,
That sought the boon—to die;
For o'er its finest chords the tide
Of deepening woes had flowed,
Checking the joyance and the pride
That earlier years bestowed.

Yet 'twas his lot, the final sigh,
The parting word to pour,
Beneath a proud and sacred sky,
On Hella's classic shore.
Peace be to that triumphant heart!
The world hath own'd its thrill;
Its chords were of his lyre a part—
Peace to that heart!—'tis still!

ORIGINAL SKETCHES.

THE HISTORY OF UNCLE SAM AND HIS BOYS.

A TALE FOR POLITICIANS.

ONCE upon a time there lived, and lives still, in a country lying far to the west, a famous squire, rich in lands and paper money. Report made him out to be the son of John Bull, who every one knows has children in all parts of the world. But, if the truth were known, I believe he had a great many fathers, though his mother was a very honest woman, for he looked like as many people as there were hairs on his chin. But old Squire Bull had the credit of being his father, and truly there was a great likeness between them. Like Bull he was somewhat given to boasting, tippling, fighting, and sailing boats; and was apt to hold his neighbours in contempt, dubbing them a pack of snivelling, pitiful rascals, that did not dare to call their souls their own, or look their king in the face, as every cat had a right to do. He took after his father in another respect, that is to say, nobody could tell which he was most fond of, making money like a horse, or spending it like an ass. But for all this he did not so much favour John Bull, but that you could now and then catch an expression in his face that put you in mind of every body you had ever seen in the world.

John Bull had christened this son of his by the name of Jonathan; but by and by, when he became a man grown, being a good hearty fellow, about half horse half alligator, his friends and neighbours gave him the nickname of Uncle Sam; a sure sign that they liked him, for I never knew a respectable nickname given to a scurvy fellow in my life. Be this as it may, his family and all his neighbours at last came to call him nothing else but Uncle Sam; and all his beef, pork, and flour, in fact every thing that belonged to him, was marked with a huge U. S., six inches long. As I have a great respect for universal example, I shall give him this name in the sequel of my history, which I hereby commend to the special attention of all wise men, more especially the wise men of the east. As to the fools, every body knows they are so scarce now-a-days, that I hereby snap my fingers and defy them.

I flatter myself no man living is better qualified for this piece of biography. Uncle Sam and I have been hand and glove these fifty years. Many are the bouts we have had together when boys; many the frolics we have kicked up among the buxom young hussies, who are now all honest sober mothers of families; and many the bottles we have cracked together at sundry times and on divers occasions, during the good old days when if a man did not choose to be merry sometimes himself, he did not cry out against those who did. Uncle Sam was a sad fellow at raccoon hunting, and a barbecue was his delight until it got to be the custom to talk politics and make long speeches at them.

Uncle Sam, in early life, gave some offence to his father about going to the meeting-house instead of the church. One word brought on another until John Bull at length took to beating the poor fellow into conformity with his notions. He was a lad of spirit that would put up with this from no man, not even his father; and accordingly, without saying a word to anybody, he packed up his all, and little enough it was, and marched off into the wide world to seek his fortune.

You may suppose Uncle Sam had but little to begin with; but he was a stirring blade, who did not mind trouble at first, if he could only see his way clear to something better in the end. He set himself to the business of clearing and selling new lands. As fast as he became pretty comfortable in one farm, he sold out at a profit and set off for another, so that he was seldom or ever more than two or three years in the same place. But for all this he never lost sight of the main chance; for there was nothing on the face of the earth he loved so dearly as a bargain or a profitable speculation. By good management and good luck he at last got to have a vast property in lands, which he was every day adding to by buying out the Indians, or taking farms for debts that were owing him. In short, he prospered in all his undertakings, and became, in process of time, a great man among his neighbours. But to my mind he was not above half as clever a fellow as when he was poor. Then he was a jolly, careless, high-minded dog—generous as a prince, and hospitable as a Turk. He would swear a little at times, but he never meant any harm by it. But as he got rich he set himself to be mighty genteel; aped the manners of all the would-be fashionable stragglers that came that way; never invited any body to his house except to show off his new finery, and left off all his honest old habits by little and little.

The fact is, and I don't care who knows it, he took to canting, and turned the embroidered side of his jacket outwards, as a Turk does when he goes to court. Many people doubted whether he was anything the better for this; and, if I must speak my mind, I think he lost more than he gained; for, as respects myself, I had rather a man should swear and drink punch a little than pick my pocket while he is canting about brotherly love and good will to all men. If Uncle Sam is angry at this, let him scratch his back and get pleased again.

As Uncle Sam got rich, and withal stout and hearty as a young giant, the neighbouring gentry, who called him an upstart and looked askance at his prosperity, would shake their heads very wisely and cry out, "Ah! poor man, to be sure he looks well and hearty; but any body can see with half an eye he is not long for this world." And then they would sigh and take a pinch of snuff to the success of their prognostications. But it happened somehow or other that every attack he had, and every rub he met with, only served to show the strength of his constitution, and make it still stronger, until at last these false prophets began to say to themselves, "The rogue will certainly last forever."

Now I don't pretend to say this would have been the case, seeing there is an end of all things; but I verily believe he would have lived to a happy and green old age had it not been for the undutiful behaviour of his children, which made his latter days one scene of trouble and turmoil.

You must know that as soon as Uncle Sam thought himself able to maintain a family comfortably, he got him a wife, who proved an excellent housekeeper, and in the course of twice as many years his children amounted to four and twenty; all jolly, strapping, roystering blades, with the exception of two or three that were rather stunted in the growth, or as Uncle Sam used to say in joke, "shrunk in the boiling." These last were rather conceited and jealous, as most little people I believe are.

As fast as these lads grew up, Uncle Sam portioned them off on his farms, which they were to pay for when they were able, at very low prices. They all turned out pretty clever industrious fellows, with the exception of here and there one who was rather lazy, and got all his work done by negroes. They all differed in some respects; but there was a family likeness among them—all took after the mother, who was a pretty considerable particular talker. One was a famous fellow for cod fishing; another a great hand at splitting shingles; a third was an amateur of-road making and ditching; a fourth was mighty fond of barbecues, taking after his father in that particular; a fifth dealt largely in wooden bowls and onions; a sixth was a great cultivator of rice and cotton; a seventh was a pretty high-handed fellow, fond of a good horse, and of an independent, open-handed spirit; and so on. They all lived together like loving brothers, having a rich father who could do what he pleased with his money—that is to say, they were as jealous of each other as two cocks running in the same yard.

If Uncle Sam made a christmas present to one, or conferred a particular kindness on another, there was the deuce to pay among the rest. They accused the old man of being more partial to one than the other, and never gave him any rest till he put them all on a level; which he had no sooner done than they, one and all, began to grumble and find fault, saying the poor man was in his dotage, only because he had not given each one a preference over his brother. Uncle Sam sometimes said to himself, "Happy is the man who has nothing to give away, for his children won't quarrel about his estate."

But this was not the worst of it. The old Harry got into them about improving their farms, which they all swore was Uncle Sam's business; he was devouring all the money they could rake and scrape together to pay for the lands he had sold them. They said it was a sin and a shame for him to make them pay every thing, seeing they were his natural born children, entitled to bed, board, education, and an outfit. Besides, the old man was now become so rich he did not know what to do with his money, and it was actually a kindness to rid him of its management in his old age.

Thus these cunning varlets agreed in the propriety of sharing Uncle Sam's money, but they fell out about the manner of dividing it, like a parcel of undutiful rogues as they were. The big fellows argued that they ought to share according to weight, and insisted they should all go down to the mill and be weighed. But the little fellows who had been "shrunk in the boiling" demurred to this, and swore it was all in my eye, Betty Martin. They were as much the lawful sons of Uncle Sam as the best and biggest of them, and were determined to have their share at the point of the bayonet. There was one little fellow particularly, who lived on an island about as big as my thumb-nail, who talked like a giant, and threatened to dissolve the family union and set up for himself if they did not treat him like a full-grown man. They had a great many hard bouts at words, and some of the neighbours feared they would come together by the ears. But though they quarrelled like so many old women, like old women they seldom came to blows. They had a sort of sneaking kindness for one another at the bottom, which always prevented their proceeding to extremities.

But for all this they were forever falling out about nothing, or some trifle next to nothing, and never gave each other a good word except when they all put their heads together, as they often did, to diddle Uncle Sam out of a few thousands for the improvement of their farms. Fortunately, however, for the old man's pocket, it was seldom they could agree about the division of the spoils, or it would not have been long before he was as poor as a rat.

Be this as it may, the good man had no peace of his life, and was several times on the point of making over all his property to build meeting-houses, and educate the children of other people. Certain it is, he had good reason to do so, for these undutiful boys left him no rest day or night on account of his money. Not being able to agree to the plan of dividing Uncle Sam's surplus income according to weight, it was proposed to do it by measure; but here again the little fellows that were "shrunk in the boiling" made a most infernal rout, and opposed it tooth and nail. They swore they were as good as the big fellows any day in the week, and as much the sons of Uncle Sam as the others, and they insisted that the apportionment should be made according to merit, not weight or size. They all agreed to this, and the matter was just on the point of being amicably settled, had it not been for a trifling difficulty which occurred in adjusting the scale of merit. The roystering barbecue fellow swore he was equal to any man you could throw a stick at; the splitter of shingles maintained the superiority of his art; the young squire who was fond of riding a fine horse and doing nothing, declared he considered himself the most of a gentleman; the raisers of rice and cotton claimed precedence on the score of administering both to the back and stomach; and the little fellow that lived on his island put in his claim on the score of morality. This would not do, and so the old man escaped being plundered this time.

But these fine boys had another iron in the fire, which they heated till it was red hot. Quoth one of the cunning varlets, I believe it was the barbecue chap, "Let us set about improving our farms, and make the old boy pay the piper"—upon which they all agreed, and set up a hurrah about internal improvement, which used in old times to be considered improvement of mind and morals, but now means digging ditches, pulling up snags, and making roads through the desert.

Upon this one of them went and set up a loom in his back building, as he said, for the encouragement of domestic industry, and hired other people to come and tend it. When he had done this he went to Uncle Sam and insisted he should give him a handful or two of money to encourage him in such patriotic and praise-worthy undertakings.

"Stop there, my little fellow," cried the biggest brother of all, who had a fist like a sledge hammer; "stop, if you please, I have set up my looms at my own expense; and I'll be switch'd if the old man is going to pay you for doing what I have done for myself."

Then another chap of the family set up a blacksmith-shop for making hob nails, and made the same claim to touch a few thousands of the old gentleman's money for the encouragement of domestic industry, which about this time began to be very low-spirited, and wanted a little patting.

"Avast there, you land lubber," exclaimed one of the brothers, a bold, hearty Jack tar, who had sailed round and round the world, and was a mighty navigator. "Avast there, none of your fresh water gabble. I should like to know the reason why you should be paid for making hob nails any more than I am for building ships. Avast there, I say, you lubber, or I'll be foul of your dead lights."

Next came another brother who was a great hand at raising sheep, which he called being a wool-grower, to demand that as people could not exist without clothes, Uncle Sam should shell out a few dollars to reward him for being a great public benefactor.

"Fudge!" exclaimed the cotton growing brother, "where one man is clothed in wool a thousand wear cotton. Why not encourage me, then, instead of this woolly fellow? Away with your bleating, or I'll be into your mutton before you can say Jack Robinson."

Next came a sober, sedate, economical brother who had set up a shoe-shop, and wanted Uncle Sam's protection—that is to say, some of his money.

"Rot your sole," cried the high-handed gentleman who despised hard work, and had rather ride a blood horse than make his own shoes a thousand times. "What are you talking about there? It's mighty natural to be sure that you should be asking encouragement for making shoes. If it were horse-shoes now, I'd talk to you." So saying, he mounted his horse, and challenged Uncle Sam to run a race for a thousand dollars.

After this, for there was no end of their persecution of the poor old man; after this came another brother, a great mechanical genius, who had invented a machine for peeling apples, and wanted encouragement of Uncle Sam for the great saving of time and labour in making apple pies.

"Whoo! whoo! whoop!" cried the wild, harem-scarem, barbecue boy, one of Uncle Sam's youngest sons, who had just settled a town away off west, and had not yet thrown off his moccasins; "whoop! Mister, mind which way you point your rifle there—I can turn a flip-flap somerset, grease your head with bear's meat, and swallow you whole without a pang. You'd better take 'keer how you steer your steam-boat, or you'll run foul of a snag."

By and by came another of this hopeful family, with a long story of the great advantage Uncle Sam would derive from clearing out a ditch, at his own expense, for the benefit of other people.

Here the great big fellow mentioned before, who was the richest of the brothers, put in his car, and cried out—

"None of that fun, Brother Jonathan! I've done all my own ditching myself, and I'll be totally ramswished if I am going to let daddy pay you for what I did all myself. Dig your own ditches, my boy, as I have done."

Then came a fine fellow, one of the young fry, who wanted to persuade Uncle Sam to pony up for a lane he was about making from his barn to his bog meadow, which he assured the old man would be a vast public improvement; for that whereas his carts stuck in the mud, now they would be able to get along like a streak of lightning as soon as the improvement was made.

"Thunder and blarney!" exclaimed three or four of the elder brothers all at once, "haven't we made our own roads at our own cost, and without asking daddy for a cent; and do you think, you snivelling blockhead, we'll stand by and see the old man cheated out of what belongs to us?"

"Goody gracious!" at length cried Uncle Sam, throwing up his eyes, "goody gracious! what can be the matter with these boys? I believe they mean to eat me up alive! I wish—I wish I was as poor as Job's turkey."

Now all that was required for Uncle Sam to be just as he wished, was to let the boys have all his money, as they wanted to do. But what is very remarkable, he never thought of this, and continued wishing himself poor, without once hitting on the best possible way of becoming so.

Things went on, getting worse and worse for some time afterwards. Uncle Sam was almost every day pestered for money to pay for some improvement or other in the boys' farms. He kept an account of these, and the amount they would cost, and found that it would take all he was worth in the world, and more besides, to get through with half of them. So one day he put his hands in his breeches pockets, and swore roundly they were a brood of ungrateful rogues, that wanted to get him on the parish, and not another penny would he pony up for man or beast.

This raised a terrible hue and cry among the boys, who threatened to disinherit the old man, and set up for themselves. But he was a pretty stiff old fellow when his pluck was up, and he thought himself in the right. You might as well try to move a mountain as Uncle Sam, when he put his foot down and toed the mark. He told the boys he had honest debts to pay, and meant to pay every penny he owed in the world before he began to talk about laying out money in improvements.

These graceless young rogues were a little stumped at the stand Uncle Sam had taken, and began to plot together to turn the old man out of house and home, and take possession of all his estate, as soon as they could bring matters to bear. Accordingly they went about among their neighbours and people, insinuating that the old man was in his dotage, and could not manage his affairs any longer. It was high time, they said, that he should give up his estates into their hands, and set about preparing for a better world. They raised all sorts of stories against him, as how he did not care any more about the law or the gospel than a pagan; how he tucked up people, just for the pleasure of seeing them kick their heels in the air; and how he threatened to cut off the ears of a member of congress, only because he told stories about him.

In this way these roystering boys raised a great clamour against Uncle Sam, which emboldened them at last to hatch a diabolical plan for taking away all his lands at one blow. They were not content with getting them by degrees, to pay for the schooling of their children, building school-houses, teaching dumb people philosophy, and a thousand other ways, but they now determined to make one business of it, and strip the old gentleman as bare as my hand.

Not finding any law for this, they determined to get one passed for the purpose; accordingly they went among the people, and told them a hundred cock and bull stories about this, that, and the other thing. They swore the land of right belonged to them when they came of age, according to an old settlement, which declared that Uncle Sam's children should all share his estates equally after his death. But they kept the last part to themselves, as you may suppose, and pretended that they had a right to take the old man's property while he was alive. Besides, they would say, the poor old gentleman don't know what to do with so much land; half of it lies waste for want of proper attention, and if we only had it, we would make it ten times more valuable, and pay the taxes, which he is exempted from, by virtue of an old charter.

The notion of getting money by taxation is a bait which generally takes with people whose business is law making, not tax paying, as I have always heard. So the legislature which governed where Uncle Sam's property lay, rubbed their hands, and were mightily tickled with the notion of being able to squeeze a little money from Uncle Sam's new lands. Perceiving this argument told, the boys hatched another notion, about Uncle Sam receiving all the money for the lands he sold, and then forcing those who bought them to work their fingers to the bone to make themselves whole again, as if this were not the way all over the world.

Uncle Sam defended his bacon to the last, like a stout old hero as he was; but by degrees the influence of these ungrateful rogues prevailed, and a law was passed taking away all his property, dividing it equally among the boys, so that those who were "shrunk in the boiling" got the same portion as the big roystering blades, who, rather than not come in for a slice, consented at last to share and share equally. They were all specially enjoined to take care of Uncle Sam, and see that he wanted for nothing; but the poor old man fared pretty much as people generally do who make over all their property to their children in their life-time. At first they treated him pretty well, for decency's sake, but by degrees they began to deprive him of all his usual comforts. First they took away his pipe, because the young madams the sons had married could not bear tobacco-smoke. Then the eldest boy took possession of his arm-chair, and his seat in the chimney-corner. Next they took the blankets from his bed, because, they said it would injure his health to lie too warm; and next they all but starved him to death, for fear he should die of apoplexy. Finally, losing all respect for the ties of blood, and all recollection of the early benefits they had derived from the good old man, they fairly turned him out of doors. The last I heard of Uncle Sam he was in the poor-house. B.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

Letters from Correspondents.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

New-York, January 25, 1831.

MESSES. EDITORS—I will not say that, like honest Rip Van Winkle, I have been sleeping for the last twenty years; nor can I affirm that I have been wandering in any other shades than those of my native forest, but I have certainly been quite out of the world until every thing is new to me, except the old jail and bridewell, which I perceive still stand their ground, looking more grim than ever, a terror to evil doers, and an excellent subject for the corporation to talk about when they have nothing else to say.

Whether from being tired of the country, or a desire to visit some of my old haunts—whether to make money, or to spend it—to get away from one wife, or to get another—whether any or all of these occasioned the resolution to come to town, is a secret I shall keep to myself. It is enough for my present purpose to tell you that I am, and intend to continue, a lounge—an idle man, with no particular business of his own to mind, and of course feeling a great interest in the affairs of the public. I go every where, see every body, criticize every thing—partly to pass away time, and partly from a feeling of public spirit, which pricks me on to be of all the service I can to my fellow-creatures. I like to give praise where it is due; but I confess that censure is my forte, and I do love to find fault a little sometimes, if it be only to show myself wiser than my neighbours. But I have not a spark of ill-nature about me, as you will perceive on further acquaintance. It is my purpose to communicate the results of my experience in the new world, to which I have just returned, through the medium of your paper, provided it suits your views to afford me a corner now and then. I am not one of those churlish people who are such niggards of their thoughts that they cannot bring themselves to share them with the rest of the world. These are the very worst of misers, who lock up their wisdom, as it were, in an iron chest and throw the key away.

One of my favourite occupations, for two or three hours of a morning, is lounging into book-stores and reading-rooms, where I look over all the newspapers, in order that I may find out what is doing in the world, and make up my mind whether we are to have peace or war. I confess I am often puzzled to decide on these occasions, as it is seldom any two agree exactly in their statements of the past, or their prognostics of the future. I find the same difficulty in forming my estimate of the characters of great men and great public measures, both of which are described and commented upon in the different gazettes, in a manner so diametrically opposite that I am utterly at a loss to perceive whether we are governed by sages and patriots, or ninnyhammers and traitors.

Men, however, will differ on these points, and I have no fault to find with these editors, except that they do not in general differ like gentlemen, but like very devils—I mean printer's devils. An honest difference of opinion is no just foundation for abuse or ribaldry. While they are asserting the liberty of the press for themselves, they should accord the same liberty to their opponents. The freedom of the press, say they, is the palladium of our liberties—and then they fire away gall and brimstone against those who differ with them, as if the freedom of the press consisted only in the freedom of publishing their own individual opinions. Such is the extent to which this abuse of the press is carried, that I have heard a gentleman of great experience, who has resided in various foreign countries, assert there was, in reality, less freedom in the expression of opinion here than in any part of the world he was acquainted with.

No man who has preserved the delicacy of his feelings, and who values his repose or dignity, will venture upon the publication of what he believes to be the truth, but which he knows will clash with the opinions of a great many of these champions of the liberty of the press. He will be pretty sure of being singled out, abused, hunted, and run down under the patriotic cry of "liberty of the press forever!" his character, not his opinions, will be torn to pieces, and his feelings and those of his family lacerated and insulted.

This want of courtesy towards opposing opinions is particularly observable in the daily contests of editors with each other. Instead of cool, firm, and vigorous reasoning, we have, for the most part, gross personalities. In the room of wit we have ribaldry, and in the place of facts, assertions without proof, put forth in language without decency. I do not involve all indiscriminately in this charge; but there are so many of this class, that they give a character to the species and degrade a profession in itself highly dignified and responsible. These exceptions are certainly the more honourable from their being so rare.

At the same time that these conservators of public decency, decorum, and morals are committing daily offences against them all, they continue to challenge the public respect and confidence, and lay claim to the character of upright censors. Nay, they assume a dignity superior to legislators and rulers, and almost arrogate to themselves the right of directing their conduct and dictating their laws. It cannot, I think, be denied that the censorship and authority of an able and virtuous press, exercised with moderation and dignity, constitute one of the great safeguards of the people against the oppressions of power. But to be any thing but worse than nothing, it must be able and virtuous. It must be temperate as well as firm—it must not think that to publish falsehood is the way to advocate truth; it must not suppose for a moment that it can aid the cause of liberty by making the just exercise of a free opinion in others a subject of abuse; nor dream that the respect and confidence of a rational enlightened people can be gained by disrespect to themselves and each other. If they wish to preserve their influence with the people of the United States they must respect the people, and show them they do so by a strict regard to propriety and decency in the conduct of the press. It requires no spirit of prophecy to foretell that a perseverance in this course will in no distant period destroy the confidence of the nation in its oracles, and convert a noble instrument of freedom, intelligence, and morals into the miserable tool of demagogues, who call themselves statesmen. No man will regret this more than myself. A well-conducted press is a blessing to mankind—a corrupt, indecent, and flagitious one a disgrace and a curse.

Do the conductors of these sorts of free presses suppose for a moment that the people who see them abusing each other day after day—exercising all their talents and malignity in making themselves equally ridiculous and contemptible—and mutually bandying charges that if true render them alike unworthy of being the monitors of a free people—do they dream for a moment, I say, that they are not rendering each other suspected, and gradually forfeiting the nation's confidence? The purest temple will be defaced in time by the perpetual application of filth, and the brightest name be disfigured by daily repeated slanders.

While on the subject, I will notice another custom, "more honoured in the breach than the observance," which the "censors of public manners, morals, taste, and opinions" are, some of them, mortally given to. I allude to the habit of stealing from each other; that is to say, inserting articles borrowed from other papers in their own, without acknowledgment. This certainly amounts to a niggardly appropriation of the property of another, unworthy of a gentleman. It savours of the bridewell or quarter sessions. I cannot say whether it be actionable, because of a vast many of these "felonious conversions," it may be said, as Iago says of his purse—"Who steals my purse, or prose, steals trash—'twas mine, 'tis his, and has been slave to thousands." But still, Messrs. Editors, the original publisher of an original article is entitled to the credit or disgrace of it; and to fill column after column with the products of the labours of others, without acknowledgment, is an offence against courtesy, to say the least of it. In running over the daily and weekly papers, I have noticed a number of pieces from time to time, which were first published in the Mirror, and are evidently on the face of them original. Many of the country papers especially swarm with these; their columns are half filled with them, and yet hardly one, if I recollect right, has given your paper credit for either or any of them. This is both unjust and ungenerous. It is an old and true saying, that a benefit is worth thanking for—and certainly every piece of this sort, which merits transplanting, must confer some value on your paper as well as theirs. Such being the case, I cannot but think the simple words "From the New-York Mirror," in small letters, either at the head or foot of these transplantings, would be a very proper appendage. You shall hear from me again—as soon as my ink and my fingers are a little thawed. Till then I am, &c.

SIMON OLDRENTS.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

MESSRS. EDITORS—I have just been so pushed about by the unmannerly beaux in Broadway that I am out of breath and out of patience. I am determined to write to you, in the hope some of them will see my letter and take the hint in future. You know a lady in a fashionable dress is not the easiest affair to steer through Broadway in a hard wind. First, she has got her sleeves to take care of, which occupy half the walk—and then she has her hat to hold fast for fear it should blow away, and that takes up almost the other half of the walk.

Such being the case, I only ask you, Messrs. Editors, if you don't think the young fellows ought to be on the look out so as not to interfere with us when we are, as sailors say, staggering under a hard gale, with as much sail as we can carry? Instead of this, the minute they lay eyes upon us they lock their arms together, crowd us against the walls or off the walks, and push us into a snow bank. Not above half an hour ago, as I was trying to weather a hard flaw, which got into my sleeves and puffed them out like balloons, in passing a trio of these arm-in-arm gentlemen, one of the frogs—I don't mean bull frogs—caught my right sleeve and carried it quite away. There was I, with only one sleeve—and there was he with the other, which some how got over his head and slipped down, so that he looked as if he was in a night gown. But this was not the worst. While I stood screaming for my sleeve, there came a squall of wind and carried off my hat, feathers and all. It went up like a balloon and stuck fast in a poplar tree. Only think what a condition! But this was not all. My boa constrictor fell off while I was screaming for my hat and sleeve, and was snatched up by a great butcher's dog, which every body said mistook it for a red cow's tail. I was so provoked I could have cried. But this was not the worst. The cold weather made my arm look as red and as coarse as a piece of raw meat, and there was my hair exposed to full view, put up in papers for a ball at Mrs. Tetotum's. They were pieces of an old newspaper, and the people began to read, "this house to let, and possession given immediately," "to be seen, a female royal tiger," "first night of Mademoiselle D'Jack's appearance," and all sorts of odd things, which made them shout with laughing.

O, I never was in such a condition! and then to crown all, a young gentleman I particularly wish to stand well with, passed at the moment and looked hard at my red elbow. I thought I should have fainted away on the spot, but I didn't. I have not since seen the young man whose frog ran away with my sleeve. He was very thin, and they say was carried off by the same puff that took away my bonnet before he could disencumber himself. My hat was got down from the tree by a little boy, who climbed up for sixpence, and my boa constrictor was brought to me very much damaged by the butcher's dog.

I wish you would quiz these young men, who don't seem to know their right hand from their left, and are continually taking the wrong side of the walk. They had better tie a ribbon round the right arm, and then they would not be so puzzled. Give it to them, Messrs. Editors, and I'll get papa to subscribe to your paper. Your constant admirer,

ISABELLA BOBBINET.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

MESSRS. EDITORS—I was glad to observe in a former number of the Mirror, a communication relative to the late attempt to do away the good old custom of calling upon our fair friends on the first day of the year. Imagine my surprise at finding that those very persons, who wish to influence the society of this place by their example, are such as base their pretended superiority only upon a tolerable collection of dollars, and whose talents and education give them no title to distinction! A really sensible female certainly could have no desire to dispense with an established custom, which is at once so innocent and agreeable, provided it be not marked with excesses of any kind. It serves, as we all know, to renew acquaintance that has been neglected in the course of the preceding year from a want of time or other causes; and it gives us an opportunity of assuring our friends that the perplexities of business and the engrossing cares of life, have not eradicated every thought of them from our memories. It has met with the ready acquiescence of foreigners, thousands of whom have entered into it with spirit, and expressed in high terms their opinions of the pleasure and benefit which it produces. I do not pretend to any acquaintance with the individuals who have rendered themselves so conspicuously ridiculous; but I know something of their origin, and of their claims to so prominent a place in the public eye.

One anecdote, the truth of which is well known to some of our citizens, will serve to show upon what these claims are grounded.

Miss —, at a large party in — street, appeared with all the magnificence that her father's liberality could afford; and, with the hasteur natural to opulent vulgarity, she reigned la belle of the assembly. She would occasionally deign to smile upon some shrivelled puppy who was dazzled by her splendid fortune, and who, in consideration of her expected shekels, hoped some day to merit her delicate hand. She was led to the dance by one of these whiskered gentry, when lo! a young lady, modest and unassuming in her manners, plainly, but becomingly attired, whose flowing locks, however, were destitute of the brilliant insignia of fashion, was perceived by our duchess. She immediately drew out her quizzing-glass, and with the glance of a basilisk, and a significant toss of her brainless pate, inquired the name and ancestry of the thing who stood before her! The young lady, perceiving herself the object of such severe scrutiny, retired from the circle, and on the following day addressed a note to our heroine to this effect:

"Understanding that Miss — desires to know who I am, I take the liberty to inform her that I am the daughter of Colonel —, who commanded the American troops at the battle of —, at which time her father was a drummer in the regiment." X.

LITERARY NOTICES.

THE HEIRESS OF BRUGES.—We have just accomplished the task of reading this new novel, or rather romance. Now, let not our readers suppose, from that word task, that we are going to "cut up" Mr. Grattan; on the contrary, we are tenderly disposed towards his work, and have found much pleasure in its pages. But it is a task to read almost any book with the appalling consciousness that it is to be noticed; and the agony is not at all diminished by the necessity of praise. There is no great difficulty in slashing a new book, even a good one; but to praise neatly and without commonplace, is altogether another matter. Mr. Grattan's Heiress, however, deserves commendation; and, as we suppose, must have it; let us proceed then secundum artem.

The scene is laid in the Low Countries; the most important events taking place in the towns of Bruges and Brussels; the time, the year 1600; and the principal historical personages, Prince Maurice of Nassau, Albert and Isabella of Spain, the archdukes, as they were somewhat singularly called, Martin Schenck, the celebrated partizan, and some few others of less importance. The most prominent fictitious characters are Theresa the Heiress, her father, Siged the rich gold-beater, and a pair of very mysterious personages, who appear and disappear at very strange times, and in the most unaccountable modes, and are designated Lambert Boonen and Iron de Bassenvelt. The historical incidents, referring chiefly to the efforts of the bold Netherlanders to shake off the Spanish yoke, are described with much graphic power and with a very satisfactory rapidity; and the love passages and other necessary filling-up matter, are accomplished so as to give great comfort to the reader. The chief merit of the work, is the nice discrimination and clear description of character; in this respect approaching, and at no very alarming distance, the masterpieces of Scott. The style is unambitious and easy, and is entitled to the praise of originality, or, at least, to that of being no intentional imitation. The characters are interesting enough to gain the good or ill will of the reader, according as they are themselves good or evil, and the events in which they are made partakers or sufferers, are stirring enough to make him anxious to see them through. External objects are depicted with a practised, and not unskilful or unpoetic pen; and thoughts and feelings are described and accounted for with considerable force and ingenuity.

The principal faults, are the too great crowding of the incidents, and the unnecessary and unreasonable multiplication of mysteries. But these are merits rather than blemishes to the practised reader of romances, and interfere but little with the enjoyment of the mere critic; while on the other hand, the stirring pictures of ambition, and passion, and conflict; the "hair-breadth 'scapes," and "imminent perils," through which they are conducted, and the exciting developments to which they are constantly made parties, keep up the interest of both, and assure to them no small share of gratification in return for the trouble of perusal.

DR. BECK'S INTRODUCTORY LECTURE.—This discourse was delivered at the College of Physicians and Surgeons of this city. It is a lucid illustration of the great importance of the medical profession, an examination of the various causes which render diseases complicated and remedy uncertain, and a refutation of arguments which have, at various times, been advanced against the healing art. The style is smooth and unembarrassed with technical phraseology, and his view of the subject ingenious and interesting. The lecture will be relished by the intelligent reader.

WILLIAMS'S NEW-YORK ANNUAL REGISTER.—The volume of this work, for 1831, is to be published and delivered to subscribers next week. No man of business should be without it. It contains a great quantity of valuable information, compiled with great care, and to be obtained nowhere else in a collection. In a hasty glance through its pages we observe, among other contents, an almanac and astronomical information, statistics, viz., new census, colleges, academies, female seminaries, civil and military list, attorneys at law, and clergy of the State of New-York. The work is neatly executed and embellished with several engravings, yet so cheap as to be within the reach of all. We are told the last volume did not compensate the editor for his time, although the work was universally acknowledged to be not only valuable, but absolutely necessary to those engaged in professional or mercantile affairs.

IN PRESS.—We are happy to perceive that the brothers Harper have in press a new novel, entitled the "Dutchman's Fireside," by the author of "John Bull in America," "Letters from the South," &c. &c. This is one of our most deservedly popular writers. His works are bought up with general avidity. They are sprightly and full of humour. He is happy in satire, and his sketches of Dutch life and manners are irresistibly ludicrous.

These industrious publishers are also about supplying the public with the "Romance of the History of France," by Leigh Ritchie, and the "Siamese Twins," a satirical tale, by the author of Pelham, &c. Mr. Bulwer seems resolved to win a name in every description of writing. Late advices from England have informed us that he has enrolled himself among the contributors to the Edinburgh Review, and intends to shine in criticism. His first production was a series of patriotic poems, which, by the way, will probably be republished here. He has but to accomplish a treatise upon law and a volume of theology, and the circle of his productions will be complete. The forthcoming work will, it is said, prove not unworthy of his fame. Satire is his forte; and if the subjects of his ridicule be well chosen, we may reasonably expect something racy and original.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Death of Bolivar.—There is something painful in the reflection, that this hero has been taken from his country and the world. His name has been so long identified with South American freedom, that we cannot avoid the conviction that he will leave behind him a void difficult to fill. It is not easy to form any satisfactory conclusion respecting the true character and motives of this celebrated soldier, beheld, as his actions have been, through so dense a medium of obscurity and error; but so far as a slight view of his history may be made subservient to the endeavour, we can see no justice in the indiscriminating abuse which has attached itself to his name. He has been branded, not only as a selfish tyrant, whose uncontrolled ambition was dangerous, but as a traitor, ready to sell his country for objects of personal aggrandizement. But we have not been able to trace these reports to any authentic source, and are inclined to deem them nothing more than the senseless ravings of political malice; opinions scattered among the people—seeds sown by those who would reap the harvest of discord and ruin. It seems probable that Bolivar has made several attempts to exercise a power almost despotic; but, on the other hand, it may be said that he found himself called upon to preside over the destinies of a nation composed of the most incongruous materials, and agitated by the wildest passions. They who reprobate the hero of South America, and triumphantly compare his political course with that of Washington, forget the great dissimilarity of their situations, of the character of the people, and the resources of the two countries. The mild, moral influence of Washington, would be as impotently exercised over the tempest of discordant passions, over the deadly malice of religious bigots, and the blind rage of prejudice, ignorance, and the chaotic anarchy incidental to the protracted period of warfare in South America, as if his precepts were delivered in an unknown tongue. It would be the voice of Canute commanding the billows of the deep. The mere force of reason could not quell their wild tumults, restrain their crimes, or allure them into the path of peace, freedom, knowledge, and virtue. We believe that the present happiness of the southern republics could be effected only by some gifted being, who combined the wisdom of a statesman with the boldness and success of a despotic soldier, and the purity of a patriot; one who, with unshaken integrity, and the noble disregard of ambition, and all other personal passions and feelings peculiar to Washington, could unite the vivid brilliancy of Napoleon's energy, his wonderful and intuitive powers of rapid conception and rapid execution; that while, like him, he seized with iron grasp the reins of government, triumphant over every obstacle and every foe, he might be inspired with the spirit of our immortal warrior-statesman, to guide its wheels towards the temple of peace and liberty.

Perhaps the destruction of Bolivar has sprung from his attempts to accomplish a similar enterprise, the success of which would require not only that it should be undertaken by the most extraordinary of men, but that he should be supported by a very extraordinary combination of accidental circumstances, as was the case with the emperor of France. Whatever may have been the motives which actuated the latter deeds of Bolivar's life, the cause of liberty owes much to him. His name can never be "written on the rolls of common men;" and, for the honour of human nature, we hope the mists of prejudice and error may clear away, and leave his fame unsullied.

The Eclipse.—Notwithstanding the bad state of the roads, the eclipse did actually take place at thirty minutes after eleven, on the twelfth instant, without any postponement or delay. Thousands of our citizens were seen with "upturned, wondering eyes," gazing at the progress of the phenomenon. Vague reports were previously circulated among our promiscuous population by knowing editors, and other of the literary sages of the town. Some thought that the moon would whisk across the sun's disc, like a moth through a candle. Some deemed that we were to be enveloped in midnight darkness; and others were of the opinion, that extraordinary events were clearly portended; that the world was getting intolerably wicked; and that it was high time for the people to cast their eyes about, and be prepared for the worst. These latter enlightened personages will doubtless find their theory confirmed by circumstances; and the innocent sun and moon will have to bear the blame for divers fires, deaths, broken crockery, and other accidents. Luckily, however, their shoulders are broad, and the animadversions of their earthy critics, as sometimes happens in other cases, will have but feeble influence upon the future destiny of the objects of their spleen. The stars of heaven were expected to come forth, honoured with the society of a fiery-tailed comet, which has paid us a flying visit. Several learned old ladies, with the foresight natural to age, had their lamps duly trimmed and filled; and it is even rumoured, that a scientific office-holder in the city-hall, who, in his youth, had devoted himself to the study of astronomy with unparalleled success, did arrange on his table a row of the best sperm candles, for the accommodation of such desperate transactors of business as might possibly keep an eye upon their sublunary affairs, at such a sublime period.

When the obscuration of daylight became apparent, the streets presented a singular spectacle. Lawyers, doctors, and merchants came forth to examine if the much-talked-of event were actually taking place. Editors, with pens stuck behind their learned ears, left unfinished paragraphs, planted themselves on the steps with clerks, printers, and devils, all looking through smoked glass with one eye shut. The cartman stopped his horse, and satisfied himself of the fact that the sun was actually behind something which, rather than "argue the topic," he was willing should pass for the moon. The chimney-sweep slung down his brush, and indulged in his own reflections upon the subject; and juvenile delinquents, who, ten chances to one, had played truant from school, gathered together in groups in the middle of the streets, and interchanged pretty deep observations upon the popular branches of astronomy. There were not, however, wanting ill-disposed persons, who went about openly expressing feelings of dissatisfaction. They protested against the whole affair, as neither more nor less than an imposition—a mere hoax, palpably got up to effect some political or other private purpose. It was, they said, just such another piece of quackery as the elephant, which they had been led to expect would take up the supernumeraries by dozens, and fling them about in the air, like so many foot-balls, whereas no such desirable feat was exhibited, and the beast was nothing more than a mere natural animal. Little boys stationed themselves in several streets with lighted candles and pieces of broken glass, and saluted passengers with the frequent salutation of "See the eclipse to-day, sir? Only two pence!" At the same time presenting the glass; but few deemed themselves warranted by the importance of the exhibition in incurring such an unnecessary and heavy expense.

We are told that the enterprising proprietor of one of the museums, who had made extensive preparations for a grand illumination, and had advertised it to be the interest of all the world to come and behold his magnificent building brilliantly illuminated at noon-day, as one of the sublimest spectacles which could engage the human mind, was induced to utter some very improper expressions when it became apparent that the world would not need his disinterested services. He declared it was one of the most ridiculous things he had ever seen in the whole course of his life. The truth is, however, to speak seriously, the interest with which we gaze upon this phenomenon is unlike that excited by physical wonders in general. A lofty mountain, its summit piercing through the clouds, a volcano spouting out fire, a cataract pouring its world of waters in thunder down the broken rocks, or any other object of curiosity, even those which continually pass by us unregarded, the sun's rising and setting, the break of day, the varying shapes and appearances of the moon, as the clouds change "the expression of the sky," are all intrinsically more beautiful. But the importance of an occurrence, similar to that which has just taken place, consists not so much in the delight it affords the eye, as the illustration it offers to the mind, of the perfect accuracy with which the great principles of nature operate, and the height to which human science has soared, in thus exercising over the broad universal regions of space, the same accurate observations with which it fathoms the depths of a stream, or determines the shape of an island. When regarded in its connection with the cheering and elevating hopes of religion, from a subject of idle curiosity, it rises into a theme of wonder, and assumes an importance almost approaching sublimity. It is a palpable and undoubted proof to those whose understandings cannot reach the conclusion through the mazes of metaphysical discussion, that the inconceivably vast plan of the universe is conducted by the control of unlimited wisdom. Nor can human reason refuse to submit its destiny to a power that sways the stupendous operations of the heavens with a regularity which time cannot disturb.

New-year day again.—We publish the anonymous letter of X. as a very fair hit at somebody. The lady, whoever she may be, whose demeanor has offended our correspondent, deserves his reproach, not from the fact that her worthy ancestor used to beat Yankee Doodle on "the spirit-stirring drum" for the benefit of his country, (for a drummer may have the soul of a lion, and a general sometimes turns out with no more sense and courage than a chicken,) but because she has arrogated extraordinary claims to importance in consequence of wealth. It is the duty of every individual to act with a proper sense of his station, whatever it may be; but true gentility is "familiar, but by no means vulgar." Enough of the subject however at present. We hope, when the revolving year shall bring on the first day of one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two, the whole male portion of our citizens will turn out strong, every mother's son of them, and vindicate the right of a custom that hath all the force of common law; for, as far as we can judge, to use the words of the learned Sir William Blackstone, it hath prevailed "for a time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary."

Firemen's Ball.—The ball given annually by this numerous and respectable body of citizens, took place on Monday at the Bowery theatre, which was thrown open from the lobby to the rear of the stage, and highly decorated for the occasion. On entering the immense apartment, occupied by about twenty-seven hundred ladies and gentlemen, among whom was much of the beauty and fashion of the city, we were struck with the magnificence of the scene. Notwithstanding the great pressure of the throng, no accident or unpleasant incident of any kind occurred, and the dancing went on with uninterrupted hilarity. The members of the fire department perhaps participated in the pleasures of the evening with a greater zest from the recollection that they had been but recently engaged on that very spot in arresting the progress of the destroying flames which buried the splendid edifice in ruin.

A REPOSITORY OF POLITE LITERATURE AND THE ARTS.

VOLUME VIII.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1881.

NUMBER 94.

ST. PAUL'S CHURCH, TROY, N. Y.

THIS edifice was erected in 1827-8, by the Episcopal Society of Troy, and is one of the best specimens of the Gothic style of architecture in the United States. The walls are of a dark-coloured lime-stone, hammered and laid in mortar. The main body of the building is one hundred and three by seventy feet. At the west end a tower projects twelve feet, and is one hundred feet in height. The basement is nine feet high, and the walls of the main building rise thirty-eight feet above it. There are five windows on each side, and three on each end; the largest window over the altar is forty by twenty feet. The galleries and ceiling are supported by clustered columns. The wood work of the building is painted in excellent imitation of oak. The number of pews is one hundred and forty on the lower floor, and seventy in the galleries. The organ is a fine-toned and powerful instrument. The court around the church is enclosed by a handsome fence.

The church was built under the superintendence of Mr. James McFarland and Messrs. Coryell and McRae, all of Troy, and cost, including the building-lot and furniture of the church, thirty-seven thousand six hundred dollars.

THE CENSOR.

THE LITTLE GENIUS.

No. 107.

"It seems to me," said I one day to the Genius, "that man may yet accomplish upon this earth some wonderful transformation, by which his character will be greatly elevated, and his capacities enlarged. He is a progressive being, and since the creation has been perpetually employed in enlarging his mind and improving his situation. He has so altered the aspect of the globe's surface—that should a spirit, who had some thousand years ago wandered over the wilds of this solitary planet, now return, he would scarcely recognise the once lifeless and bleak deserts in the cultivated tracts, peopled with swarming multitudes, and decorated with mighty cities. The principle which impels human beings onward and onward, is yet in operation. Scarcely a century elapses without revealing some valuable secret, or accomplishing some ingenious invention by which greater happiness is placed within our reach, or that, previously possessed by a few, is diffused more exclusively among the many. What unexpected obstacle can arise in man's path to perfection, and like a grisly phantom bid him forbear?"

"Dreams!" said the Genius. "Thoughts like these have filled men's imagination, and made them mad. They have led the alchemist through a life of useless labour, and tempted the ambitious soldier to arduous enterprises, marked by bloody crimes. They have driven the wretched miser over a dark and rugged path, to heap up hoards of gold, with simple hopes of indefinite power and happiness; and the artless girl, with the melting voice of her lover sweet in her ear, has cherished similar fancies, as bright and evanescent as the golden images that revel in the radiance of the summer heaven. If your progress to durable and perfect knowledge and bliss, could be arrested only by some obstacle existing externally in some future point of your career, there would be less improbability in your unchecked anticipations. The cause, however, which must restrain you within certain bounds, dwells in the construction of your own minds and bodies. Nature has exercised as much care in defining the limits both of your bodily energies and your moral strength and power, as she has in investing you with sources of pleasure and refuges from pain, both physical and moral, within the circle. It is, therefore, as difficult for any individual to be entirely happy as entirely wretched. If thou wilt sketch, according to thine own fancy, the being best constructed for enjoyment, and then place him in circumstances most calculated to play upon all his delightful thoughts and feelings, you shall behold how far human nature is capable of complete satisfaction."

As my silent thoughts drew the scene, it became embodied in the glass.

An immense hall appeared thronged with a multitude. Upon a stage, occupying a prominent station, arose an orator. He was young and commanding in appearance. His countenance beamed with the play of mind. Manly beauty dwelt upon his lofty head, broad temples, and expressive mouth. As he came forward to speak, every agitation of the dense crowd was hushed, and all eyes turned towards him. Had the thousands who held their breath to listen been so many marble statues, there could scarcely have been deeper stillness. When he spoke, the rich tones of his voice came over them like music, and his words gradually aroused their feelings, and shook them with the shock of electric passions. He stood there in defence of a being of the better sex—a fair, youthful, timid creature, upon whose innocence had come the darkening cloud of a dreadful accusation. From the sphere of her domestic peace she had been dragged forward, ruthlessly exposed to the eyes of the inquiring crowd, all of whom deemed it just that those beautiful lips should breathe their last sigh on the scaffold. She had no friend among the thousands but him, and he now poured forth in her defence such a flood of eloquent reason; with such a gigantic grasp he dragged the accusers forth to public scorn, and tore off the mask from their repulsive features; he laid the intricacies of their dark, hidden schemes so bare and naked to the perception of the dullest; and covered with such a halo and radiance and glory the purity and beauty of the trembling and lovely girl, that the great current of public opinion changed its course. She who but lately was to have been led forth a blackened, degraded outcast, a mark and a shame, unworthy to live, and destined to perish in her helpless agony, now moved, a being to be gazed on with bended knee; and they, the bold, audacious, triumphant, and powerful recreants, whose scowls then scared the timid, and quelled the glances of the brave, were now stripped by the great hand of genius—drawn down from their pedestal, and thrust forth into their obscure haunts of wretched impotency and degradation.

As the proud lofty form of the youth decorated the stage with its presence, the aged parents, whose breaking hearts he had bound up with the silver cords of life and joy, came forward to bless him. They brought no golden vase, no costly bust, no precious gem, as pompous offerings of wealth to vanity, but they held out their labour-hardened, trembling hands, and lifted their streaming eyes; and, when they strove to speak, the fulness of gratitude swelled up from their overflowing bosoms, and choked their utterance. She herself buried her face in her mother's bosom.

"I should deem that man happy," said I.

"Look again," said my companion.

The same youth was seated in a shaded apartment, surrounded with all that could bespeak affluence. Ponderous volumes were before him. All was silent. He bent beside a lamp over a book. The solemn peal of a neighbouring clock tolled one. He cast aside his task—weariness was on his soul, and fever in his brain. His heavy lids drooped, not with the influence of gentle sleep, but sickness took away his strength, and pains shot through his system. Then his overstrained mind lost its balance, and instead of the lucid and logical thoughts which he was wont to arrange there, to astonish, to convince, and delight the world, broken and disjointed images floated through his imagination—wild, bright fancies; but the power of swaying, of banishing, of recalling them at pleasure was gone. Then his vigorous frame became emaciated; the rich tones of his voice grew sepulchral, and strange to the ear that loved them most, till at length death ended at once his pains and his triumphs.

"He has paid the penalty," said the Genius, "for putting your own principles in operation. The successful display of mind which you have witnessed, resulted from good natural capacities, but aided by the most strenuous application. To be greater than other men you must labour with more unremitting perseverance; and did not the weak organization of your own minds and bodies give way, brilliant indeed might be the destinies of man; but nature interposes her hand when you overstep the line she has drawn around your sphere of science, of happiness, even of virtue. Resolve, if you please, to mount the rugged road of fame; as you advance your strength will depart, your senses be destroyed, the spring of your spirits broken. Determine, then, to be happy—gather round you every charm and luxury, but the sated appetite will pall, the languid soul sink wearily—and even ignorance, and poverty, and the passions struck out in the fierce contests of man, become objects of envy."

LONDON THEATRICAL PORTRAITS.

FANNY KEMBLE.

THE rising hope and promise of the drama—the bud—the blossom—the half-blown "rose and expectancy" of the theatrical world—the pledge to the rising generation, that, in their time, at least, Juliet shall not lie buried in the tomb of the Capulets, or Belvidera's sorrows be entrusted entirely to regularly broken-in, thorough-paced, tragedy hacks. I am well nigh tired of the mechanical woes and shallow agonies of every-day tragedy—of picturesque and passionless attitudinizing—of storms of grief, according to the stage directions—"cross to A. H. and burst into tears;" of violent beating of the cold and insensible breast, and knocking of the clenched hand upon the empty head. I am tired of the mere pantomime of the art, without feeling or common sense—tired of vehemence and impetuosity, instead of passion; and particularly tired of hearing such easy work characterised as the "flashes and outbursts of genius." To me, gross and habitual exaggeration seems to pervade nearly all the tragic exhibitions on the stage; and if this be so, it is sufficient evidence of the absence of feeling. Genuine feeling never exaggerates. Those who are really touched by the parts they assume, may, from that very cause, be so little master of themselves as to fail in giving a finished portrait of the character they have undertaken to represent; but they never, by any chance, fall into the opposite fault of "overstepping the modesty of nature," and becoming more violent than the hero or heroine of the scene would have been in reality. There is generally, however, an instinctive propriety about true passion, which leads those under its influence to do neither more nor less than they ought to do, whilst the less easily excited feelings of others wait upon the judgment, and it becomes a matter of calculation how much grief or energy must be used on certain occasions. But it is invariably your hacknied, cold-blooded actors, without either passion or judgment, and who off the stage laugh at anything like enthusiasm in their art as ridiculous, that on it "out-herod Herod," and affect a superabundance of feeling to conceal their utter want of it, the same as ladies of questionable character make an over-parade of delicacy; or, indeed, as pretension of any and every sort seeks to conceal the absence of what it has not by an ostentatious display of the semblance of the quality it would be thought to possess.

Now Miss Kemble does not exaggerate. I have watched her closely, and have never, according to my notions of things, seen, either in look, voice, or action, the slightest attempt to impose upon the audience by extravagance—to extract, as it were, their sympathies by force, and storm them into approval. She is not yet, in some respects, so "effective" an ac-ness as others of infinitely less ability—that is, she does not so well understand how to produce a sensation by “points” and “situations.” She has yet much to learn and something to unlearn; but she has that within her which cannot be taught, though, parrot-like, it may be imitated—genuine passion, delicacy, and feeling: and all that is necessary for her to do to become a great actress is, in acquiring the necessary business and technicalities of the stage, to preserve pure and undefiled those rare qualities. This is no easy task. Acting is an art in which the noblest results have to be effected by the most unromantic means. Bombastes Furioso itself is not so much of a burlesque as the rehearsal of a tragedy. To say nothing of Macbeths and Othellos in surtout coats and pepper-and-salt pantaloons, and Lady Macbeths and Deademonas in fitch tippets and Leghorn flats, the continual recurrence of trivial directions in the midst of agonizing speeches—“when I do so, mind you do so”—the familiar and unseasonable colloquialisms, the everlasting appeals to and from the stage-manager, the scoldings and the squabbles, are apt to fritter away all enthusiasm in people of ordinary minds, until they become a kind of speaking and attitudinizing machines—mere actors and actresses, who occasionally produce an effect by the beauty of the language they deliver, or from the situations in which they are placed; but who are, for the most part, incapable of duly appreciating either the one or the other. It is only those whose feelings lie too deep beneath the surface to be ruffled or worn away by the habits and jargon of their profession, and who, when the curtain rises, step upon the stage creatures of another element, that really become great actors. There are plenty of anecdotes of Kean afloat, weighty enough of themselves to apparently controvert this assertion; but however that wonderful creature may now have become hardened by habit, he must have been at one time terribly in earnest, and the effect which he still creates is produced by a faithful recollection and copy of the feelings which originally agitated him. It is to be hoped that Miss Kemble will become a great actress, and that the artificial education, of which she has yet much to receive, will not destroy the natural beauty and freshness of her mind. At present her personations are rather distinguished by feminine sweetness and delicacy, and quick and violent transitions of passion, than by sustained force and grandeur; but there is something occasionally in the tone of her voice—in her dark expressive eye and fine forehead, that speaks of the future Queen Katharine and wife of Macbeth. Her greatest fault is a monotonous manner of delivering speeches of any considerable length, particularly those of a declamatory character; she really appears afraid of them, and hurries them over like an irksome task. Her Juliet, with some faults, is a delightful, affectionate, warm-hearted piece of acting; and she is decidedly the least mawkish and most truly loving and lovable Belvidera I have ever seen. The closing scene of madness, where others fail, is her greatest triumph. The tones of her voice, when playfully threatening Jaffier, might almost touch the heart of a money-scrivener. She is the only Belvidera I have beheld play this scene twice. They all contrive to make it either excessively repulsive or ludicrous, and somehow or other manage to bring to the mind a very vivid picture of Tibburlina in the Critic; while their invariably going home in the midst of their distresses, and after a partial touch of insanity, to put off their black velvets and put on their white muslins to go completely mad in, because, as that lady says, “it is a rule,” by no means tends to do away with this unfortunate association of ideas. Miss Kemble is at present the sole hope of the English public in tragedy. She must not disappoint them, for, if she does, there is no one else on whom they can turn their eyes. But when it is considered that this is only her second season—that she is yet but a girl of eighteen or nineteen, it may be fairly said that she has already done sufficient to justify the most sanguine expectations. C.

THE FUNERAL AT SEA.

“No flowers can ever bloom upon his grave—no tear of affection fall upon the briny surge which rolls over him.”

It was a morning at sea. The sun had risen in glory and was pouring his beams, a shower of golden light, in richness over the boundless expanse of waters. Not a cloud was visible; the winds were hushed, and the surface of the ocean was unbroken by a ripple. A solitary ship was the only object in all the magnificent scene which spoke the existence of man. Her sails were hanging sluggishly from the yards. The light motionless flag, suspended at half-mast, seemed to portend that misfortune, perhaps death, had been there. And such was indeed the case. Among the party who composed her passengers on leaving port, was one whose health had been declining in the coolness of our northern winter, and who, as the last hope of regaining it, had determined to visit the “sunny vine-hills of France,” and inhale the pure air of Italy. His friends, as they bade him adieu, believed it was their last farewell, and he himself, as his native shores faded from his sight, felt the dark dreary consciousness come over him, that he was going to die among strangers. He was young; and before disease had fastened itself upon him, had moved the beloved and admired of all. He could ill bear the thought of dying, for his hopes were high and animating—just such as an ardent, inexperienced mind delights to indulge; and he had looked forward with impatience to the time when he should become an actor in the busy world. He had talents and education fitted for any employment, and his friends confidently anticipated the period when he should share in the councils of his country, or stand pre-eminently distinguished at the bar. He had ties too of a different nature, which had given a fairy charm to existence, and bound him still closer to life—ties which were too fondly cherished—intertwined, as they were, with the very fibres of his heart—to be severed by any thing save death. No wonder that he felt it hard to die! But the victims which the grave selects, are not always those whom we value most lightly, nor who most readily sink into its shadows. How often is youth cut down when just opening into manhood, and glorying in all its bright anticipations? Such was the case with the one before us. Consumption had been silently but gradually performing its task, and the unnatural flush upon his cheek, and his glazing eye told but too faithfully that he was rapidly passing to another world. He died at last—and his death was calm and peaceful as the sleep of an infant folded in its mother’s arms. And now his manly body lay stretched on the deck, about to be committed to the world of waters—a feeble thing—but oh! the hope and happiness of how many hearts may go with it to old ocean’s silent chasms! The ship’s company were collected and stood around, gazing upon the cold, placid countenance which they were about to consign with all its beauty to the deep. No word was uttered, but memory recalled the gentle voice and sweet smile of the deceased, and fancy pictured the sorrow which his death would cast over the circle he had left. An appropriate prayer, and a few remarks suggested by the occasion, were the only religious ceremonies performed; then the body was lifted carefully, as if it could know, in its unconsciousness, that tears were in the eyes of the strangers, and tenderness in their bosoms. Then a single heavy plunge broke strangely the wide stillness of the ocean, and sent the long and circling ripples over its glassy breast. We gazed with strained eyes after the slowly sinking corse, till it grew dim and vaguely shaped in the deep green water, and then gradually disappeared. A gloomy silence succeeded. The desolation of a desert pervaded the ship.

Beneath the ocean wave,
High soul! thy rest must be;
We ask for thee no prouder grave
Than a deep eternal sea!

Light be the wind that blows
Above thy gentle head!
And noiseless be the waves that close
Around thy sea-washed bed!

No costly stone we rear—
No marble-sculptured bust;
Deep in the ocean caverns here,
“Dust shall return to dust.”

Over the heaving wave,
No mother’s tears may fall—
No sister’s hand shall deck thy grave,
Thou loved and mourned of all!

The breeze is rising now,
Our sails full proudly swell!
The white foam curls around the prow—
Farewell! a last farewell!

B. H.

A SECOND, SQUIRE WESTERN.

Billy H—, whom I once sojourned with at B—, the fine old seat of H— of B—, who signed the declaration of independence, was the Squire Western of Virginia. He was a middle-sized man, with a body too large for his legs, and though I never saw him in boots, he always appeared with spurs at his heels. His way of clearing his throat in the morning was more inspiring than the crowing of chanticleer, and tapered off with a quaver, like the hunter’s horn. It was impossible to lie abed after hearing it. He was devoted to exercise, but his prominent passion was horse-racing and hunting. In pursuing these he was wont to become so entirely absorbed as to talk to himself with a perfect unconsciousness, and to the great amusement of his friends.

At the races of P— he had bet a large sum of money on one of his favourite horses, Sir Hal, or Sir Archy, for he never bred a horse under the rank of a knight. Finding the horse falling behind by degrees, he began the following soliloquy, which was overheard by one of his associates:

“Billy H—, I believe you are a fool—yes, you certainly are a great fool—sir, you are an infernal fool to bet on that horse.”

By and by his horse began to come up with his competitors. “Not such a fool neither,” shouted the squire. “Billy H— knows what he’s about. Huzza! I’ll bet ten to one on that horse myself.”

“Done, I’ll take the bet,” cried his friend, who had been excessively amused all this while.

“Pooh!” said H—, “can’t a man talk to himself without being interrupted by some busybody or other?”

Mr. H— was a man of great moral worth, and such was the confidence reposed in his integrity, that he was named executor to some of the largest estates in Virginia. I was very fond of him; and indeed it was almost impossible to resist his inborn hilarity and rich good humour. E.

SIMPLICITY.

The more I see of the world, the more I am satisfied that simplicity is as inseparably the companion of true genius as it is of true greatness. I never yet knew a truly great man—a man who overtopped his fellow-men, who did not possess a certain playful, almost infantine simplicity. True greatness never struts on stilts, or plays the king upon the stage. Conscious of its elevation, and knowing in what that elevation consists, it is happy to act its part like common men in the common amusements and business of mankind. It is not afraid of being undervalued for its humility. Of this class is Chief Justice Marshall, than whom a more clear and comprehensive and profound lawyer never perhaps adorned the bench of any country. In his hours of relaxation he is as playful as a child. He is fond of rural sports and exercises, which he enters upon with all the generous ardour of youth; and at sixty years old is one of the best quoit players in Virginia.

I think it was in the summer of 1820 I met him at the Saturday quoit club near Richmond, where were assembled half-a-dozen grave judges, several distinguished persons of various professions, and, though last, not least, an artist, the prince of originals and the best story-teller in existence. A match was made, and the chief justice, throwing off his coat, fell to work with as much ardour as if he were going to decide a question of neutral rights, or one involving the conflicting jurisdictions of sovereign states.

A man who is thus fearless of letting himself down to the level of his fellow-men, in the ordinary amusements and relaxations of life, whatever elevation he may have reached, must possess that innate consciousness of genius which is itself sufficient evidence of its own existence. Those who are afraid of being undervalued or despised for mixing with their fellow-creatures, are of the ordinary every-day race of men, whom chance has made great, and who, like the inmates of unfinished palaces, shut their windows lest people may come nigh enough to detect the abject poverty within. B.

ANTIQUITY.

Old countries, like old families, exist in the recollection of the past. They sit like owls hooting among ruins, stimulating their dotting vanity by the remembrance of ancient glories, and seeking in the mouldy records of time, which exaggerate every thing, oblivion of their present decay. Were they to confine themselves to this harmless indulgence of bed-ridden vanity or dotage, no one would envy or molest them in the enjoyment of these pleasures of memory. But such is not the case. They look down from the ivy mantled summit of their crumbling ruins with an imbecile contempt on those who already are, or will soon become, what they were once in the days of their vigour, and forget that their ancestors were great, only while they partook largely in the energies of a primitive race. They point to the exploits of their forefathers, and instead of blushing at what they themselves have failed to do, cherish as a source of presumptuous boasting those very actions which they are utterly incapable of imitating. They point to the armour and the sword of their ancestors, which not one of their degenerate posterity can wear or wield, and value themselves thus on their own inferiority and degradation. In the imbecility of a garrulous old age, a man may fairly lay claim to the exploits of his youth; these are his own, and time cannot divest him of the merit they merit. But for a whole people, degenerated from the glories of an illustrious ancestry, to claim a renown that belongs exclusively to the dead, and which the living are incapable of acquiring for themselves, is only to glory in what is in truth their shame. It becomes the people of the United States to laugh at these antiquated pretensions, founded, perhaps, on the production of a temple, a statue, a picture, or an epic poem some thousand of years ago, which not one of the succeeding countless generations has been able to equal; to assume quietly, unobtrusively, yet firmly, their rank in the scale of nations, happy that their past history has furnished lessons for the older nations of the world; that their present situation is prosperous; their future prospects ominous of grand accessions to the present, and that as yet they have done nothing to disgrace themselves in a comparison with their hardy, adventurous, and virtuous ancestors. D.

SOCIETIES.

Literary and scientific societies are almost always the refuge of mediocrity, seeking by combination to attain a reputation which it cannot arrive at by any single effort of its own. Their affairs are too generally conducted by cabal and intrigue, in which the proud independence of genius disdains to participate; busybodies and interested intriguants become the leaders; and men too indolent to contribute anything but their names and their purses, are always willing to give the reins into the hands of those who are willing to do all, provided they direct all, and have the disposal of all the funds. Hence it happens, for the most part, that these institutions, although they lay claim to a vast agency in the improvement of arts, science, and literature, seldom encourage any other than second-rate artists and authors. Almost all the great masterpieces in poetry, sculpture, architecture, and painting were produced when there were none of these hotbeds, called societies, or academies. Ninety-nine times in a hundred, genius may be safely left to its own heaven-inspired and heaven-directed energies to pursue its way to immortality alone, rather than under the niggardly patronage and stinted praises of envious mediocrity. b.

DEBTOR AND CREDITOR.

There is nothing more common than to hear a man, upon the most trifling provocation, resolve to issue an execution against his debtor. In a community, particularly like our own, involved in commercial transactions, it is but just that the creditor should be clothed with certain powers to get what has been clearly proved to be his own, and, in as much as it is a man's most sacred duty to supply the wants of his family, no one can complain if, urged by necessity, he take the shortest method of collecting his debts. But it has always grieved upon my feelings, to hear an individual in affluent circumstances, and enjoying all the abundance and luxuries of life, coolly order the sale of a poor family's furniture because they have been unable to comply with his demands. On the circle gathered around the domestic hearth, even a stranger must gaze with interest. There is something sacred in the spot where the family collect together, secluded from the roughness and bustle of the world, to enjoy each other's society, to recall the affectionate incidents through which they have already passed, to dwell upon the images which hope sketches of the future, and to unite in prayer to their eternal Father that they may be shielded from distress. Imagination recoils from painting the misery of such a group when broken up by the intrusion of some stranger, armed by law, to tear from them the little pittance which industry or accident had hitherto allowed them. DELIVERERS.

When the prince of Orange landed at Portsmouth to take possession of the English throne, he harangued the people, saying, "We are come for your good, for all your goods." This blundering truth is no bad specimen of the common objects of "deliverers"—they come for our "goods." I.

TIME.

Time's both a tall-tale and a thief,
I tell with equal truth and grief.
He stole my teeth, my eyes, my hair,
And then proclaimed it every where. Q.

LITERARY NOTICES.

The History of Modern Europe, with a View of the Progress of Society, from the rise of the modern kingdom to the peace of Paris, in 1763. By William L. Russell, LL.D. And a continuation of the history to the present time. By William Jones, Esq. With Annotations by an American. New-York: J. & J. Harper. 3 vols. 8vo.

It is a quaint, but just remark, that, "he who scatters flowers in the student's path is a benefactor of the human race." In pursuing this metaphor, it might be observed that juvenile travellers have had too much reason to complain of a dry, rough, and cheerless road in their pursuit of historical knowledge. This defect has been, in a great measure, removed by the production now under consideration. To such as are unacquainted with the merits of the work, it may be proper to observe that it is divided into short and distinct portions, purporting to be a series of familiar letters, from a father to his son, written in a chaste, light, and pleasing style.

The history commences with a brief view of ancient Europe, just previous to the decline and fall of the Roman empire. The writer then proceeds to consider the moral and political causes of that great event, and its influence on the state of society; and afterwards, to trace its progress and final consummation. Next follows the system of policy and legislation established by the Barbarians, on their settlement in the provinces of the Roman empire, with a description of the feudal system. Then come the rise of the French monarchy and the history of France under the kings of the first race. From this period, the work proceeds in chronological order as respects the history of the several countries and kingdoms of Europe. France, Spain, Italy, Britain, &c. are each successively treated of, for periods of time just sufficiently protracted to preserve every link of the chain unbroken.

We have just intimated that the study of history, to young persons, has often presented a forbidding aspect, and has sometimes been abandoned in disgust. But this is not the case with the work now before us. The incidents are so striking and interesting, and the manner of relating them so easy and familiar, that we hazard little in saying that no student who has once perused a few of these letters, will willingly forego the pleasure of finishing them.

The original work, by William Russell, terminated at the peace of Paris, in 1763. Here Jones takes up the subject, and continues it through those momentous periods of the American and French revolutions, the magnificent career of Bonaparte, the late war between England and America, &c. down to the death of Alexander of Russia, and the accession of Nicholas to the imperial throne of the Czars.

Both these writers appear to have been actuated by liberal motives; and, in their details of facts, are perhaps as strictly impartial as any of their contemporaries or predecessors. Still, however, we are occasionally compelled to smile at a little "John Bullism" which seems to peep forth in despite of the disinterestedness and magnanimity of the historian. Such, for instance, as the following, where, speaking of the dispute between Great Britain and her American colonies previous to the revolutionary war, Mr. Jones says:

"It cannot be doubted that it would have been very possible to give the British empire a constitution in which its provinces should be admitted to their reasonable share of influence; in which case the freedom and power of the state would have been established on new foundations, and Great Britain would still have continued at the head of the empire, until the maturity of the new world should at length have rendered it necessary to transfer the seat of supreme power across the Atlantic."

On this subject the American annotator has the following judicious remarks:

"The idea conveyed in the concluding sentence of this paragraph must strike the American reader as romantic and Utopian. The history of past ages furnishes no testimony in its favour, and a moderate knowledge of human nature will readily detect its fallacy. The emigration of the court of Portugal to Brazil is not analogous, because that was a flight for personal safety. The relation between old governments and their prosperous colonies, like that between parents and enterprising children, must ultimately be dissolved. The period must arrive when the latter will 'set up for themselves,' and form independent establishments, 'peaceably if they can, forcibly if they must.'"

Again, in describing the battle of Bunker Hill, Mr. Jones says:

"The British ascended the hill until they came within a short distance of the Americans; and as the troops approached the works, so hot a fire was opened upon them that they were thrown into confusion, and for a short time General Howe was left almost alone. The men, however, soon rallied, and, rushing upon the American works with fixed bayonets, they forced them in every quarter."

Here the American annotator is "down upon him" again, and thus he delivers his fire: "It is a remarkable fact," says he, "that almost every British historian affects to treat the battle of Bunker Hill as a trifling skirmish, scarcely worthy of record; and yet, at the same time, they appear to approach the subject with more timidity than their brave countrymen evinced in ascending the hill in the face of the American fire." Mr. Jones, with evident reluctance, admits that the royalists were once "thrown into confusion;" but he wishes us to believe that it was merely a momentary one; for he adds, that "they soon rallied, and rushing upon the American works with fixed bayonets, they forced them in every quarter." Now it is a well-known fact, corroborated by hundreds of spectators, who could not be mistaken, that the British made three successive attempts to dislodge the Americans, and only succeed ed when the ammunition of the latter was totally expended, leaving them no alternative but to retreat, or (as many actually did) desperately defend their ill-constructed redoubt with the butt-ends of their muskets!" After their first repulse and disorderly retreat, the British soldiers could only be rallied a second and third time, "with the utmost difficulty, their officers pushing them forward with the points of their swords!" See the histories of Morse, Willard, Warren, Thatcher, &c.

Once more—with a brevity and confusion similar to the foregoing, the author dispatches the history of our naval transactions during the late war. He just mentions the loss of the Guerriere and the Macedonian, and "an action between two sloops of war, where the advantage also was on the American side;" but says nothing of the Java, or the two British squadrons which we conquered, with inferior force, on the lakes! while the capture of the poor Chesapeake frigate, which he calls "a fine ship of forty-nine guns," (for which solitary naval victory the tower guns of London were fired!) occupies a long and pompous paragraph!

On this subject, the American annotator is "quite at home," for Brother Jonathan is very eloquent upon these things. "Let us see," says he, "how the account actually stands, arranged in chronological order." He then gives a list of American naval victories, over five frigates, five brigs of war, four sloops of war, and two squadrons on the lakes; together with the relative strength, in guns and men, of the combatants; and the number of minutes in which the victories were achieved. "The above," says he, "is a brief catalogue of the most important nautical events of the late war; and, in almost every instance, the disparity of force was in favour of the British. To recapitulate the minor successes of the United States public and private armed vessels, (adds he) would swell this note to a history."

But notwithstanding the little "sins of omission" which we have noticed above, and several others that might be added—(such as the "trifling skirmish" at New-Orleans, which the author forgets to mention)—we pronounce this work to be the best of the kind that has come under our observation; and we cannot conclude without cordially recommending it to American youth of both sexes.

Cabinet History of the Netherlands, by T. C. Grattan.

This work is doubly interesting, from its subject and its execution. The history of the Netherlands is interwoven with that of Europe. It has been the theatre of half the wars, the object of half the contests which belong to the annals of that continent. Its geographical situation gives it an importance to which its relative power and extent would not entitle it; and it has always been the cause of the jealousy and ambition of its powerful neighbours. The warlike character of its inhabitants, their ancient feuds, and their difference in descent, government, and religion have produced a series of intestine disorders, which make its annals interesting and romantic, if they are often dark and bloody. The history of Belgium is, in fact, the history of all Europe, and as we pursue the one we pass in review all the great men and great exploits of the other. The events, too, of which it has lately been the scene, render any account of it peculiarly acceptable at present. Of the work before us it is only justice to speak in terms of commendation. Mr. Grattan has shown himself capable of earning a higher reputation than that of the mere novelist; and, without disparaging his merits as such, we will freely confess that the present work has given us a higher idea of his talents than we had previously entertained. He has proved himself capable of pleasing without resorting to fancy or fiction for assistance, and of instructing without degenerating into dulness. This little duodecimo is not, to be sure, very extensive, very profound, or very philosophical; but it is a clear, able narrative of the vicissitudes of the country it treats of, and far better fitted for general perusal and general instruction than a production of more pretension would have been. It has all the interest of a novel to recommend it to the lovers of light reading; and enough of the truth, dignity, and impartiality of history to satisfy the graver student.

While on this subject, we must not omit to mention that the work is from the press of Messrs. Carey and Lea, long distinguished as judicious as well as enterprising publishers. It forms part of a series called the Cabinet Library, five numbers of which have already appeared, forming an agreeable and valuable collection.

WILLIAMS'S REGISTER.—We are indebted to the politeness of Mr. Williams for the loan of the engraving on our first page. It was executed expressly for his work by Mr. King, of Troy.

THE BOY'S FAREWELL TO HIS MOTHER.

MOTHER, I gathered, while the early dew
Filled all their shining cups, these flowers for you.
I've cul'd, with care, the buds thou lovest the best;
These for thy vase—and violets for thy breast!
And roses too, which, in our happier day,
I've seen thee wear—they bloom not now so gay.
And I have made thy garden-walk so neat,
'Tis like a velvet carpet for thy feet.
And I have cleared those envious thorns away
That tease thee so, when at the close of day
Along the winding path thou lovest to go
To gaze upon the dancing rill below.
The sun was up ere half my task was done—
Now, dearest mother, smile upon thy son.
Alas! thy thoughtful eyes are sad to-day—
One little smile peep'd out, but would not stay.
Thou art not angry with thy wayward boy,
For oft thou say'st I am thy only joy,
And though I sometimes tire with fancies vain
My heart would break to think I gave thee pain.
I know that tears adown thy cheek will stray
When I am gone—and we must part to-day.
'Tis hard to part—but I must be a man,
I'll be a hero, mother, if I can!
Heroes, they say, would scorn to shed a tear—
E'en though they separate from friends so dear.
'Tis hard indeed—how lone my heart will be
When I awake at morning, missing thee;
And know, how well soe'er my tasks are done,
I shall not hear my mother bless her son;
Nor feel that dear soft hand upon my brow—
I must not weep—and, mother, weep not thou!
For I will love thee, though I'm far away—
I'll think of thee at morn, and close of day,
And treasure all thy lessons—and he still Guided, my angel mother, by thy will.
If I no more may gather flowers for thee,
Nor keep thy garden-walk from brambles free,
Nor lead thee where the summer berries grow,
Nor in thy lap the wild grape-clusters throw,
Nor read to thee at eve, nor raise thy smiles,
And cheat thy sadness by my silly wiles,
Yet I can strive in learning's path to rise,
And mingle ever with the good and wise.
Wilt thou not smile, if, at some future day,
Thou hear'st my praise? Wilt that thy cares repay?
Then I will cast away all childish glee,
And strive, the sooner to return to thee.
And I will gather gold—and thou shalt share
All that I have—I'll tend thee with such care!
But I must leave thee ere all this be done;
Then, farewell, dearest mother—bless thy son! H.

SKETCHES FROM THE DIARY OF AN EDITOR.

THE CRITIQUE.

SEVERAL months after the occurrence related in my last, I perceived, among my bundle of letters, newspapers, &c. from the post-office, a number of the Cahabaw Democrat, containing about a column of abuse against my personal character, and many contemptuous epithets bestowed upon my journal. Several of my patrons in that part of the country threatened to discontinue their subscription. The article was copied into the Catskill United States Federal Republican, the Henry Clay Observer, and the Macdonough Jacksonian. These influential gazettes, I accidentally discovered, were edited by cousins and boon companions of Mr. Obadiah Thompson; and the whole gang, thus scattered in ambush, like Kentucky riflemen, over different parts of the field, opened upon me such a discharge of small artillery, that I so far forgot my natural equanimity and editorial dignity as to wish Mr. Obadiah Thompson, his Travels in Kamchatka, the Cahabaw Democrat, and all their "kith and kin" locked up among the icebergs of the polar regions. Besides having myself read the article in question, (for the papers in which they were published were all sent me by some attentive and good-natured friend,) I was almost harassed out of my senses by the remarks and interrogations of my numerous acquaintances. One shook his head, with an air of pity, as if he looked on some fellow sentenced to be hanged, and then asked me if I had seen the United States Federal Republican? Another came in, giggling and grinning, as if he had drawn a prize in the lottery. He made several attempts to speak, but was interrupted by his laughter; and I was about to congratulate him on his spirits, when he slapped his hand on my shoulder, with amiable familiarity, and asked me if I had read the Cahabaw Democrat? He had not yet done laughing, when a hungry, lank, consumptive-looking young man, to whom I had been slightly introduced about two years before, with high cheek bones, and India-rubber over-shoes, who hangs about taverns, and chews tobacco, stepped into my office with much solemnity, and taking out his pocket-book, fumbled about among theatre bills and tailor bills, as if he were seeking a bank bill.

Ah, ha! I thought, a subscriber, I suppose! but the paper which he handed me, instead of his four dollars in advance, proved to be one of the above mentioned paragraphs, which the young man with India-rubber over-shoes had kindly cut out for my especial gratification.

"I am very much obliged to you, sir; you are very polite," I exclaimed, as I saw by a glance the nature of the communication.

"Not in the least, sir," said he, and coolly replenished his mouth with about half a paper of Lorillard's best, and, after an operation peculiar to the tobacco-chewing tribe of young men, and by which he nearly extinguished my fire, he favoured me with a respectful bow and disappeared. So much for Mr. Obadiah Thompson.

Among the numerous perplexities to which the editor of a public print is subjected, he enjoys also certain advantages, which it would be ungrateful in me to overlook. He is a knowing one among the million. He continually sees behind the curtain how the affairs of the world are conducted. He struts about like a rooster among actors, authors, and publishers, and when he slaps his sides with his wings and crows forth his critical remarks, there is a general cackle among the literary chickens. Indeed, he can flog the whole barn-yard into confusion. Like that high-minded bird, he also looks with a suspicious and unfriendly eye upon others of the fraternity who encroach upon his premises. Two of the tribe do never encounter each other but they ruffle their feathers, move with wider strides, and exhibit a superadded dignity and loftiness of demeanor which generally end in a pretty considerable fight. Did you ever, Mr. Reader, lean your elbows on a rail fence, on some morning in spring, and behold two bantams engaged in a fierce and chivalric combat upon some abstract point of honour? Even so do the enlightened and sensible brethren of the fraternity to which I belong pass away their time—instruct the community—further the great cause of liberty and national intelligence, and gain for themselves a durable and valuable place in history.

The editor is a sort of divinity. Mortals lay gifts at his shrine. Publishers, painters, poets hover around him. Unseen hands supply him with specimens of every graceful and splendid treasure that genius or industry puts forth. The doors of places of public amusement open of themselves at his approach. His secret thoughts pass with electric speed around the world.

After having flung a fresh hickory stick upon the fire and stirred up the bed of solid burning coals, which produced a crackling blaze, I seated myself in the elbow-chair with the above reflections. I had just finished dinner. An extra glass of wine made me benevolent and happy. I deposited my legs in another chair, folded my arms, looked into the fire for ideas, and concluded to take a sleigh-ride for exercise.

Suddenly a tall form stood before me. His face was begrimed and black. He gazed solemnly on me. A pleasant dream was gone.

"The men want copy, sir," was his awful salutation.

"I thought they had copy enough for to-day," said I.

"The last communication you sent up," said the devil, "could not be read."

"How much room in this form?"

"Two columns, sir."

"I shall die if I don't take more exercise," said I.

"You must not die and leave the world no copy," quoted Peter.

I looked up—the scoundrel had made a pun at me and was grinning from ear to ear. I restrained my impulse to fling the inkstand at his head, and politely requested him to withdraw. Instead of sleigh-ride, went to business.

At that moment entered my friend Colonel Jackson. He is about six feet in height, shoulders broad, with an athletic form, rather approaching the Falstaff style of grace. He had shot three men in duels in France, and lost all his money gambling. Yet he lived along, no one knew how. Carried a bull dog frown upon his countenance, and snarled and growled at every body and every thing.

"I've come to discontinue my paper," said he. "It's too full of puffs and flummery. I want something severe and solid. I'm sick of hearing people praised. You puff books, you puff editors, you puff actors. This is the best singer and that the best player—Mr. Thingumbob astonished us in Hamlet, and Miss The-lord-knows-who excelled herself in Cordelia. Give me something slashing, sprightly. Don't send your paper to me any more. I'll settle your bill with the clerk as I go out."

He cast his eyes on me, as if he were going to eat me up, pulled his hat down over his eyebrows, and went away, giving the door a slam.

"The colonel is a bear," said I to myself; "but he speaks the truth." So I commenced, that very moment, and wrote a critique upon the theatre. It was, as Mr. Obadiah Thompson said, "one of my happiest efforts." For, while I entered into an impartial and temperate examination of the various claims of the players to excellence, and, what I deemed a philosophical analysis of their faults and merits, it contained nothing which, I believed, could be offensive to the feelings of any individual therein named.

Colonel Jackson will subscribe again, thought I, when he sees this. I felt pleased with the idea of having shown that there was at least one independent press in the country.

The day after the paper was published, I was engaged in writing "an essay on the independence of the press in the United States," wherein I had proved incontrovertibly, and perfectly to my own satisfaction, that the abuses against the press were all calumnies, and that an editor was a free agent, except inasmuch as he was controlled by public opinion, when Colonel Jackson entered once more. His hat was yet pulled down over his eyes. He stood up before me like a colossus, and flung down a note which I found to this effect:

"Sir—Your slanderous remarks respecting my personation of — the other night, are base, false, and impertinent. My friend, Colonel Jackson, will arrange the terms of this business. Time, place, and weapon as you please. If I cannot play —, I can snuff a candle with a pistol bullet at any reasonable distance. What right have you to find fault with my acting? I will teach you that you have caught a Tartar. Yours, truly, P. L."

"Caught a Tartar!" said I, looking up at the colonel. "I think I have caught a Tartar. Time, place, and weapon, fit—sooth! Why what does the fellow mean?"

"Mr. L.," said the colonel, "is my friend;" the last two words emphatic. "You will please keep guard upon your words when they relate to him. He has taken this step by my advice."

"Your advice?" exclaimed I, astonished. "Why it was by your advice I wrote the remarks he complains of."

"I advised you to cut up the actors, but I said nothing about my worthy friend Mr. L. You should censure only those who deserve it. But," waving his hand gracefully, "to the purpose. What time will you choose, what place and weapon to give my friend the satisfaction of a gentleman?"

"The satisfaction of a fool!" said I, in a passion again.

"Pray, my good sir, tell your friend, as you call him, to play better, or I shall continue my remarks with increased asperity. I do not think the occasion worth risking my life for. I should be very sorry to kill your friend, and more sorry to be killed by him; but if he offer any insult to me, though I am unwilling to injure him, I shall know how to defend myself."

To my surprise Mr. L. himself, who, it appeared, had listened at the door, now rushed in, and, with a cane of more than ordinary weight and thickness, evidently procured with a view to a desperate assault and battery, walked up to me, his face red with rage, and lifting the bludgeon was proceeding to a very unequivocal symptom of hostility, when I took from my drawer a small uncharged pocket-pistol, cocked it, and aimed it at his head. He vanished with dramatic celerity. I should think the gentleman had sunk in one of his own trap-doors.

"Now, sir," said I, addressing the colonel, who had fiercely walked towards the door. The more frightened he got, the more fierce he looked.

"Good morning, sir; good morning, sir," said he, and he also vanished.

I sat down and finished my paragraph on the independence of the press. About two months afterwards I saw the whole affair in the Cahabaw Democrat, wherein I was made to cut a sorry figure. The next morning the young man with India-rubber over-shoes came in, and laid a copy of the United States Federal Republican on my table.

I then resolved to let the theatre alone, and for several numbers was silent upon the subject, when one morning my respectable little friend, Monsieur Achille Barbierre, came into my office, took off his hat, made me three bows, and said:

"Monsieur Editor—Je suis bien fâché dat you say no ting of de spectacle, de comedie, in your papier. I go toujours an spectacle—dat is way I have learn your language so parfaitment bien. Now I have peruse your papier to-morrow morning before breakfast in de afternoon—you nevaire say something about de comedie. I cannot no more be your abonné."

Saying this, he took a pinch of snuff—made me three bows, put on his hat, and was no longer numbered among my subscribers.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

Letters from Correspondents.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Messrs. Editors—As every philanthropic person naturally wishes to ameliorate the condition of the poor in this inclement season, I take the liberty of suggesting an infallible mode of keeping one's self warm, even when the thermometer is below zero, as I have proved in my own proper person. I have been dealing with brokers and lottery-offices till I am so well fleeced, that I defy any weather this side of the south pole. Pray publish this for the information of all persons troubled with cold chills. Yours truly, N. S.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Messrs. Editors—I am a belle and a beauty, everybody says, and I take care to let everybody see me as often as possible, because I have always heard it said, out of sight out of mind. There has not been a party for the last six years I have not been at, so that, as you may suppose, I am pretty well known to every body worth knowing. Indeed, my fashionable acquaintance is universal, and I take care nobody, that is, nobody worth being remembered by, shall forget me.

You must know I have a dear bosom friend, who is reckoned as handsome as myself, but who hardly ever goes into public, though how she manages to exist at home I cannot guess, with no company but her father and mother, and brothers and sisters, and cousins, and stupid relations, and such like tiresome people. But I don't know how it is, though nobody sees her, everybody inquires after her. I am provoked to death when I go into public, with questions about my friend, whether she is well, and why don't she come to the party, and all such kinds of impertinent inquiries. Everybody seems to be thinking of her, which is what I can't account for, except they mean to affront and mortify me. What makes this the more provoking, I have ascertained that nobody asks about me, or seems to feel the least interest whether I am well, or coming to a party or not. The other night I could not help saying rather tartly to a young gentleman who thought proper to pester me with these impertinences, that I wished somebody would inquire about me. His reply was, "Ah, Miss Laura, you are always every where present to answer for yourself."

Do you think the creature meant to insult me? Yours ever, LAURA VIGOR.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Messrs. Editors—I know you hate puffing, and so do I. But it would be injuring the world to keep from it a knowledge of useful inventions, and for that reason I ask you, in the name of philanthropy, to announce to the public my newly invented pen, which, I flatter myself, will completely cut out all the self-sharpening pencils, and such like frivolous trumpery. I call it the inspired pen, and you will presently see that it merits that name.

In the first place, Mr. Editor, the person using it has no occasion whatever to learn to write. It takes all the labour of mechanical execution off his hands; nor is it necessary ever to have seen any one write, or any thing in the shape of writing, to produce a perfect manuscript. But the most valuable property of the inspired pen is the aid it affords to authors of every description, whereby poets may write without inspiration, and political economists and metaphysicians without understanding their subject. In short, it takes all the trouble of thinking entirely upon itself, so that a man may soar on the wings of imagination, or dive into the depths of philosophy, while his mind is entirely employed on other subjects. I am sorry for the unfortunate gentlemen who teach writing in six lessons. It is all over with them, but I can't help it. I must not forget to tell you that my pen never requires mending, and supplies itself with ink, sand, sealing-wax, &c. I don't despair of bringing it to such a degree of perfection, that it will fold a letter, and afterwards carry it to the post-office. Yours, &c. PEGASUS PENFEATHER.

P. S. I have certificates from distinguished persons, who never saw me or my pen, but whose authority cannot fail of being conclusive. P. P.

To our right worshipful cousins and counsellors, the learned pundits, Morris and Fay, greeting:

This is to apprise you that our royal highness was last night robbed of her trunk, or rather that her trunk was robbed of various valuable articles, consisting of six bottles of porter, three sirloins of beef, and other things of value. The theft was committed while our royal highness was reposeing, after receiving the salaams of the Nawabs, Moonshes, Butcherbatché boys, and other dignitaries of this illustrious city. Whoever will restore the said articles shall be admitted to our presence six times gratis, be graciously permitted to kiss our toe, and receive the honorary dignity of lord of the bed-chamber to our highness. Witness our foot this fifth day of the moon, in the year thirty-six thousand five hundred and forty-nine.

her
By command of her highness, THE PRINCESS X OF SIAM.
The lord chamberlain Footloolohoo-boo!

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Messrs. Morris and Fay—I seldom read any thing but a hobgoblin story, or some exciting affair of that sort, having other much more piquant modes of killing time. The other day, however, in a moment of ennui, I happened to take up your Mirror, and the first thing that caught my attention was a letter from a young lady, complaining of the strolling gentlemen of Broadway for taking the wall of them, walking arm-in-arm, and pushing them into snow-banks.

Now you must know I spend three or four hours walking up and down Broadway every morning the weather will permit. It is a wholesome exercise, and kills time most beautifully. I think I do recollect something of getting entangled in a sleeve one day last week, and carrying it away, but I give you my honour it was not my fault. The truth is, Broadway is so full of hats, feathers, sleeves, cloaks, and razed petticoats, that it is next to impossible to keep clear of them. A fashionable woman takes up nearly as much room as a load of hay now a-days, and you can't conceive the manœuvring required to get out of her way when she is approaching under full sail, with colours flying, top-gallant royals set, and skyscrapers floating in the breeze. Then you are almost certain, in trying to avoid one before, you back, or side against two or three either behind or one side of you, for Broadway is peopled with these kinds of show-women. I wonder where they all come from, for my part.

I saw the lady who complains of the accident to her sleeve, bearing down upon me at a distance, and made the necessary preparations to give her elbow-room in time. But as the mischief would have it, just as we met, and I was about to escape under her hat, another show-woman came suddenly out of a shop, and betwixt the two, the street was actually blocked up. In attempting to avoid this latter, I came in contact with the sleeve of the other, which caught one of my frogs and was carried away, or rather carried me away with it, in the manner she has truly stated. I was taken up and landed at Flatbush, whence I returned the next day, after making a donation of the sleeve to the Orphan Asylum at that place. The matron of the establishment has politely informed me that it has provided ample material for clothing six of the little orphans.

I hate writing, if possible, more than I do reading; but I could not sit quiet under the imputation of want of gallantry to the sex. I consider that as my forte, and have since stuck fast in six snow-banks in attempting to get out of the way of the show-women. With respect to walking arm-in-arm, we only follow the example of the show-women, who don't mind taking the arm of a perfect stranger and gallanting him all over town. Yours, &c. TOM STAREMBURG.

P. S. It is a calumny that I don't know my right hand from my left. I am a captain in the militia, and learnt that long ago. T. S.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Messrs. Editors—I wish you would take up the cudgels for us young ladies against the narrow old notions and unreasonable prejudices of their fathers and mothers. You make a great rout about freedom of action and opinion among the men, but you have no idea of the domestic oppressions we unfortunate single ladies are subject to at the fireside. At this moment I am confined to the house against my will by the capricious tyranny of my father, who has taken it into his head that I shall catch cold if I go out in the wet and muddy streets without over-shoes, or fur-shoes, or cork soles, or some such abominable deformity. Did you ever hear such strange nonsense? I told him it made me look like a fright; and he answered it was better to look like a fright than like a ghost. What stuff.

After trying coaxing, crying, and every thing I could think of, he at last told me roundly, I should either put on India-rubber shoes to go out in, or stay at home. What would you male sticklers for liberty say, I wonder, if the government were to order you about in this way? I tried every art to soften the obdurate heart of my unnatural parent, and particularly pleaded the example of mamma, who goes out every day in prunella shoes. But he said ma was her own mistress, and if she caught cold it was none of his business.

Finding I could make no impression by entreaties or arguments, I determined to be obstinate. So here I have been sitting yawning at the window a fortnight past without stirring abroad till I am almost tired to death. Papa still holds out, and I am sadly afraid I shall have to give up the contest and put on the odious India-rubbers, that make one's foot look like a chimney-sweeper's. O, I can't bear the thoughts of it! What is a little bit of a cold or a cough during the winter, to disfiguring oneself in this way, and spoiling a pretty foot? You must know my foot is very much admired.

I beseech you, Messrs. Editors, to interpose in behalf of the rights of women to wear what shoes they like, and catch cold as often as they please. Yours, SELINA STREETYARN.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Messrs. Editors—As it is becoming fashionable for young ladies to address you editors upon the subject of their grievances, I hope you will publish this letter of mine. I should like of all things to see some of my writing in print; and why not, pray? for I think I know just as well as any thing in this world, that Miss Isabella Bobbinet, whose letter was in the last Mirror, isn't a pin better than I am. I have just finished school, and this winter I come out and see company. Pa didn't want me to come out till next winter; but I begged so hard, and ma said something so sensible to him about the rich young Mr. L. that between us both pa consented. Pa always objects at first, but ma and I carry the day in the end. Well, I'll now tell what I'm going to write about. I had great trouble to fix upon a subject. First, I was going to take beauty, then spring, then I began a little love story of a young man of my acquaintance, who made love to a young woman, and won her affections, and then the young man found another young woman, who was a good deal handsomer than the first, and a good deal richer too; and so the young man married the latter; and the other young woman got very sick, and—I suppose you think she died—but that shows how much you know about it; she got married, and lived very happily, and enjoyed domestic bliss, and all that. But on the whole I concluded to wait till I fell in love with somebody, so as to tell better how it feels, for pa says nobody ought to write upon subjects they don't understand. Now between you and me, entre nous, as Mademoiselle D'Arlingcourt, our French teacher, used to say, I do almost believe, that is, I shouldn't wonder at all if I had got a leelle in love already, for there's a young man comes sometimes to our house, and looks so well—has his hair all curled, and his boots brushed—and he has such large dark hazel eyes, that he fixes on me so, and he wears an olive frock-coat, that I could sit still and let him look at me always. Then he has such a beautiful voice, and sometimes he leads me to the piano, and leans over me, and sings, "My pretty page, look out afar," or "Meet me by moonlight alone," with ever so many other songs. I declare he is the most delightful, dear, good-for-nothing fellow, and one of the greatest quizzes you ever saw. I do like a handsome young man, who is a quiz, if he can sing, and wears an olive frock-coat. I think those frock-coats are so becoming. If I were a young man, I'd wear an olive frock-coat, and I'd quiz every body to death. But bless my soul, how I'm rattling on. I was going to write about whiskers and mustachios. Those ugly, filthy, bearish-looking things. Charles' face is as smooth and beautiful as mine. Now, Messrs. Editors, I asked pa if the public authorities couldn't put a stop to this dreadful fashion. I'd put any man in the state-prison that dared to come into the presence of a respectable and handsome young lady with such piratical, impudent, abominable, ugly-looking things. There was one—I won't call him a gentleman, because gentlemen always try to please the ladies—who came in to see pa one night, just before we had lighted the candles. Pa had just gone out, so we were left all alone in the drawing-room, and I was really frightened, for I thought he was a Turk or an Algerine—but when pa came in and the candles were lighted, he spoke English as well as you could. Pa said he was an American born, and had never been abroad except to Philadelphia and Brooklyn. If he were well shaved he would be tolerably good-looking they say, but I don't believe a word of it. Pray don't you think it rather a silly piece of vanity for young Americans, who have travelled, to make themselves conspicuous on their return, as many others do, by such means as these? Would it not show more good sense in them to strive to be distinguished rather by superior information and elegance of manners; by their liberality, their civility, and their attachment to the customs of their own country, than to seek the notice of the rabble by letting hair grow on their upper lip. Besides, I think that young gentlemen who have been fortunate enough to possess advantages of friends and fortune sufficient to enable them to see the world, would be much more excusable in sustaining the honest and manly simplicity which ought to characterize every citizen of this republic amid the luxurious splendour and capricious fashions of foreign lands, than in attempting to introduce new-fangled customs and useless innovations among their own countrymen. Any fool may wear a lock on his lip as a kind of publication to the street passengers that he has been to Europe, but surely there are more dignified means of showing they have been blessed with better opportunities of improving themselves than others possess. When our sterling philosopher, statesman, patriot, and honest man, Benjamin Franklin, was at the court of France, at some great public festival the rules of the place required that he should array himself in a suit corresponding to the magnificence of the occasion, on penalty of being excluded therefrom. He sent in a request, I believe, to the throne, stating, that his ideas of propriety and habits of life were opposed to any extraordinary alteration in his dress, and received in reply a permission to appear in his usual costume, which he did; and this is the man for whom all Paris mourned. Now suppose that instead of this he had become enamoured of foreign fashions, returned with a monstrous pair of whiskers and mustachios, don't you think it would have been a derogation from his character? I am afraid these youths who go abroad and bring nothing home but hair, will never be Dr. Franklins, any of them. Pa says you can't indict a man for trespasses on taste and decency, but only for getting other people's money, and such things; but you, Messrs. Editors, can tell them for me, that although they may think they look beautiful with these appendages, the young ladies of New-York would rather see Americans dress and act like Americans; and let dukes, counts, and Spanish grandees keep their fashions and their titled pride on the other side of the Atlantic. Your obedient servant,

MARY.

THE FINE ARTS.

REVIEW OF THE
BIOGRAPHY OF MADAME FERON.

Published in a contemporary journal, by Germanicus.

In reviewing the biography of any professional person, it seems to us that we have to direct our attention to three points. First, to the spirit in which the author has written; second, to his matter of fact; and third, to speculative opinions advanced with regard to the science on which he treats. On the first we find no fault with Germanicus. If he has leaned towards the bright side of the question, and adopted a tone of eulogy, we take into consideration that he is writing of a woman, and that is a sufficient apology. The correctness of his statements as to where the fair vocalist was born, where she travelled, and whom she met, we shall not question; nor shall we trouble ourselves with comparing the biographer's private opinions with those which he says many eminent musicians entertained on the same subject, for after all it is a mere matter of on dit. Indeed we should have passed over the whole affair in silence, well pleased at the deservedly complimentary notice of a talented singer, had not the author thought proper to draw the most extraordinary conclusions from premises founded on fallacy. Will it be credited by any professional friends or admirers of Madame Feron, who have not read the article, that it is, in the first place, assumed as a position that the effects she produces are attributable to her possessing the portamento di voce in perfection? We quote the author's words:

"Madame Feron appears now to most advantage in the aria di portamento, a term by which I mean that the voice must be strongly supported and artfully managed through the long notes, of which this air is composed, the motion of which is graver than that of any other species. Mrs. Austin, it has been said, has acquired the portamento di voce to great perfection, but I must differ on this point. This lady does more justice to the aria cantabile than to the aria di portamento."

"Apt terms in apt places, if you please," said Lord Brougham the other day, when he was compelled to expose a fellow peer of the British house of lords. "Apt terms in apt places" are equally necessary in an analytical, and critical, and technical, and biographical portrait, such as the author describes his present essay to be; but, if his terms be apt, all the writers of celebrity are wrong, and have ever been wrong, and they need a voyage to America for the sake of discovering Germanicus, and gaining new lights. As we doubt, however, whether Germanicus will succeed in converting the musical world to his way of thinking, we, as humble individuals, shall take the precaution of entrenching ourselves behind the opinions of some few of the most reputed writers, while we venture to assure our readers that no lady or gentleman can sing any melody composed of "long grave notes;" nor yet produce the least effect in any aria of the species called "cantabile," without being perfect in that branch of study termed "portamento di voce;" consequently, if Mrs. Austin, as our author avers, "may be considered a singer to the heart," and if her mode of executing "Angels ever bright and fair," render it a "delightful soothing cantabile," we agree with him "that it is a qualification difficult to be imitated;" but, nevertheless, we assert that it arises solely from the study and acquisition of the portamento di voce. It is not the writer's opinion that we complain of, it is only the blundering attempt at inference with which the essay abounds; and foremost stands the gross misunderstanding of the phrase portamento di voce. We call his attention to the following explanation of its meaning given by Mr. T. Cooke, member of the Philharmonic Society and Royal Academy of Music, London, and (we like to be particular) director of the music to the theatre-royal Drury-lane, and Bavarian choir at Warwick-street chapel:

"Portamento is the art of carrying the voice gracefully from one note to another by means of a glide. It is of considerable service in giving a flowing and continuous effect to the voice, and in lessening the difficulty attendant on singing notes which are separated from each other by distant intervals, &c. &c. The judicious regulation of this branch of singing greatly assists in giving the true effect to movements intended to express feeling and tenderness; the power of conveying the beauties of such movements is justly considered to be the highest perfection of vocal excellence." Then follows an example from Handel, "Farewell, ye limpid streams;" a larghetto movement of exactly the same description as "Angels ever bright and fair."

So much for the opinion of Mr. T. Cooke. Now let us examine what the celebrated Italian master, Gesualdo Lanza, says on the same subject, in his treatise on the art of singing:

"Anticipation," (in Italian, portamento di voce), "is a kind of flowing style of singing, which it carries gracefully from one note to another, when notes are separated by any distance; it is very often made use of in Italian singing, and is described in music by a small note after a large one of the same sound with the next note, the value is thus taken from the first note."

If the opinions of these two highly successful and eminent masters—the former of whom educated Miss Tree and Mrs. Knight, the latter Miss Stephens and Mrs. Austin, with a host of others—be not of sufficient calibre to cope with our friend Germanicus, let us quote from the writings of others. Sir John Hawkins thinks that portamento di voce means "the art of carrying the voice from note to note with a pleasant cunning;" and Dr. Burney says that "portamento is the glory of the Italian school; that it consists of a graceful progression from note to note, more excelled in by Madame Mara in Handel's air of 'Pious Orgies,' than by any other singer that he had ever heard."

We hope we have now established to the satisfaction of our musical readers, that either Germanicus has made a sad mistake touching the portamento, or that the works of the greatest musicians of the present and past ages need his correction. We also submit that we have proved that the portamento di voce is an essential ingredient in such airs as "Angels ever bright and fair," "Farewell, ye limpid streams," and "Pious Orgies," which are all of one class, and are cantabile movements. Let us now hear Germanicus contradict himself. He asserts, and, for the sake of perspicuity, we reiterate his own words:

"Madame Feron appears to most advantage in the aria di portamento, a term by which I mean that the voice must be strongly supported through the long notes, of which this air is composed."

Will the reader be pleased to compare the following quotation with the foregoing:

"Madame Feron finds as much difficulty in holding one note as she has facility in running an hundred!"

We really cannot do such injustice to our readers' capacity as to point out the absurdity of this contradiction. It is self-evident.

Again. We ask how can Madame Feron excel in an aria di portamento, and be applauded for "pompa della voce," (majesty of voice,) if both its firmness and tone be injured by her course of practice? and yet such are the extraordinary assertions of Germanicus.

Let us endeavour to designate the actual qualities in which Madame Feron does excel, and contrast her with Mrs. Austin, in those morceaux which are familiar to our readers, and we think the result will prove that Madame Feron's success has invariably been greatest in those pieces in which the quality of portamento di voce is least necessary; on the contrary, the success of Mrs. Austin has been most marked where that quality is developed. In the opera of Isidore de Merida, Madame Feron pleased the London audience in the song of "Cupid, aid me," arranged to suit the brilliant parts of her voice by Mr. T. Cooke, from the score of an Italian, named Balducci; and she sang the beautiful aria by Storace, entitled "Peaceful slumbering," without the least applause. In the same opera Mrs. Austin made no feature of "Cupid, aid me," but succeeded in obtaining the most marked approbation for "Peaceful slumbering;" a melody, according to the examples we have quoted, demanding the portamento di voce, whereas the former requires none. In the Marriage of Figaro, in the duet sul aria, wherein portamento is essential, the even and flowing execution of the cantabile passages placed Mrs. Austin very far in advance of Madame Feron, to counteract which the latter invariably threw her whole force and power into a rolata at the conclusion, which had a due effect in redeeming her with a mixed audience, although not suited to the style of the music. But, as Germanicus states, that he never witnessed Madame Feron's performance in the theatre, let us follow him to the concert-room, and bring the two ladies before him there. We can fix upon no better occasion than the musical festival got up by Mr. Horn at Niblo's Garden; it consisted of three parts, one, of sacred, a second of Italian secular, and a third of English secular music. In the sacred music Mrs. Austin took the lead, because Mr. Horn knew her capabilities; and Madame Feron gladly relinquished the responsibility of undertaking music for which she was not qualified; but as one song was necessary, we had an opportunity of contrasting her execution of "Wise men flattering," in which no effect was produced, with the "Angels ever bright;" "The bright seraphim," &c. in which Mrs. Austin was perfectly at home; and nevertheless Madame Feron's brilliant execution in the following act placed her as high in our estimation as ever; for her "Nel cor non piu mi, ento," and other morceaux, deprived of the portamento, were brilliant as usual. In conclusion, for we cannot follow our author in his wanderings any further, we really must be allowed to express our astonishment at the presumptuous attack upon Italy, which he conveys in the following words:

"She, Madame Feron, has been too much abroad, and in a school where a taste prevails, to which we enter our decided protest, because it is Italian."

What school, then, in the name of all that is wonderful, would our author select for the musical education of a vocalist? Is he really ignorant that all vocal music in all civilized countries is taught upon principles originally laid down by the Italians, that every sofleggio is essentially Italian, and that every nation agrees in adopting Italian terms to express musical sounds. In short, we are tired of schooling Germanicus upon points which all musicians ought to know, and here we bid him adieu.

B.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Rents.—This is a subject of great importance to almost every member of the community. The relations of landlord and tenant are every where felt; and by some, as a burthen of no ordinary weight. Perhaps nothing shows more impressively the dispositions and propensities of people, than the power often exercised by landlords over tenants. The avaricious workings are sometimes so predominant as to be really appalling; and it is doubtful if there is another town or city in the Union, where the general scale of charges is equally heavy and grievous. We hazard nothing in saying, that on a fair average they are full one-third heavier here than in Philadelphia, and with accommodations and conveniences much less desirable and commodious. Not only are the houses in that city ordinarily much better, but their yard-room is as two to one in their favour. Add to this, an unlimited supply of excellent water for all domestic purposes, as well as for cleansing the streets and carrying off all those offensive impurities, which in our city are a never-failing topic of well-founded complaint. Our taxes too, we believe, are nearly double those of Philadelphia. At the same time we are compelled to inhale a tainted and unwholesome atmosphere, which a suppl. of good water would immediately correct, besides relieving us from a long established reproach.

It so happens that buildings situated in those parts of New-York which are adapted to large commercial transactions, command high, and sometimes indeed exorbitant rents. The consequence is, that every person owning real estate, thinks himself justified in levying a similar contribution, no matter where it may be situated. Many have bought property of this description at a price far beyond its intrinsic value; they nevertheless suppose they ought to realize for its use, a full interest for their investment, without at all estimating the ability of a tenant to pay that amount. Not a few have made large purchases at enormous prices, even on calculations of safety. Men of this class ought to bear in mind, that if they choose to give two prices for an article, it does not follow that they have a right to tax a tenant accordingly, and compel him to pay twice as much for its use as it is fairly worth.

There is another point of view in which we think landlords too often commit very serious errors. They do not make sufficient difference between a tenant who has the ability and the disposition to meet his engagements punctually and honestly, and the man of doubtful pretensions and means. The distinction ought to be a wide one; and the man of true wisdom will be careful to make that distinction.

Were a little more attention paid to this rule, householders would find more fidelity and less trouble than they now experience, beside the disadvantage arising from the frequent change of tenants, and the consequent injury to the tenements. The fair criterion for estimating real estate we think should be this: what sum can a tenant afford to pay for the use of premises, and fulfil his contract faithfully? Property in houses without good tenants is merely nominal, and may not unaptly be compared to the useless gold found by Crusoe in his uninhabited island.

There is one other custom by which a dishonest landlord frequently succeeds in defrauding a tenant. After having occupied the premises a year, at a stipulated rent, and one which he deems quite equal to his pecuniary ability, the latter finds himself subject to an additional demand of twenty-five or fifty dollars, to which extortion he is either compelled to submit, or else incur the trouble, expense, and inconvenience of moving, which family sickness or business considerations may render almost impossible; and yet the law runs strongly in favour of the landlord; and among the general provisions applicable to voluntary assignments by a debtor imprisoned in execution in civil causes, the statute declares the right of any landlord to distrain for the last year's rent upon any property of the insolvent vested in trustees under the title above alluded to.

We believe also that it is a custom confined to the city of New-York for a landlord to demand security for rent. Is it because he is a wealthy man that he is invested with peculiar privileges to collect his debts? The tailor, the grocer, the shoemaker, the butcher, and the baker are all frequently compelled to allow long credit, and sometimes consequently suffer heavy losses in the ordinary course of business transactions; and it is certainly more consonant to both reason and justice, that they who voluntarily, and for certain anticipated profitable results to themselves, have entered into similar engagements, should bear the evil as well as the advantage accruing therefrom, than that a third person, entirely disinterested, should endure the whole risk of a transaction from which he cannot realize any possible benefit. We do not mean to impugn the reasonableness of the existing laws between landlord and tenant, but only to hope that since law and custom unite in entrenching the former behind stronger barriers against loss than those allowed to other classes of society, they may acknowledge the impropriety of abusing their power. Our remarks are not applicable to the majority of respectable men who hold real property in the city, but to those few whose manoeuvres to extort by unfair means a paltry increase of rent from good tenants, have accidentally come under our observation.

Zoological Museum.—One of the letters of our London correspondent, published a few weeks since in the Mirror, contained an interesting account of the gardens prepared by the Zoological society of that city. We find that Mr. W. I. Harrington is exerting himself to establish here an exhibition of the same kind. He has formed a plan, on a large and extensive scale, of a zoological museum of living natural history. The great and increasing population of New-York, and the number of strangers continually passing through the city, can scarcely fail of insuring a successful result to his undertaking. It is true, that exhibitions of wild beasts, as they have hitherto been conducted by the wandering and ignorant masters of menageries, have been but little patronized by the better classes of the community, and the persuasive eloquence of the man with a fiddle at the door, "walk in, ladies and gentlemen, and see the lion—only one shilling!" has not been as successful as the stockholders in the business could have wished; but the reasons of their failure are too obvious to need much illustration. The fierce paintings exhibited at these haunts, are generally wilful slanders upon the patient and jaded beasts within. A wretch of a lion, most wofully inclined to tired nature's sweet restorer—a filthy ostrich—a wild cat, and a racoon—with an assemblage of monkeys, practising all the graces peculiar to that grave and elegant class of individuals; these and similar wonders were all the allurements which the unhappy tribe of zoological philosophers could hold forth, to entice unwary passengers into the most loathsome places. And since the Italian opera, and the production of Cinderella, even the Orpheus at the door wastes the sweetness of his broken fiddle upon the desert air.

But a zoological museum, located here, under the superintendence of scientific men, would indeed be an ornamental addition to the city, and in the course of time might grow to be not only a source of entertainment, but a very interesting auxiliary to the painter, and a valuable field of instruction to the youthful part of our citizens. Every admirer of nature must be interested in a plan which has for its object to rear within the limits of the city, an extensive collection of those wonders of animated nature which poetry and history have associated with the most distant climes. For ourselves, even in the petty displays of this kind which accident has hitherto placed within our reach, we have found an interest; and Mr. Harrington's scheme has already been so far successful, as to offer strong inducements to the intelligent observer. His museum contains many rare specimens of birds and beasts. No important progress, however, can be effected in his enterprise without the general co-operation of the public, which will doubtless be awarded as soon as the elevated nature of his exhibition, and its connection with a permanent plan, become generally understood.

Black Stocks.—As this seems clearly marked out by destiny as an age of revolution, reformation, eclipses, snow-storms, and other wonders, we deem it an imperative duty to venture a glance at the great innovation in the fashionable world which has lately taken place in the mode and character of the cravat. The time was when a well-bred gentleman of the Pelham-school would as soon think of jumping down the crater of a volcano as appearing at a party in a black stock. He would have sunk beneath the frowns of the Venuses, Hebes, and Junos, who adorn the drawing-rooms of the affluent in this wonderful republic; and doubtless at the next jam would have been found among the missing. The late king of England, however, the most polished gentleman in the kingdom, once appeared in public with a black stock, and such unquestionable authority was sufficient with all the little elegant Pelhams and Beau Brummels in both continents. His present majesty dispenses with much of the pompous ceremonials of royalty; and, from his early nautical tastes, may one day take it into his head to assume the habiliments dear to his youthful associations. Should that be the case, we may look to see our drawing-rooms thronged with round jackets and other marine decorations. Our young men are, however, much in need of a standard of fashionable right and wrong. They want a leader, to lay down the rules of dressing and acting. Strange that so important a science as fashion has received so little attention. We ought to establish an academy to discuss and settle the questions which agitate the circles of the gay. We might as well, in reply to queries from perplexed correspondents, once for all disclaim all assumption of any superior knowledge upon these matters; and we are, at the same time, bound to confess our ignorance of any tribunal to which their interrogatories may be successfully preferred. "Adonis" begs to be enlightened upon the state of our opinion respecting black stocks. "Mary" insists upon knowing whether she may assume the arm of a gentleman in Broadway without any breach of delicacy and propriety, and without giving the scandalous world any just reason to report her as "engaged;" and "Master Slender" modestly hints that nature has blessed him with undoubted capabilities in the whisker way, and that he cherishes a hope of being able to rear a pair of mustachios which would set criticism at defiance, but declares himself wavering in mind, and much distressed with the great variety of unsatisfactory opinions he has heard expressed upon the subject. In regard to the first, we can only say that the mutability of taste will probably soon render the question unessential, although we, being rather addicted to the refinement of epicureanism, and setting great value on ease and comfort in the little items of life, should bid farewell with regret to an article so light and neat as the one under consideration, especially if, as would probably be the case, something unnatural, cumbrous, and troublesome should be substituted. To Mary, sub rosa, we would whisper, especially if she be an engaging girl, with a low and silvery voice, and a pair of speaking blue eyes, "take our arm," and let the world say what they please. As far as delicacy is concerned, we despise such mawkish, sickly sensitiveness, and pity the young and fair whom prudish affectation and unnatural romance have rendered its victims. No one more than ourselves admires the genuine modesty of woman. It is the halo of her brow. It is the fairy wand in her hand. It is the spell and the glory before which the knee bends and the heart thrills, but it never discloses itself in selfish ceremonies and awkward refinements. It does not shrink from the green earth and clustering flowers that glow around the path of youth, beauty, and happiness, as if it shunned to arouse the serpent at every tread; but it wanders carelessly on, and its unconscious confidence is its ornament and its shield. These hair-drawn distinctions are unnatural and ridiculous. Neither are they who invent them, and attempt to put them in operation, the most innocent in thought or the purest in principle. An individual, enough of a gentleman to walk with a lady in the street, or to take her hand in the dance, is sufficiently so to sustain her arm, that he may afford her such attentions as manly strength has ever offered to the sex. No English lady would dream of rejecting similar assistance; on the contrary, she would rather deem it a piece of rudeness in a gentleman to refrain from proffering it. And, if we must ape the manners of other nations, let us select those founded on reason, and leave the black stock to struggle by itself up to its proper level, unaided by the royal hand.

As for "Master Slender" and his whiskers and mustachios, notwithstanding the letter upon that subject in a previous page, we say, wear them by all means. They must melt the hearts of every fair admirer of the beauties of nature. Their general adoption would be an incalculable saving of expense and trouble. And what is all our palaver of the freedom of the people about, if a man cannot make a bear of himself just when he pleases? What a solemn and dignified assemblage the young whipper-snappers, who skip and frik about theatres, ball-rooms, and soirees, would make, each ornamented with a full-grown beard, like the fathers of lofty Rome. We observe the distinguished African tragedian has offered a public example, which certainly no young gentleman, with the slightest claims to distinction, can refuse to adopt.

Philadelphia Gazette.—This is one of the oldest and best papers in the city of Philadelphia, and will lose nothing of its value from the fact that it is at present under the sole editorial superintendence of Willis Gaylord Clark, Esq. We are glad to find so fine a writer and so finished a gentleman occupying a station worthy of his talents. Such individuals as he cannot but add respectability to the press. He has for several years been one of the contributors to the Mirror. His effusions have been circulated far and wide, and won the commendation of both foreign and domestic journals. It would be strange indeed if the Gazette did not assume a high rank under his auspices, and we shall hereafter look to its pages with increased interest.

Madame Malibran.—We find the following in the London Globe; but, as we know nothing about the matter, we refrain from comment: "A fracas has recently occurred in Paris, which has created a sensation in that metropolis, and deprived the Parisians for the present of the vocal talents of their great favourite, Madame Malibran. The husband of this lady has recently arrived from America, and made a demand to participate in the produce of his wife's talents. The lady indignantly refused to comply with his wishes, and what is vulgarly called a regular row took place between the parties at the theatre. The subject is now before the courts of law, and, until it is settled, Madame Malibran declines appearing in public."

The streets.—The dangerous and almost impassable state of many of the streets should be taken into consideration by the common council. Piles of snow and ice, in some places, block up the way; and, after the first period of warm weather, unless some precautionary movements are made, we shall probably be favoured with a supply of water sufficient to satisfy the most hypercritical upon that subject. Accidents are also continually occurring, horses falling, and carts and carriages settling quietly in the holes, chasms, &c. with which the roads are laid out in a very fanciful manner. Would it not be possible to employ a few of the able-bodied labourers who are lounging idly about for want of work, to clear them away for the benefit of the public? Perhaps, should some member of the corporation find his carriage overturned, and his own valuable neck broken, the survivors might proceed to inquire whether the evil might be remedied.

WE MET.

FROM THE SONGS OF THE BOUDOIR—SUNG BY MRS. AUSTIN—WRITTEN AND COMPOSED BY THOMAS H. BAYLEY.

In the course of our remarks, in a previous number, upon the success which has attended the lyrical poetry of Bayley and Moore, as opposed to similar attempts of Scott and Byron, we attributed the cause to the knowledge of musical pronunciation on the part of the two former. The perusal of every fresh publication, of which Bayley is the author, confirms this opinion, and its truth is rendered strongly apparent by the following beautiful ballad. Let the most fastidious admirer of the soft Italian language examine each syllable, and confess that Bayley has not only expressed himself in exquisite poetry, but has selected the best musical sounds which our extensive, but occasionally rough language, affords. Although the modulation speaks no extraordinary musical research, yet there is no reason to believe it may not be displayed in future efforts; and the regularity and tenderness of the melody, and the admirable clearness with which the sentiment is conveyed, prove his marked talents as a composer. This class of lyrical productions, more than any other, is sure of being generally understood and felt. From the excitement occasioned by the complicated skill and magnificent energy of Rossini or Weber, the mind will find both relief and pleasure in the quiet charm of such compositions; and, without any infringement of good taste, may enjoy the melodious simplicity of which they are the essence.

SECOND VERSE.

And once again we met, and a fair girl was near him,
He smil'd and whisper'd low, as I once used to hear him;
She leant upon his arm, once 'twas mine and mine only;
I wept, for I deserved to feel wretched and lonely.
And she will be his bride!—at the altar, he'll give her
The love that was too pure, for a heartless deceiver;
The world may think me gay, for my feelings I smother,
Oh! thou hast been the cause of this anguish, my mother

SCRAPS FROM MY COMMON-PLACE BOOK.

NUMBER IV.

ERROR.—People that are sincere in their errors may be set right; but I know of no means of convincing those who only affect to be wrong, except giving them offices.

ELVES AND GOBLINS.—There is somewhere a tradition that elves and goblins had their origin in the factions of the Guelphs and ghibellines, corrupted into elves and goblins.

RELIGION.—Religion ought to be left in her native simplicity, rather than hang her ears with counterfeit pearls.

A PHILANTHROPIST.—A busy body, who is always meddling in the affairs of other people and neglecting his own.

A BLOCKHEAD.—A fellow perplexed by reading a multitude of books.

TWO EVILS.—Heaven defend me from the activity of a busybody, or the energies of a blockhead.

DETHRONED KINGS.—Firebrand smoke most when out of the chimney, so kings, out of place, are apt to be very troublesome.

ACTIVE MEN.—Active men are like millstones in motion, which, if they have no grist to grind, will set one another on fire.

POPE JOAN.

Jenious, a thousand times I swore
My Joan I never would see more.
"Pshaw!" cried the jade, all doubts at end,
"Come, kiss my cheek and be my friend."
"I can't," said I: "I have an oath,
To break it would condemn us both."
Whispered the jade in silvery tone:
"Come, I'll absolve thee, I'm Pope Joan."

TIME.

Of time the fell consumer! Time the god!
Before whose tread things animate do bend—
And things inanimate, beneath whose rod
Do crumble and decay. Of time the friend;
Whose balsam doth the broken spirit mend.
Of time the enemy; whose fleet decrees,
Like "winged messengers" of death, do send Destruction in their course, while youthful ease
Gives way to age's pangs and mortified disease.

Rome, pride of worlds! vast city! where art thou?
Where are thy lofty palaces and towers?
Thy patriarchs and kings, where are they now?
Where are thy gardens, garlanded with flowers,
Thy marble fountains, and thine orange bowers?
Where are thy temples now? and where the hand
That rear'd their mighty structures? where the powers
That held submissive nations at command?
Alas! decay's wide arm enfolds thy fated land.
And ruin, standing on the desert mound,
Where erst thy proudest pinnacles uprose,
Points o'er the dreary stones that line the ground,
O'er mould'ring tombs, wherein have sought repose
Thy mighty ones, and where the ivy grows;
O'er crumbling sculptures thy vain glory thought
Would outlive time, now emblems of thy woes!
Thus she surveys the scene with relics fraught,
And laughs to scorn the deeds that she alone has wrought.

Thy Pantheon, honour'd by the sculptured bust
Of many a form that did thy glory please,
Yet holds its mighty fabric from the gust
Of withering time, whose dread sirocco breathes
O'er all around, nor shall a part appease
Its searching blast. The Pantheon's towering wall
It has struck lightly as a summer breeze;
But yet beneath its breath this ancient hall
Shall drop with thund'ring crash! 'Tis thus the mighty fall!

Time here, where classic Rome in grandeur lay,
Has left deep-printed his undying trace,
His ev'ry work is hast'ning to decay:
The raven croaks where once in kingly grace
Her consuls view'd the combat or the race:
Alike have felt, cottage and towering dome,
'Time's with'ring wand, that touches to deface:
Each stone and spire doth crumble to its doom;
And all alike by time are marshal'd to the tomb.

If such are marks of time's dread tracery,
If rocks do crumble 'neath his mighty shock,
If proudest towers do bow to his decree,
And things inanimate, or stone or stock,
Do each and all their gates of strength unlock,
As time, bald reaper of the harvest field,
Sweeps his keen scythe, all human strength to mock.
Shall man alone be as a fountain seal'd?
Shall man not bow his head when all around him yield?
Not surer to the earth the spears of grain,
That in their golden ripeness kiss the breeze,
'That floats from autumn skies across the plain;
Not surer fall the girdled forest-trees,
That wait the woodman's axe. The angry seas
That are uplifted by the driving blast,
Fall not more surely to their waveless ease,
'Than man—the lord of earth—creation's last
And worthiest work, shall fall—he number'd with the past.

From infancy to youth, from youth to age,
From age to death, from toothless childhood on
To toothless, sightless years. Through ev'ry stage,
From the bright cheek to visage pale and wan,
From the first lesson that we early can
To the last lesson that the dying read,
Time writes his characters of woe upon
This outward form, this carcass, form'd for bread
For slimy worms and toads, the umpires of the dead!

The monarchs of the grave! the crawling gnomes,
That feast and fatten on our noble clay,
Heroes and princes, lords of lordly domes,
Rulers and kings! the mighty of a day—
Feast they on earth, and flaunt in bright array?
'Tis well—for soon beside the common boor
In common earth their glories they must lay;
And the green worm, alike on rich and poor,
Will fatten bravely there—there play the epicure.

Oh time! thou silent searcher of the heart!
To thee the task to ope the hidden soul,
To show its workings and divulge its art,

Before thee plain and palpable doth roll
Of deep designs, and treacherous thoughts the whole.
The trembling air that shakes beneath thy wings
Blows destiny right onward to its goal;
And from the heart its hidden secret wrings,
And brings to light and shame sin's foul imaginings.

Long in the secret soul of vicious man
May fond concealment lurk, in thought secure;
Long may the heart its hidden projects plan,
To compass wisdom—with deceit to lure
The unconscious soul, and in its toils immerse
Its thoughtless prey. With visage sanctified,
With hands uplifted, and in walk demure;
Long may hypocrisy its blackness hide,
But time at last unlocks, and opens its charnel wide.

Mantling in ruby blushes, the young blood
Steals o'er the face of virgin beauty fair,
While hope adds richness to the mounting flood,
That flows beneath no wrinkle that dull care,
Prelude of woe, at last entrenches there.
How clear and sparkling those round orbs of sight!
How fresh the cheek! and far beyond compare
The cherry ripeness of those lips! How bright!
The smile, the merry laugh—how jocund, free and light!

Shall time respect these charms and wing away
His wintry flight, nor leave his impress here?
On forms less lovely work his sad decay?
To those whose days have fallen in the sere,
Will he not rather in his course draw near?
Not so. The joyous sparkle of those eyes,
Those charms of youth, but make the victim dear.
The grace of beauty, that around it lies
Like wine and fragrant oil, enhance the sacrifice.

POPULAR TALES.

EASTERN STORY-TELLERS.

THE pleasure with which the Orientalists listen to their story-tellers is inexhaustible: the repetition of the same practice day after day does not weary their patience, or abate in the smallest degree the interest they feel. This is probably one of the most primitive and ancient amusements in the world: even in the patriarchal days of the Old Testament, the love of oral narratives, in which instruction was blended with imagination, prevailed among the Jews and other eastern people. The Arabs, when halting at eve on their endless sands, delight to form a group and call on one of their companions to tell a tale, either of his own invention or from one of their celebrated poets. To a Turk, the inaction as well as routine of his life, that knows little change or excitement, render this luxury peculiarly welcome: he can command it at all times and seasons; and can pass from the bosom of his family to the favourite haunt of the story-teller in a few moments. Whether the rain falls heavily, or the snows cover the narrow streets, he wraps his robe closely about him and hastens there. It is a relief to him to listen to an ideal picture of strong affection and domestic felicity: even the man who just before, perhaps, imbrued his sabre in the blood of a Greek, will melt with sorrow at the perils and distresses of the hero of the story. As there are no public amusements in the east—no theatres, balls, or drinking parties—they repair to the scene of this loved amusement with the same feelings as the idle and luxurious in our own land take up a new and stimulating novel, or go to see a favourite actor. Old men, whose white beards hang on their breasts, and whose features prove that they have felt the real evils and trials of life, are seen to devour these fictitious narrations with as much eagerness as the youth who sits beside them. The dervise, too, is there; his wild eyes fixed on the narrator, his whole soul absorbed in the tale, after he has spent the day in absorbing the feelings of others with his own wild illusions, and drawing crowds about him with his revelations and lies. The hadg6, also, just come from Mecca, after his painful pilgrimage that has purged away the sins of his soul, and thrown a sacredness about his person even to the end of life, comes here to yield himself to the beautiful fictions of some wandering Arab, and forget the howling desert he has traversed, as well as his distant home to which he is bound.

In Damascus some of the best reciters are to be found, and the peculiar luxury and situation of its coffee-houses aid very much the effect of their narrations. In Cairo, the want of water, the burning heat, and the dry, gloomy, and dusty streets, are great foes to the imagination, as well as the desert that spreads on every side. In Constantinople the beauty of the external scenery cannot be surpassed—the river and its enchanting shores; but the scantiness of water in the interior of the city decreases very much the luxuries of its people, who love, beyond every thing, the sight and sound of falling water in their apartments. In the capital of Syria, almost all the coffee-houses have splendid fountains, that are thrown up, some of them, to the height of six or seven feet; and it is delightful to recline on one of the soft seats near them, and listen to the ceaseless rush and fall, while the very sight of them, in so hot a clime, is like the face of a friend. The abundance of water, from the five streams that flow around the city, is incredible. The Assyrians might well complain, in their inroads into the promised land, of the scarcity of its rivers, and boast that there was nothing like their own Abana and Pharpar. In some of these houses of recreation, whose latticed windows, thrown open, admit the air, the wealthier people form dinner parties, of men only: seated in a circle on the carpet, with the various dishes on low tables before them, they eat slowly and carelessly, conversing at intervals, without any of the goit or joviality that wine inspires. Every good private dwelling in Damascus has its fountain, and this is invariably in the best apartment; it being a luxury, or rather a necessity, that few inhabitants care to do without: an Englishman would as soon live in an uncarpeted house. And round the marble basin, or in the divan just beyond it, the host at evening receives his friends; and they sit, and smoke, and calmly converse the hours away: this is the time when the wealthier families sometimes send for a celebrated story-teller to amuse the party, and when the latter knows he is to be handsomely paid, it is a more recherché opportunity than the public companies afford.

It is the sultry hour of noon, perhaps, when the burning rays are on 'be water, the trees, and green banks that surround the scene of indolence and indulgence; the light roof supported by the slender pillars casts a shade on the peopled floor, on which the well and variously dressed Turks recline, some in small wickered chairs, others on long and softer benches, covered and backed with carpets and cushions. These seats are placed close to the river's edge, and earth has nothing more luxurious than to sit here, in the cool of the day, or in the still hour of night, and listen to the rush of the waters, and gaze on the gleaming of the cataract; then put the amber-tipped and scented pipe to the lips, or turn to the throng of many nations around, all silently enjoying the hour.

It is sweet to such a people to have their feelings violently excited; to have the monotony of their thoughts thus broken wildly, by the vivid descriptions of the speaker. It is a pleasure so easily enjoyed also; the head need not be raised from its recumbent position, nor the eye turned from the faint twilight falling on the foaming river, nor the hand moved from its gentle grasp on the chibouque. The favourite story-teller watches his moment, and comes forward into the middle of the floor and raises his hand; the lips of the Damascene, the Cairene, the Arab, and the Persian, that were before busy, perhaps, conversing on the few themes that occupy an Oriental mind, are instantly hushed. The hands of those whose faces are turned towards the speaker are laid significantly on their flowing beards, or count their beads with unconscious and mechanical motion. The waiters, who replenish continually the often-drained coffee cups, tread stealthily over the floor. If a guest enters, his eye detects instantly the nature of the scene, and he walks with quick step to the nearest vacant seat, and signs mutely to the attendant to bring him the refreshments he desires.

Amidst the sound of the falling waters, the voice of the story-teller alone is heard; and each tone falls as distinct and clear as that of the angel who shall proclaim, at the day of account, the sins of the people. It is beautiful to see a proud and half barbarous people thus chained by the power of imagination; listening with the earnestness and simplicity of children to the fictitious narration, and melted at the tenderness of some of the passages, or their dark eyes kindling at the powerful painting of others.

The best tale that I heard was narrated by an Arab, who had the reputation of being one of the chief in the city. The Arabs, from the liveliness of their imagination and quickness of invention, in general excel in this profession, and gain a handsome living by their talents. At every pause he made in his story, which was about once in ten minutes, an interpreter repeated faithfully what he had said; and though it may not be one of the most powerful of their tales, it appeared to me one of the most useful: it was accompanied by graceful and rapid gestures:

In a small town on the coast of Syria, that stood far apart from other towns and cities, lived a silk weaver. He had for many years been a contented and cheerful man, living with his wife and three children in great comfort; for Allah, who saw the simplicity of his heart, blessed his labours; and he, too, gave praise to the highest, and had health and peace, and those of his household loved him. But it came to pass, that one morning, as he was seated at work at his window that looked out on the sea, the love of riches entered into his heart, and then its happiness passed away like a dream. He fixed his eyes on the vessels that were passing onwards, near to where he sat, and for a long time did not cast them down again on the web of silk that he held, which dropped from his hand to the ground.

"They go," said he to himself, "they go, each to its own distant land, loaded with wealth that make families happy; or in search of rich and costly things. Oh, that one of these barks was bound for the poor home of Comrou, the silk weaver!" And so much was he moved, that the tears fell from his eyes; and his wife saw it, and said, "Why weepest thou, my soul?—what is come to thee this day?" And he said after a while, with a confused air, for he was yet ashamed of thoughts so disturbed. "I would fain see thee, my love, dressed in rich apparel, and our children also clothed like those of the merchant Taleh, where I buy our silk."

"Son of the weaver Mashil! art thou mad?" exclaimed the astonished woman, as she picked up the silk web from the ground: "pursue thy work; for such wild desires will only lead to poverty and want;" and with that she threw it towards him. He looked at her vexed and angrily, and, for the first time, thought that her face was not comely, nor her form beautiful.

When the sun rose again, he went to his work as usual; but the thoughts of his heart were like the waters that rushed loudly past his dwelling, and envy and hatred were among them.

His friend and neighbour, the baker, who lived on the other side of the street, was now often the object of his remarks. The latter, who was a devout believer in the prophet, had grown rich by care and industry; his loaves were the best and whitest in the whole town, and all rejoiced when they saw the angel of wealth enter his threshold, and dwell there—all, except the weaver Comrou, who, when he now saw his neighbour in his shop at the dawn of day, cursed him in his heart; and followed him across the street at evening to his own door, with jealous and altered looks.

"Why has Allah," he said, "favoured this man more than me? His stores are full, and his table is plentifully spread, and his friends are sometimes feasted there, while I can only keep the fiend poverty from gnashing his teeth on me." This could not last. The prayers of his youthful wife and children were unavailing to restore peace to his mind. They wept when they looked on his pale face and wasting frame; for the pining after riches is like the hand of disease.

One day, as he was at work in the chamber of his house that stood on the edge of the sea, so strongly was he moved by these consuming thoughts and desires, that in a fit of anger and discontent he broke in pieces the web of silk he held, and rushed out of the house. In the misery of his thoughts he wandered wildly along the shore; at one time looking on the sea, that was now disturbed by a strong wind—then on the numerous dwellings; at last he bent his steps to the port. As the call to prayer from the mosque was heard through the town, he quickened his steps, for the voice of the holy man seemed to pursue him, and the crowds of the faithful he met to accuse him. He saw a vessel preparing to leave the port and hastened on board, and took passage for the land to which she was bound without heeding where it might be. The vessel sailed all night, and the following day and night, for the wind was strong; and when the second morning dawned they saw the shore before them. Sick and weary of the voyage, the weaver implored to be set on shore, even in a strange land, rather than sail any farther; his request was granted, and in a short time a boat conveyed him to the beach.

He gazed sadly around, for the place was a desert; and he knew not where to lay his head when the day should have passed away. To remain where he stood, however, was what he dared not do; so he slowly bent his steps into the interior; but far as his eye could reach, no habitation was to be seen—neither tent, nor khan, nor hamlet.

There was a high mountain before him, and he hastened to ascend it; on reaching the summit, to his infinite joy, he saw a clear and beautiful pool of water, for he was nearly dead with thirst and weariness. Looking eagerly around he espied a small stone drinking vessel, of curious form, lying useless by the side of the pool; he filled it to the brim and raised it to his lips. What was his astonishment, as he drank, to hear the sound of money rattling in his vest! He tore it open! Oh, what was his rapture to find it filled with gold chequins! Again he filled the stone vessel, and drank deep; again he heard the delicious sound and saw the gleam of the gold, dearer than the light of the eyes of his youngest born. He seized them and pressed them to his soul, convinced that he had thus found a source of endless riches, for as often as he drank, so often the money came with the draught. He stood motionless by the side of the lonely pool, and lifted up his eyes and blessed Allah aloud for his mercy, that he had regard to the desire of his soul.

It was now time to depart, for the sun was going down on land and sea—on the plain, the groves of palm, and the scattered dwellings beneath; he looked down on them no longer with envy, but exultation. The last rays were cast on a city that was not far distant, and thither he bent his steps, first placing next his heart the goblet, and tying his sash tightly over it. He soon entered the streets of the city, made his way to the public khan and hired a chamber for the night in the upper story. In the area beneath, above which rose the large and lofty dome that lighted the whole, he saw piles of merchandise lying on every side, from all parts of the east, and their owners seated carelessly beside them, conversing and taking refreshment. Such stores of wealth he had never seen till now. He joined the numerous company, and while they stared at the meanly dressed stranger, he lifted up his eyes with a look of calmness and forgiveness, for his heart was full of light and joy.

He purchased a house and hired servants in that city, and bought horses of the purest blood of Yemen; and in the close of the day he loved to walk in his garden; and afterwards, fair slaves waited on him, for he thought no more of his humble and beautiful wife and sweet children. It was pleasant, in the heat of the day, to sit beside the fountain while the loveliest women danced before him and delighted his ear with music. O Allah! what had thy paradise more than this man possessed?

The waters of Abouali flow not faster than wealth flowed into the bosom of the proud man. The great of the city looked on his state with desire and envy, and sat down at his banquets and poured flatteries into his ear; their daughters listened to the praise of his magnificence, and said, "this stranger will be a fit husband for us." But in the town on the sea shore, the widow and her children did not cease to mourn and to say, "Axrael has taken from us the light of our eyes!" And their friends also sorrowed with them.

So it happened—for nothing in this world should astonish us—that the baker, who lived on the other side of the street, was seized also with the thirst of riches. His trade was gainful, and the sun-rise and set still found him at the mouth of his oven, smilingly serving his customers, praising his bustling wife, who was ever at his side, and a joke or a gibe on his lips. But now this slow gathering of wealth no longer satisfied him; he prayed to Allah that he would increase it more rapidly.

One day he felt something hard in his hand, and on looking closer found it was a gold mahmoudie. He put it on the shelf, and wanting some meat for dinner, went to the butcher's, purchased some and received the change: what was his surprise to find the mahmoudie once more in his vest on his return! Again and again he changed it, and still he found that it ever multiplied itself, and would be to him a source of slow but never-ending affluence. He concealed his emotions even from the wife of his bosom; and though he followed his business as usual, it was evident to all that his views were elevated beyond it; his carriage was more constrained, and his words and smiles, that used to fall like the dew on the herb, were now few and cold. His secret was like a stifled fire within him; his sleep went from him by night, or if it came, was filled with tempting and glorious visions. He longed to seek a scene where he could prove these pleasures and make a better use of the gift of heaven than he could possibly do in his small native town, among neighbours who had known him from infancy, and among whom any sudden change of condition would be suspected and ridiculed. He took his resolution, and going one night to the port, without a parting word to wife or friend, took passage on board a vessel that sailed quickly after. It so happened that this bark was bound to the same port as the one in which the weaver sailed.

After a few days the baker found his way to the same city; and he too, after a time, purchased a house and garden. Oh, how sweet to his soul was the first taste of riches! like that of the fountain of life to the lips of Sadak, when he drank thereof, and knew that all his toils were repaid. The sun called him no more to his daily labour, to prepare bread and cakes for the faithful, to endure extreme heat and look on the flame; pleasure only broke on his slumbers; strange women also came, whose looks and words were like those of the houris. Then he rose and sat in the cool of his apartment, where the fountain fell with a ceaseless murmur, and slaves knelt before him and offered luxuries to his taste. The mouth of his oven no more waited for him—the smoke and heat, the clash of gabbling tongues around—the complaints and reproaches of those whose pies were burned or neglected: he turned disgusted from the remembrance, and bade his slave bring odours and fill his goblet to the brim.

One day he went to the chief coffee-house in the city, and sat down beside the stream on whose bank it stood; it was sweet to gaze on its rapid movement as it swept foaming on. "So pass away for ever from me poverty and toil!" he said. "Instead of baking for the souls of the faithful, I will now eat the fruits of their hands; they shall minister to me." At this moment a movement was heard in the place, the people who were near him gave way, and a richly dressed man entered, attended by many slaves; he sat down, looked with a princely air around him, and addressed himself to the baker, who was much flattered by this attention. Ere long, however, looking attentively, in spite of the dyed and perfumed beard that fell, black as the raven's wing, on his bosom, he recognised his former neighbour, the silk weaver. The latter, instead of being ashamed, for he perceived the secret was safe between them, smiled graciously on the baker, congratulated him on the change in his appearance; confidence grew as they talked of their former condition, and then they told each other of the cause of their present splendour. The baker's heart fell within him at the detail, and when the other kindly invited him to come and dine with him, he had hardly strength left to reply.

His trembling steps bore him with difficulty to his dwelling; and when he came in and the door was shut, he sat down on the floor and heard the fountain fall, and the music was played before him, but he heeded them not. It was now mid-day, and the fair woman of the city whom he had married came with soft steps and bent over him, and said,

"Come, my husband, will thy soul take no rest?"

He looked sadly at her, and she saw that his features were changed, and pale as her robe, or even as one of his own white loaves that he used to bake at sunrise.

"Of what avail to me," he said at last, "are the gifts of Allah! That wretched weaver, on whom I looked down in our own town as a poor drudge, who gained just enough every day to support his wife and children, is now as the princes of the earth, and riches flow unto him as the waves of the shore, while mine are only as the drops of rain that fall on the sand and are quickly dried up."

She threw her arms around the wretched man, and her rich tresses fell on his neck, and she strove to comfort him—but it might not be: he could not hide from himself that the stone goblet of the weaver gave him a shower of wealth at one draught, whereas his mahmoudie, however often it was changed, could only multiply itself—and this slowly, lingeringly!

"O how slow!" he said; "death will come ere I am rich—my poor, miserable mahmoudie!"

When evening came, he dressed himself to go and take the repast with his friend. On entering his house, its splendour astonished him; the sun had set, and many lights, thrown from gold and silver lamps, made the chambers seem like the day; he was received by the owner, seated on a rich divan, who pressed his hand with a pleasant smile; and soon after they sat down to the banquet that consisted of all manner of luxuries. The conversation at first turned on past times.

"I find," said the baker, as he drained a cup of Shiras, "that amidst many good things the bread of this place is not good; the loaves are not to be compared to my own for lightness, and colour like that of the snow on the top of Gebel Sketch."

"Your words, baker," said his host, "are those of truth; your loaves were fit for the lips of the prophet himself, even in paradise; and for the silk, what think you of the work and texture of the robe I wear?"

"What you say, weaver," replied his guest, fixing his eyes on the splendid robe, and then glancing at his own plainer one, "cannot be gainsaid. O, Allah! Allah!" he said, in a piercing tone, lifting his eyes to the roof, while his hand still clenched the glass; "why didst thou give the stone goblet to this man, and grant me only the poor mahmoudie?"

"My friend," replied the other, kindly, "be not unhappy; all are not the favourites of the highest; may-be thou hast never seen the precious goblet," drawing it forth from his vest; "handle it tenderly; it is not to be touched by every vile or common hand, like a mahmoudie."

The baker took it and pressed it hard in his grasp. "O my head, my eyes, my soul!" he said; "blessed source of eternal wealth!" Then changing his tone, "and yet how frail and brittle!—was I to dash it against this marble pavement, thy riches, weaver, are gone for ever." The latter uttered a loud cry, and sprung to seize the cup; his guest broke into a disdainful laugh; "take it, take it, slowly and carefully; did I not say how perishable and uncertain was thy treasure? a blow, an accident may destroy it. Thy wealth, O weaver, hangs on a hair! whereas mine"—and he drew forth his mahmoudie, and dashed it violently on the floor—"see," he said, "it is still the same; violence cannot hurt or change it; it is sure—it is unchangeable."

"Besotted man!" said the other, replacing anxiously the stone goblet within his bosom, "wilt thou compare that wretched solitary coin to my glorious gift? Ay, clasp it closely, 'tis thy only friend! behold, I will put thee to confusion." So saying, he filled the stone cup to the brim with the rich wine of Shiraz, and drank it to the bottom; then taking a handful of the coins that had fallen in his vest, he threw them towards his guest, saying, "unhappy baker, comfort thy soul!"

The fury of the other kindled, as the lightning flashes along the summit of Ararat. "Base weaver, the son of a weaver! wilt thou set thy foot thus on my neck? Hath not thy heart been lightened to enter my door at eve?—was not thy tone lowly, and were not my words of kindness sweet to thy ear?"

"Behold," said the other calmly, "if thou wouldst again begin thy trade in this city, to help thy poor mahmoudie, my household shall eat no loaves but thine, neither shall my lips taste any other; and I will recommend them also to the great men of the city, my friends."

At these words the other could no longer contain himself. He rose from the divan, and seized him by the throat: "O vile upstart! Allah grant me patience, that I do not slay thee on the spot! Am I not a better man, and of more repute than thou? Is not my name known as the first baker in the land, on whom all men smiled? whereas thou wast not cared for, more than the dog that dieth, save by thy wretched wife and children, whom thou hast forsaken."

"Thou liest," said the weaver, now wholly enraged; and tearing off the other's turban and vest: "I will make thee bare as one of thy own loaves; thy mahmoudie hath made thee mad!" With that their fury and clamour rose to such a pitch, that the whole house was filled therewith; the attendants and slaves strove to part them, but so fast was their grasp on each other's person, that they seemed more like unhappy men moved by the Afrit than those whom the prophet had so blessed with his smile. The gold-flowered robe of rare texture of the weaver hung in tatters, and the baker's face and person were more disordered than by the flames of his own oven in the day of the simoom. It so happened—for the great enemy of men always watches for their downfall—that the cadi of the city, passing by to his own house from an entertainment, heard the tumult, that grew louder every moment, and entering with his officers, demanded the cause of it. It was some time before he could obtain a hearing, or pacify in any way the fury of the rival men; from their unguarded words and mutual upbraidings, he gathered, however, an insight into their history; they were ordered to appear before him in judgment on the following day, in order that he might decide on their quarrel. They came soon after sun-rise, with several attendants: the marks of the strife were erased, as far as was possible, by copious ablutions; their apparel was fresh and tasteful, but that of the weaver much exceeded in splendour; he looked around him with a haughty and confident air. Many eminent men of the city were seated round the cadi, as, with a solemn and severe aspect, he inquired into the cause of their enmity that had thus disturbed the peace of the town and its people. It was in vain that they endeavoured to speak with calmness on the subject; their words quickly became warm; angry glances were exchanged as well as contemptuous gestures; and when the baker told, in bitter agony of soul, of the power of the stone drinking cup, the looks of the cadi were troubled. He opened his heavy eyes wildly, and a strange fire was in them; his very beard was observed to move to and fro, as he desired to behold this strange and marvellous gift; and when the weaver drew it fondly from his breast and held it solemnly in his sight, the hand of the cadi grasped it, as the drowning man catches at a friendly plank. And then he desired to see the mahmoudie of the baker, that he might compare them together, and so decide on their several excellencies to the content of the disputants. When they were both delivered, he gazed on them in long and speechless emotion—his eye was absolutely drunk with pleasure.

"O, true believers!" he said, "there is nothing so delightful in the prophet's eye as peace! It is a lovely thing; and I should sin deeply if I allowed the causes of this strife still to exist, and thereby stir up the ashes of misery, day and night, to the destruction of your souls; therefore I will keep these things, and guard them in care and secrecy."

A sudden gloom and horror fell on the countenances of the two men: they trembled exceedingly: their lips moved in many an effort to speak, but no utterance came forth; for it is a fearful thing to see wealth and splendour passing away from us like a dream; and poverty, like an armed man, waiting for his prey. At last the baker found words: "Return me my mahmoudie, O return it to me, excellent and righteous judge!—so shall Allah bless thee above all men!"

The weaver, whose loss was tenfold greater, cried out with a wild and bitter cry, clenched his hands, and beat his breast, as if words were too small for anguish such as his; then tore his beautifully dyed beard up by the roots. The cadi was blest with a marble heart, as well as an iron hand; for even while he still grasped closely the precious things, he expostulated mildly with the men—pointed out the folly of their grief, as well as the inordinateness of their desires. They then fell on their knees, side by side, and with many and moving prayers, besought him to restore their rightful property: the weaver appealed to some of the great men near, who had feasted at his table; but the scowl of envy and disdain was on their brow. Then growing desperate, they menaced the cadi—declared they would instantly lay their complaint before the sultan, who would see justice done them, and their property restored from the spoiler. The judge in his turn gave way to wrath, or appeared so to do—ordered them instantly to prison—said that in the meantime he would himself denounce them to his master, as dealers in magical arts;—for how could such gifts as the cup and the mahmoudie be possessed otherwise?—and by the koran the punishment of magic was death.

They were instantly conveyed, without pity or sympathy from the beholders, to the prison of the city; and confined in a gloomy and massive chamber, whose dim light came through a grated window; the floor was chill, for it was below the surface of the earth. The remainder of the day was passed in sighs and groans; each in a remote part of the prison vented his grief alone; and when night came, they thought of their rich couches, and of those who shared them; of the silver lamps and many slaves; and they walked to and fro wildly, for the extremity of the change was too great to bear. The light of morn dropped through the bars on their haggard faces, that had not been composed to rest; a hollow and grating sound was heard, and the keeper entered with a loaf of bread and a pitcher of water; being a zealous muselman, he gave his loud blessing on their heads and on the food, and with a solemn glance departed. A convulsive and shuddering laugh broke from the lips of the men; then softer and sweeter tones were heard: they looked, and a face of surpassing beauty was seen at the grated window; it was pale, and tears were on it; but the lips were red, and the eye was like that of one of those who in old times came down to love the children of earth—so full of angel power, blended with the deep passions of our nature. Oh, who has ever proved a strong agony, whether of soul or body, and not felt that the look and the tone of a beautiful woman were life from the dead! The unhappy men thought so, as they gazed with relieved hearts. The baker stretched out his hands wildly, while his very soul seemed to go forth in every glance; it was the wife of his bosom, Aleda, whom he had married in the city, and loved as tenderly as her he had deserted. "Art thou come," he said, "to comfort me, my glory, my treasure?"

"I have heard," she said, in a voice like music, "a confused report of the violence offered to my husband—the lord of my affections; but I know not the cause: they dare not detain you long; you will soon come to your home that is all prepared: my hands have set forth our favourite chamber, for the repast at sunset, when I will expect you."

"I shall come no more to that home," he replied, in a tone of inexpressible emotion; and then he told her, in broken accents, of his utter ruin.

"Mean, sordid, and low-born wretch!" she said; "my slaves, my rich dresses, my chambers of luxury,—are they all to flit from me?" He heard no more: he saw his fate was sealed.

At that moment a fiendish laugh was heard; he started wildly and looked up: there, at the grated window, by the side of Aleda, he beheld Calil, the meretricious beauty who had shared his splendour, and whom he believed to be sincerely devoted to him.

"Is it thou?" she began. "Are the squalid form and lowly aspect those of Comrou, who was like a prince of the earth? O, weaver! who can unfold the web of thy miseries?"

"Forsake me not," he said, in moving accents; "leave me not in my misery! Calil, my wealth was poured into thy bosom! Oh, that I could lay my head there but for a moment!"

"Never—never!" she replied. Then many voices were mingled together, of their slaves, and of some who had feasted at their board. There is nothing like exquisite misery for reconciling quarrels and laying the soul open to itself; the two ancient friends sat stupefied for some moments, tearing their garments and heaping ashes on their heads—then looking eagerly and kindly, threw themselves into each other's arms and wept.

Their enemies as well as lovers were passed away: evening came down on the silent prison; the red and slanting beams fell on the dark, damp walls; and they thought of their homes—how the sun went down in glory and peace on the wave and shore.

"O holy prophet!" exclaimed the weaver, "give me to behold once more the face of my wife and children! Baker—she was a lovely and a loving woman. My dear children, how I have deserted you!"

"Comrou, my friend," said the other, "could I but eat at this moment of one of the white loaves of my oven, it would nourish my famishing soul!"

"Even as manna," said the latter with a sigh. "My splendid robe, thou seest, is rent in twain; hast thou not worn a robe of my weaving? how my heart swelled with pride, as I heard the people admire as thou didst pass along!"

"And my faithful wife beheld it with pride," said his friend. "Comrou, I dreamt last night I was once more in my shop; it was filled with people, all waiting anxiously, and with hungry looks; and they asked one of another—where is Alib our baker? My wife stood weeping beside the oven—the wife of my youth; the flames crackled—O Allah, restore me to my home, and I will bless the hand that has humbled me!"

"Blessed be that hand!" said Comrou, in a solemn tone; we pined for riches, till our soul and body fainted with the desire:—He gave them to our prayer. Baker, did not a curse come with them? these gloomy walls and bars—these ministers of cruelty; and then, the dreadful end that hangs over us, should the cadi prevail! My wife! shall I never see you again? Azrael, the angel of death, is nigh; already I hear the rushing of his wings. The night that I fled, like a traitor, my youngest born lay on its mother's bosom; her dark and beautiful eye was lifted to the father, and then to the sleeping one; and her lips were murmuring blessings. Curse me not, forsaken one!" he added, in an agony of remorse, "curse me not, my child!"

At that moment the door of the place opened, and the cadi stood before them; a soldier with a drawn cimeter was on each side. He came—he said gloomily, and by the lamp-light they saw death in his face—he came to tell them of the mandate received from the sultan, that if they had practised magic they should die. It was clear, he said, that they had done this; but he would have mercy; therefore they might go forth from prison, and make their way to the nearest sea-port, where a vessel waited to bear them to their distant homes.

A cry of joy was the return for these words. They made no delay, no hesitation, even for a moment; it was night, yet they hastened forth from their prison walls; with the guard they passed through the streets with a hurried and eager step; travelling many hours, they came to the port, and embarked. At the end of three days, they saw their native hills appearing in view; then the minarets of the town, and the rocks, darkly breasting the wave. Day was declining in extreme beauty on the shore; the gilded top of the mosque gleamed fiercely from afar. As the vessel drew nigh, two forms were seen to stand on the beach—youthful and agitated forms; they stretched out their hands—they called on their names; in a few moments they were folded in the embraces of their wives. They made no reproach or complaint; but led them exultingly to their homes, where their friends were waiting to receive them.

As soon as the mellow broke on the hills around, they rose with a glad and eager heart to pursue their work; and never more did one murmur fall from their lips. Years passed on, and found the men still contented and happy in the lot God had given them; and the thirst of riches entered their hearts no more. Digitized by Google London Amulet.

MR. LISTON.

"Curse that incorrigible face of yours; though you never suffer a smile to mantle it, yet it is a figure of fun for all the rest of the world."

Of all the actors I have ever seen, Kean and Liston appear to me to be the greatest, and to have the least in common with others of their species. Of the two, perhaps Liston is the most original. He is the Hogarth of actors; and, like that great painter, has been more highly than justly appreciated. Not that either have been too highly thought of—"I hold the thing to be impossible"—but the broad, rich humour, which is the distinguishing characteristic of both, has, from its prominence, thrown their minor good properties into the shade. Hogarth, to the qualities peculiarly his own, added the rare merit of being a chaste and skilful colourist, (the most difficult thing to be attained in painting, considering it purely as an art,) and was, moreover—however generally such an opinion may be entertained—not the least of a caricaturist. Neither is Liston, notwithstanding it pleases certain pragmatical persons, who, I humbly apprehend, know nothing about the matter, to assert the contrary. There are now, as in the days of William Shakespeare, those who discountenance all cackinatory movements as unbecoming; regarding gravity as the only outward and visible type of that great inward accumulation of wisdom, which generally lies too deep to be ever discovered. These people think because Mr. Liston occasionally plays coarse and foolish parts in coarse and foolish farces, that Mr. Liston is, consequently, a coarse and foolish fellow, and only fit to amuse the uneducated vulgar; and as "grimace" and "buffoonery" are the two standing words used in abusing comedians, let their faults be what they may, they have not unfrequently been applied to Liston. Now if any one be free from what is meant by these two words, as set down in many dictionaries, it is this actor. The merits of his unparalleled countenance are passive, not active; and distortion would only render that countenance common-place, which in a state of blank repose is intensely ridiculous.

The great merit of Liston is his earnestness. Kean does not appear more earnest in Othello than does Liston at the loss of a pocket-handkerchief, or being overcharged a shilling in a tavern-bill. His whole soul seems to be absorbed in an affair of this kind. He does not bustle about or put himself in a passion in order to make the audience laugh at the ridiculous nature of the circumstances, as other actors do; but all the faculties of the man's mind seem concentrated to endeavour to convince or persuade, as the case may require, solely to save the said shilling, or regain the said handkerchief; and it is the contrast between the disproportion of the exertion employed and the importance of the object to be obtained—like the wars of the Lilliputians and the Blefuscutians—that is so supremely ludicrous. Fools may say that this is merely admirable foolery—it is a great deal more. It is a shrewd satire upon humanity, turning into burlesque the lofty pretensions—the power and knowledge and wit and wisdom of mankind, and presents a stronger and truer picture of the littleness of man and his pursuits than a thousand homilies. Even Heraclitus, could he look at Liston, would laugh to see the "noble reason" and "infinite faculties" of one of the "paragon of animals" utterly prostrated by the loss of an inside place in a stage-coach, and he would indeed exclaim with the poet, though in a very different sense, "what a piece of work is man!" I think I never saw or read a more forcible exemplification of the importance a man's feelings and actions are to himself, and the less than shadow of a shade they are to the rest of the world, than is to be witnessed in a farce where Liston alights from a coach-top, and is followed on to the stage by the driver for the customary gratuity. Those who have travelled in England may have remarked the manner in which the coachmen receive what the traveller may be pleased to give them. While he is getting the money from his pocket, Jehu is all attention; but the moment he has received it, his business is over—he turns upon his heel, and all traces of the giver pass from his mind for ever. Liston detains the coachman, (and you can see in his countenance the vital importance he attaches to what he is about,) in order to draw the distinction and durably impress it upon his mind that his (Liston's) giving him a sixpence was by no means a compulsory measure, but a pure and spontaneous emanation of generosity, or, to use his own phraseology, "hentirely Aoptional." A person standing on the brink of a running stream on a cold day, seriously employed in writing his name in water, would be accounted insane—the attempt to write munificence and generosity on the coachman's mind, is equally futile; yet how many in the world make these and similar efforts who are not accounted crazy, and whose last will and testament stands good in law.

There has been much said about the ugliness of Liston's physiognomy. I do not think it such as can be fairly termed ugly; yet it is a face that a sensitive Grecian or Italian sculptor would faint to look upon—a large mass of inanimate flesh, with only an every-day mouth, a most insignificant nose, both as to size and shape, and a pair of lack-lustre eyes to diversify the blank and extensive prospect. In his portraits of some of the heroes of Cockney-land, he manages to exclude the slightest glimmering of intelligence from his countenance, and at the same time contrives to throw into it an air of conceit and self-satisfaction, which convinces you that he is not only without an idea, but that any attempt to inoculate him with one would be altogether hopeless. His voice is as unique as his face; and the deep sepulchral croak, in which he narrates petty grievances, leaves you no choice whether to laugh or let it alone. There is a farce, entitled "Comfortable Lodgings," in which he enacts the part of a rich and hypochondriacal Englishman, travelling to get clear of an unaccountable melancholy, and to learn to enjoy himself like other people, and describes one of his peculiarities with good effect. In answer to his servant's inquiry of "Lord, sir, why can't you laugh, and do as other people do?" "Laugh!" he exclaims in a tone from the bottom of his chest, and with the bitter emphasis of a misanthrope—"laugh! I cannot laugh! I cannot do as other people do! When I look around me (looking at the pit with a dull stare) I see every one laughing and merry, (a fact,) while my face remains as immovable as a face carved on a brass knocker!" "Do as other people do?" he continues—"I can't do as other people do. Even in the packet-boat, when all the passengers were as passengers who had never been at sea before usually are, I tried to be like them; but I could not! I looked on a disappointed man!" I would not advise any one who has been sea-sick to hear Liston narrate his disappointment in not being so—it might be dangerous, particularly if they exhibit any tendency towards apoplexy. He has not yet played Paul Pry this season—it must be perfectly wonderful, and I would not miss it for anything on the stage.

Incomparable Liston! Thou hast been a benefit and a luxury unto the melancholy inhabitants of this great city for many a day! Thou hast refuted the trite axiom that "money will not purchase pleasure;" for what man in London town, for the last twenty years, who could put his hand into his breeches pocket and find therein three shillings and sixpence, but could say unto himself, "Liston plays—I will hie me unto the theatre and forget my cares—lo! I will laugh!" And if laughing promoteth (as physicians affirm) the healthy action of the biliary organs, from what floods of acrimony and ill-will hast thou cleared the livers of men! Even exquisites, as they looked at thee, have been awakened from their state of graceful torpor, and the corset-laces of fair ladies have been cracked in twain. Thou hast pleased alike the well-judging, the ill-judging, and those who take not the trouble of judging at all. As the Persian saith—"may thy shadow never be less!"

in good time discovered, to my utter dismay, that I had some of the leading symptoms of five or six mortal diseases. As I could not exactly tell which of these I was actually afflicted with, I doctored myself for all of them in turn, until my symptoms changed so frequently, that I at last became utterly confounded in their multiplicity and obscurity.

This was many years ago, when, fortunately for mankind, the honest old "Family Physician" was the only book on this mischievous subject of medicine within the reach of ordinary readers. That I survived this book, I look upon as a greater miracle than physic or physicians ever achieved. I must have had an excellent constitution, for I continued to exist in spite of the "Family Physician," although in beating about the bush to find one disorder, I found another, which answered the purpose quite as well, and a little better. It was like every thing and like nothing. It was a pain, and yet neither I nor anybody else could tell how it felt or where it was domiciliated. Sometimes I thought I had actually detected it in my head, at other times in my breast, and at others in my side. But no sooner had I caught it than it slipped through my fingers, and dodged away in some snug corner, where I could not find it at all. It was like an invisible enemy, always doing one an ill turn, but never exposing himself to retaliation. Sometimes I was really inclined to laugh at myself as a visionary; but unfortunately I happened to read in one of these mischievous books of medicine, that the worst diseases and the most difficult of cure were those which had no decided stationary location, and no distinct character. This discovery made me more unhappy than ever, and I set myself down as incurable. In despair I left off taking medicine, and the consequence was that my malady took an entire new turn. I actually imagined myself well for a time, and might have continued under this happy delusion till this moment, had I not been unluckily tempted to subscribe to three medical journals and guides to health, which the march of mind and the spirit of the age had conjured up for my destruction.

It was from one of these that I first learned the name of the monster that had formerly tormented me, and the nature of the symptoms that indicated his presence. It was dyspepsia! that many-headed, many-visaged tyrant, which indolence, and dissipation, and gluttony have lately engendered amongst them. I was at once certain that I had at last detected mine enemy; for unless some one invents an entire new set of diseases soon, there will not be a malady incident to mortality that may not be included in the symptoms of this multifarious disorder. I had read in some one of these mischievous books of medicine that a malady once discovered is half cured, and felicitated myself on the prospect of a speedy recovery. But I reckoned without my host, or rather without my doctor, one of the editors of one of the journals I have just mentioned, whom I had called in to my assistance, because I thought a man who could so well describe a complaint would certainly be able to cure it without the least difficulty.

But this Proteus of a disease led me and the doctor a famous dance. We went round the whole circle of the seven sciences, and at the conclusion of the journey I found myself very considerably worse than ever. The doctor was at the end of his series, and I of my patience. So we parted in mutual disgust, and I determined to have no more to do with the doctors. Again my imagination played me a trick, and for a while I fancied myself quite well. But again the habit of reading these mischievous books of medicine relieved me from this happy delirium. I lighted on a maxim somewhere to this effect, that the most fatal of all delusions was that of fancying ourselves well, when in fact we were in a very critical situation. I could get no sleep that night, and the next day took to reading the guides to health with all the faith of a saint and all the devotion of a martyr.

But the more I read the more I was confused. "In the multitude of counsellors there is safety," saith the good old book; but even to this there are exceptions. Not one of my oracles agreed as to the most proper mode of preserving health, and to save the trouble of deciding wrong between these conflicting Dodonas, I determined to lump the business and follow them all. This resolution led to a most unexpected result.

In the first place, I read in one of these medical periodicals that water was without doubt the most wholesome beverage in the world. So I drank plenty of water. Then I read in another of these oracles that a moderate quantity of good wine was a very wholesome thing. So I drank a moderate quantity of good wine every day. In a third, I found high-seasoned food and rich sauces denounced, and solid, plain food recommended. So I ate very heartily of solid, plain food. In a fourth, they assured me that high-seasoned dishes and rich sauces, in reasonable quantities, were absolutely necessary to the inward man; as dyspepsia was nothing more than Egrecitque medendo.—Virgil.

GENTLEMEN—As the renowned Don Quixote lost his wits by reading mischievous books of chivalry, so have I lost my health by reading mischievous books of medicine; and as I have survived all hope of being happy in this world, I am come to a determination to be useful, if possible, by holding myself up as an example and a warning to all good people who are in tolerable health and wish to remain so.

Being somewhat of a lazy, lounging disposition, and addicted to brown studies from my youth upwards, I was always subject to occasional lowness of spirits and nervous apprehensions. I sometimes fancied myself very miserable about nothing, and at others believed myself very sick, when, as I have since learned from sad experience of the reality, I only imagined myself so. In short, I was frequently out of order, and never suspected that all my ailments proceeded from two causes alone, namely, the want of some stirring employment to take off my attention from self, and the absence of real causes of misery, to let me into the secret of what constituted substantial calamity.

This propensity to hypochondria by degrees led me to reading medical books, in order to find out, if possible, what ailed me, and the most infallible methods of cure. I dabbled a little at first in an old weather-beaten "Family Physician," and debility of the stomach, which required to be strengthened and invigorated by stimulants and savoury condiments. I never in my life came across more convincing reasoning, so I solaced myself with good high-seasoned food and rich sauces. By St. Abernethy! thought I, but this is fine; one has only to read all the medical journals and eat and drink every thing they recommend, and a man may live like a king. Blessed be the first inventor of guides to health!

But though it was mighty agreeable and satisfactory to conform to the regimen of these pleasant oracles in eating and drinking, I did not find it the case throughout the whole series. One of them took occasion to denounce cravats, as tending to apoplexy. At that moment it occurred to me that having rather a short neck, I must be apoplectic. So I renounced cravats and tied my collar with a black ribbon, like my Lord Byron. I found I wrote poetry a great deal the better for it. I forgot to tell you I am a poet, but as the thing is so common, it is hardly worth mentioning. The muses were propitious, but Auster and Eurus and Boreas, and all the blustering gods were against me. I went that evening, when the wind blew razors, to a party, where the rooms in which the company assembled were as hot as ovens, and the rooms where the company did not assemble as cold as charity—which, by the way, is pretty warm at present. In short, I caught a violent sore throat by following the directions of one of these mischievous medical periodicals. It came nigh carrying me off; but what was very remarkable, while it lasted, I did not feel a single symptom of my old malady. It is my firm belief that a sore throat is a sovereign remedy for dyspepsia, and I am surprised none of the guides to health have recommended it to public patronage. In the very next guide to health, which, by the way, I found always the antipodes to its rival, the danger of dispensing with the cravat was pointed out in such affecting colours, that I immediately invested myself with my old neck-or-nothing friend.

It was but a few days after, I was assured by one of my guides that flannel was exceedingly pernicious, and that it predisposed people to catch cold and get the rheumatism. Some of my symptoms were so like rheumatism that my old physician had not been able to tell them from a disease of the liver, and I never could account for them before. But it was as plain as day; the mischievous flannel waistcoat was at the bottom of all; so I discarded it with contempt and indignation. It was a cold damp time of the year when I performed this feat. I caught a violent inflammatory rheumatism, which laid me up two months. But it had one happy result; it convinced me very satisfactorily that my old pains were not rheumatic. It was worth while to have the real complaint, if only to get rid of the imaginary one. When I got well I looked over some new guides to health, and discovered to my great mortification, in a rival guide, that nothing could be more pernicious than to leave off wearing flannel in cold weather. Whereupon I put on my waistcoat again.

It would be tedious to detail at length all that I did and undid from time to time in conformity with these mischievous books of medicine. All I know is, that I never could find out which was right and which was wrong, or which of the authors was the greatest blockhead. There was one thing, however, too certain; I was growing more dyspeptic, feeble, cross, and unreasonable every day. This appeared quite unaccountable, and rather discouraging. I had a great mind to leave off reading the guides to health. But I was deterred from this salutary step by encountering in one of these publications an observation that seemed to me little less than the quintessence of the inspiration of the seven sciences. It was to this effect, though not perhaps in the same words: "Patients are too apt to be discouraged and throw odium on the doctor, as well as on the science he professes, when they find themselves gradually getting worse under his hands. But how can they tell whether they might not have been quite dead long before but for his skill and advice?" Doubtless this would have been my case, thought I, and I determined to persevere even unto the death.

Accordingly, for the last five or six years I have done nothing, thought of nothing, which had not an immediate reference to myself and my health. I have taken more pains and physic to live, than a thousand years of life would repay me for, and followed up every system but the right one, until I have pretty nearly come to the conclusion it is out of the power of physic or doctors to kill me, and that, consequently, I must be immortal. But the comfort I might derive from this assurance is destroyed by the anticipation that my immortality, like that of the wandering Jew, will be destitute of every enjoyment that makes life valuable. For alas! sir, I can neither eat, drink, nor sleep in comfort, and all the prospects of my future days seem to resolve themselves into the care of keeping myself alive. But I am anticipating, and will go on with the detail of my unheard-of exertions to preserve my health.

I have pretty nearly flayed myself alive with the flesh-brush; I have converted myself into a bottle of white mustard, by the advice of one book of medicine; I have almost destroyed my teeth with masticating dyspepsia crackers, by the advice of another book of medicine; and I am now ironing myself most vigorously, by the advice of another of these books; at the same time reinforcing the discipline of the smoothing-iron, by divers thumps on the stomach, as the sage Don Quixote thumped his helmet to try its strength. But I have a presentiment all the pains I am taking will ultimately fail, and that I am destined to breathe and exist a living specimen of the sad consequences of too much care and too much physic, two very good things, of which one may certainly have a little too much in this world.

My objects in writing you this long letter are manifold. If you only knew the trouble I have to kill time you would pity me. I have actually written this partly for that purpose. Another motive was to caution your forty thousand readers against these mischievous books of medicine, which have been my bane, and made my existence an infinite series of cares, apprehensions, and gloomy forebodings. A gleam of comfort broke in upon me the other day, in a letter from a friend of mine at Paris, to whom I applied to learn the French mode of treating cases such as mine. He writes me that physic and doctors are getting quite out of fashion, and that when people have brought themselves into the society of the worshipful blue devils by a course of Potage à la Crêci, Potage à la Conde, Potage à la Reine, Potage à la Turque, Salade de Concombres, Salade d'Anchois, Côtelette de porc frais au naturel, Côtelette de veau Saint Gara, Escalope de veau aux Champignons, Poulet à la Marengo, Poulet à la Tartare, Poulet à la Chasseur, Bécasse, Bécassine, Perdrix, Perdreaux, Salade d'Oranges, Marmalade de Pommes, Confitures de Cerises, Confitures d'abricots, Fromage de Scherter, Fromage de Parmesan, Fromage de Roquefort, Suprême de Volaille, Suprême de Volaille au Trusses, and such like villainous luxuries, all they do is to starve themselves into good health and good spirits again. It is true, he says that some of the old regime maintain the remedy to be worse than the disease; but the fashion is gaining ground; and dyspepsia, which had grown so common as to be vulgar, as well as vapours, flatulencies, spleen, and all the pale progeny of gluttony and indolence, are fast disappearing.

In order to aid this salutary reform as much as lies in my power, I would propose, that if there can be found in this whole city or state, or even in the United States, two such eminent critics as the curate and barber of Cervantes, they be forthwith authorized and directed by the health committee to treat those mischievous books of medicine as that discreet pair did the library of the sage knight of the rueful countenance; that is to say, pile them up in the yard of the lunatic asylum, with here and there an honourable exception, and sacrifice them on the altar of Hygiea, incontinently, and without remorse. If the weather is pleasant, and my health will permit, I shall certainly come and see the bonfire. I am your dutiful and dyspeptic admirer,

ABNER POOR.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

DEAR MR. MIRROR—I wish you would touch up the milliners and mantua-makers a little. You are to know that nothing is more common than for fashionable ladies to run up a bill with these people, who always charge double in consideration of taking the chance of never getting paid. My papa is rather an old-fashioned person, who thinks he is very generous in allowing me five hundred dollars a-year for dress, and would be very angry if he knew I ever ran in debt to any body. Five hundred dollars, indeed! why it would not find me in lace! Miss Pattyn spends nearly twice as much, and her father failed in business only the year before last.

I generally have a year's credit with the milliners and jewellers, and those sort of people, so that I can always anticipate my allowance. But it unfortunately happened the other day my milliner was recalled to France, to take possession of an estate under the new king, and it became necessary to settle her affairs before she went. So she sent in her bill—it was only somewhere about four hundred and odd dollars. I sounded pa about advancing me a year's salary—but he refused point blank, and there was an end of the matter. I tried to put the payment off a few months, but the creature was inexorable, though she had received an ocean of money from me, and finally sent in the bill to pa. Whew! how the old gentleman did fume and scold! He said it was a disgrace to a lady to purchase superfluities she could not pay for at the moment, and railed about the extravagance of the age, till I thought I should have fallen fast asleep. I did not much mind what he said, but what he did was quite unreasonable, and made me very angry. Only think, Mr. Mirror! he paid the bill and deducted it from my next year's allowance, so that I shan't have a cent to spend, and must wear all my clothes, when they will be a hundred years out of fashion. Did you ever hear any thing so provoking? Do give it to these good-for-nothing, impudent, unreasonable, ungrateful creatures, who get all our money and then want more! Your mortified reader,

CLARISSA CARELESS.

P. S. I saw in your paper the other day that the revenues of some town or other were all given to the governor's lady to buy shoes. Can you tell me if the governor is a single man?

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Messrs. Editors—The object of this letter is to caution the public against laying out their money in making rail-roads, as I am just on the point of perfecting a plan which will undoubtedly supersede them altogether. My principal agent is the magnet, by the attractive power of which, when applied to machinery, I have demonstrated to my own satisfaction, that carriages may be propelled at such a rate as to give to mankind all the advantages of ubiquity, and enable them to be here, there, and everywhere at the same time. The immense benefits of this improvement must be obvious; there will no longer be any necessity for agents in the transaction of business; every man can then perform as much in a given period as ten men can do now, and the quantity of spare capital of time be increased beyond all calculation. Indeed I may truly affirm, that if my plan goes into general operation, and the duration of life is to be estimated by what can be done by man, human existence will, in effect, be lengthened far beyond the age of the patriarchs.

The only regret mingled with my anticipations of the prodigious benefits that will result from this plan, arises from the commiseration I feel for those unfortunate capitalists who have invested their funds in canals, rail-roads, steam-boats, and steam-engines. These will all be exploded, of course. But these are mere trifles, compared with the advantages of the magnetic engine; and besides, all things must, and ought, to yield to the progress of improvement, and the spirit of the age. I am your obedient servant,

COMET SKYROCKET.

P. S. If my plan succeeds, I calculate that at least one-half the present human race will be superfluous. What a vast saving of men!

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

SKETCHES FROM THE DIARY OF AN EDITOR.

THE TRUMPET.

THE affairs of my paper now began to go on swimmingly. Several unexpected pieces of good fortune relieved my mind of a weighty burthen. Mr. Obadiah Thompson wrote me word on the margin of the Cahabaw Democrat, (with the pen drawn over the writing,) that if I would publish some of his original poetry, he would not only leave off abusing me himself, and shut the flood-gates of the United States' Federal Republican, the Henry Clay Recorder, and the Macdonough Jacksonian, but he would puff me and my paper till he had puffed away the recollection of all unkind feeling. I must here stop one moment to pay a just tribute of admiration to the wonderful efficacy and consistency of the law, and at the same time explain how I came to receive communications first written on the margin of newspapers, and then erased. Although every one is pleased on receiving a letter, no one can bear to pay for it, and most people would at any time take six shillings worth of trouble to avoid eighteen pence postage. The conductors of newspapers were, therefore, wont to interchange their little familiar ideas upon matters and things by inscribing them upon their printed sheets, thus cheating the post-office department of innumerable small contributions. To avoid this, a law was enacted inflicting a penalty of fifty dollars for every similar offence. An editor from down east was soon informed against, but he proved that he had always drawn a line over his epistolary correspondence, which the court decided (although the words were not thereby rendered illegible) was sufficient to take the offence out of the statute; and so they can go on as usual, and snap their fingers under the very nose of the law.

In accordance with our new arrangement, I was soon as much bedaubed with praise as I had previously been with slander. My editorial articles were copied all over the United States, and although many papers re-printed them without credit, and sometimes as original communications, yet on the whole I found my fame rising rapidly. My subscribers increased in such numbers that I was about making some very extensive and profitable arrangement, by which the typographical beauty of the work would be increased, and some individuals of great talent enlisted in my service.

Everything promised that I should establish myself on a higher eminence than ever editor reached before, when my flowery prospects were nearly blighted by a trumpet. In recapitulating the prominent features of my history, I am more than ever led to acquiesce in the justice of the poet,

"Great trees from little acorns grow,
"Great streams from little fountains flow;"

but to be ruined by a trumpet! I can scarcely sit still enough to write while I think of it.

One unlucky night, when wearied out with the drudgery of my business, I sought relaxation at one of the theatres. I will say nothing about the actors, thought I, lest I interfere with them professionally, as they call criticising them; but during the performance by the orchestra of a charming overture, I noticed that the combined harmony of the instruments was slightly interrupted by the sound of a trumpet, which, from some unaccountable cause, did not seem managed with its usual adroitness. I traced the discordant notes to a little fat gentleman, who blew on it till his cheeks were puffed out like a Boreas. I was reminded of Anthony Van Corlaer, the trusty and immortal trumpeter of Peter the Headstrong, mentioned in Knickerbocker's history of New-York, the only true and impartial book ever written. Like his predecessor he introduced sundry fanciful demi-semi-quavers, altogether original, which discovered the most wonderful genius for extemporaneous musical composition; but the envious and wilful persons who composed the rest of the band, regardless of his variations, did never stop to listen, nor to let others listen, but played right a-head, whereby it sometimes occurred that they had reached the end of their tune when the trumpet was flourishing gracefully about in the middle. I thought I should do the worthy musician a favour by informing him of his mistake, and therefore took the earliest opportunity of inditing a few remarks, in a most amicable tone, requesting him to keep his trumpet within bounds. The next day I had all the orchestra round to my office, to read the article, one after the other. First came the violins—pale, thin, genteel-looking gentlemen. They read it through, every word of it; all laughed—and some of them bought the number. Then came the bassoon and the trombone, and they enjoyed it mightily. The bassoon and trombone always look askew at the trumpet. Then the clarinet walked in, and shook his sides at the downfall of his neighbour; and by and by entered the bass-viol, and added his triumph to the destruction of the poor trumpet. The whole tribe, flute, horn, piano, cymbals, triangle, and kettle-drums, were seen at short intervals, in great glee, the wind instruments in particular, visiting my office, as soon as it was buzzed around that the blower of the trumpet had been blown up himself, and even some of the leading chorus voices were heard congratulating themselves that the trumpeter had at length met his just deserts. I was at first pleased, then surprised, and afterwards alarmed at the "sensation," as the phrase is, which my poor little unconscious paragraph produced. Judge of my consternation, when I accidentally discovered that this very little trumpeter was neither more nor less than a man of immense fortune, entirely without family, and who had no other occupation, business, or idea in life but playing on his trumpet. I might have written the theatre down with half the danger I incurred in meddling with this confounded trumpet. They told me also that his love of his instrument was only equalled by his love of revenge, and that it was certain he would never let me rest till he had inflicted some deep blow upon my interest.

Several weeks passed away, and I was flattering myself upon having escaped an impending calamity, when I found in one of the newspapers, whose editor I had mortally offended by praising a particular line of steam-boats, with the owners of which the worthy gentleman had quarrelled, an article recommending to the admiration of the public a magnificent periodical, about to be published, full of engravings, of a superior kind, and by far the cheapest and the best which had ever appeared in any country. In due time, the publication came forth, with nothing original in it but some insolent allusion to flimsy contemporaries. Every newspaper in the United States took up the cry, and gave each week a half column of puffs to the new publication. It was soon pompously announced that the original numbers were nearly all bought up, and that the list of subscribers was increasing so rapidly that the demand for the work could not be supplied. I could not conceive how a journal, with so little intrinsic merit should have sprung so suddenly up, and excited such a ferment in the public. I at last traced it to the little trumpeter, who, depending on his immense wealth, had started the work, and paid its way out of his own funds.

The public has been taken in so often by high-sounding schemes, which turned out in the end to be bubbles, that I wonder he is not ashamed to show his face in the city; yet, so far from this being the case, the more he is caught the more ready and willing he seems to be so—as some little fool of a fish, after having escaped from one hook swallows the very next bait he meets. It is strange that with his hundred thousand eyes he cannot see into things more acutely, and that being such a giant in strength he allows every cunning rogue to take hold of his nose, and lead him just where he pleases. The plain truth is, he is a great, good-natured, foolish sort of animal, not troubled with any superfluity of knowledge or sense, and with no more reasoning powers than my dog Brutus, who wags his tail, and runs after a block of wood, as if it were the finest game in the world.

I have frequently heard that the quarrels of religious men, of politicians, of actors, and doctors were carried on with extraordinary bitterness. In embracing a literary life I confess I had cherished a hope that it obviated all necessity for unkind feeling. My little trumpeter taught me the extent of my error. Editors are but men, and very often men placed in situations calculated to draw out their worst passions. My rival carried on his periodical with great spirit, and left no means untried of ruining me. He gave his paper a form precisely similar to mine, but issued it at half the price, which I knew he could not do without sinking vast sums of money. He wrote to my agents, and offered them higher commissions, and finally induced many of my subscribers to discontinue. My Moscow correspondent, too, while taking supper in an oyster-cellar in Chatham-row, fell into a dispute with my resident agent in Paris, and each attempted to convince the other by hitting him on the nose, till they were both compelled to take to their beds; and the man who used to do all my sentimental poetry went over to the enemy in a most treacherous and ungrateful manner. Several of my other most valuable prose correspondents took offence, I know not wherefore. I could not steer clear through all these quicksands, when the little trumpeter injured himself one night before a fashionable audience, by attempting to execute a flourish upon his instrument, too much for the strength of mortal man. He died—his paper shared his fate—and I was left once more to stand upon my own merits.

THE FINE ARTS.

ORATORIO AT ST. PAUL'S CHAPEL,

Given by the New-York Sacred Music Society.

The first public performance of this society this season took place on Thursday evening, the twenty-fourth ultimo.

MR. HILL, leader of the band:

MR. EARLE, conductor.

MR. BLONDELL, organist.

The solo performers were

MADAME BRICHTA,	MR. FEHRMAN,	MR. HILL,
MISS MORAN,	MR. EARLE,	MR. SCHOTT,
MISS WOODWARD,	MR. TAYLOR,	MR. BLONDELL.

The music consisted of selections from Handel, Haydn, Beethoven, Corelli, Mozart, Gluck, Ciachettini.

A respectable society, formed for the purpose of introducing sterling music to the notice of the citizens, and assuming the attributes of a body corporate, in order to give force to its endeavours, must prove of importance to the interests of the science; and a concert, got up under its auspices, demands at our hands every attention. It has as yet numbered but few years; and far be it from us to regard its young but praise-worthy efforts with the same severe scrutiny with which we should criticise the performances of older institutions. Besides, we regard it as an important instrument in introducing a desirable alteration in the style of our church music, which has until lately been in a great measure neglected; and we congratulate ourselves upon the advantages to be expected from the efforts of this and similar associations, in bringing before the public the admirable compositions of the best masters. Yet we do not consider that indiscriminate and fulsome panegyric, such as follows too frequently the request of directors of concerts, addressed to the various editors of papers, to do something for them, can be of any real advantage to the cause which we are always ready to advocate—that of the musical art. On the contrary, we feel convinced that to justly criticise its professors, and the compositions which they place before us, is the surest method of leading to future improvement; and with an assurance that we shall do so with impartiality, we proceed to our task.

A numerous band had been collected on this occasion, the leader of which, Mr. Hill, plays firmly and with taste; and we are inclined to think that if he had an opportunity for more employment, he would rise to the highest eminence in his profession. We observed among the members of the band Mr. Taylor, who ought to have been at the flute desk; Mr. Holloway, the leader of the Bowery band; Mr. Nida, the first horn of the Park theatre, of whom we have had occasion to speak in terms of eulogy; and Chioffi, with his inimitable trombone, from the same establishment. The position of the different musicians, and the whole arrangement of the orchestra, as regards situation, was ill-contrived. The principal singers were by no means brought into a conspicuous place, and we really regretted the disadvantage under which Madame Brichta laboured when she commenced the arduous song, "Rejoice greatly," with half-a-dozen violins within four feet of the back of her head, and an enormous double bass and violincello between her and the audience. Before we conclude our remarks on the orchestral arrangements, we have to call the attention of the society to the decidedly bad effect of placing the leader of the band in close contact with the gentleman whose department was that of beating time to the chorus singers: the alternate raising and depression of the arm of either not only had an unseemly appearance, but must have confused both band and chorus. We venture to lay down one rule as worthy of attention: there should be but one conductor, from whom the time should be received both for band and chorus, and that person should be at the organ; the keys being brought forward to such a situation as would enable him to be distinctly visible to all. In the event of that being impracticable, we recommend them to take their time from the chef d'orchestre alone. We likewise submit to the society that in future concerts more justice might be done to the works of the best masters, by obtaining one or two principal sopranos, a principal tenor, and a principal bass; an alto should be added, and thus with a quartette or quintette of principal voices, and a chorus, the performance might be most agreeably varied, or a complete oratorio, by some eminent master, produced.

Madame Brichta was the prima donna of the evening. This lady is a remarkably good musician; but in sacred music she has to contend against a language with which she is but partially acquainted. The time of the song, "Rejoice greatly," was infinitely too slow. She appeared to more advantage in the bravura by Ciachettini, accompanied very faithfully by Mr. Hill on the violin. Miss Moran sang the song "Ye sacred priests," very prettily; she has a voice of sweetness, and, bating one or two trifling errors, we were well satisfied with her performance. We feel much interested for her; and can venture to assert that she at present would be invaluable in a choir, and, with study and practice, bids fair to become an excellent vocalist. Miss Woodward selected the most difficult song, perhaps, ever written, and one to which a Mara or a Catalani could alone give full effect. At present it has no proper representative in Europe—"I know that my Redeemer liveth." Mr. Fehrman has a firm bass voice, and, when he becomes better acquainted with the language, will increase in value as a singer of sacred music. So much for the principal vocalists.

The chorus from Judas Maccabeus was sung beautifully. The fugue was taken up, point after point, with fire and precision. The Horse and his Rider, that magnificent work of the Briareus Handel, was, we believe, never better executed in America, although the alti and tenori ran foul of each other in one or two passages. In Mozart's motetto the band played much too loud. Altogether, we have to compliment the society on this concert, and must add, that it has the credit of first giving an opportunity to Mr. Schott of displaying his skill on the cornu di bassetto. This circumstance alone forms a feature entitled to every praise. Mr. Schott selected Handel's beautiful melodies, "Lord remember David," and "Angels, ever bright and fair," blending them together. Of the quality of his tone and his chaste and neat execution, it is impossible to speak with too much approbation. As most of our readers are probably ignorant of the nature of this beautiful and peculiar instrument, we may as well add, that it is played by means of a reed, and possesses most of the best notes of the clarinet, with the middle notes of the bassoon, and for giving pathos and expression is probably excelled by no wind instrument.

The church presented a brilliant and numerous and fashionable auditory assembled on the occasion, who retired evidently much pleased with the performance.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

CINDERELLA.

THIS beautiful opera continues to attract increasing houses. We were present at its representation on Monday last, its thirteenth night, and the second of Mrs. Austin's re-engagement, and were delighted to find a full and fashionable audience. It is a strong proof of the good taste of the city, and an earnest to Mr. Simpson that his exertions in the cause of harmony will be repaid. Our fair vocalist has announced her benefit for Monday next, and as the public are aware that her exertions are chiefly required on such an occasion, we doubt not that they will prove that the many delightful musical soirees she has afforded them are fresh in their recollection. In the delicate Ariel, the plumed Princess, and characters of that description, she has no equal on the American stage. The pieces selected are Cinderella and Don Juan, the music of the latter by Mozart; the part of the coquettish Zerlina by Mrs. Austin, Leporello by Placide, and Massetto by Thorne.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

March in New-York.—The month of March, according to the kalendar, is the commencement of spring, but according to the thermometer, it is generally the continuation of winter. At any rate, a peach-orchard coal fire at this present writing has infinitely more attractions than a promenade on the Battery, or a trip to Hoboken. It is a blustering, bullying, nullifying sort of a month, and like most noisy bullies, wastes a great deal of breath to very little purpose. In fact, it derives its name from a celebrated roystering chap, who was much thought of among the ancients for the shines he cut up, and whom they even worshipped as the god of war. For ought we know to the contrary, he may at this moment have a dozen altars blazing on the continent of Europe.

Though the temples of Mars were not numerous in Greece, yet in Rome he received the most unbounded honours; and the warlike Romans were proud of paying homage to a deity whom they esteemed as the patron of their city, and the father of the first of their monarchs. His most celebrated temple at Rome was built by Augustus after the battle of Philippi, and dedicated to "Mars the avenger." This deity was generally represented by the naked figure of an old man, armed with a helmet, a pike, and a shield. Sometimes he appeared in a military dress, with a long flowing beard, but often without the latter. Whiskers and mustachios he despised, as every person of good taste does at the present day. He generally rode in a chariot drawn by furious horses, which the poets called fight and terror.

March is the third month in the year, and was called by our ancestors, the Saxons, Lencten or Lenegan; literally, "the lengthening month," in reference to the days becoming longer than the nights. Hence the term lent, as applied to the period of abstinence which precedes Easter, observed by some religious sects.

On the twenty-first day of this month the sun enters the sign of Aries, the ram:

"That ram, which had once a fair rider upon't,
And let her fall plump in the famed Hellespont;
The crooked-horn'd Aries, whose rich golden fleece
Was carried by Jason in triumph to Greece."

The story of this unfortunate Miss Helle is well known to most readers, and is just as true now as it ever was. She was sister to the celebrated Phryxus, and their father was king of Thebes, who, in selecting a second wife, unfortunately caught a tartar. Phryxus and Helle, it seems, after submitting for a while to the ill-treatment of their step-mother, at length came to the conclusion that they could no longer "put up" with her nonsense, and resolved to make themselves scarce at the court of Thebes. For this purpose they packed up their duds, (we quote from memory,) and after robbing the old man of as much treasures as they could carry, they mounted (without saddle or pillion,) on the back of a ram with a golden fleece, and pursued their journey through the air.

The great height to which they were carried made poor Helle giddy—(great and sudden elevations are apt to produce the same effect on the heads of some young ladies now-a-days)—and she fell into the sea or strait which separates Asia from Europe. Her brother descended, and gave her a decent burial on the shore of the strait where she was drowned, which he called Hellespont, in honour of her memory, which name it retains to this day. He then re-mounted the golden ram, and continued his flight to the kingdom of Ates, where he offered up the faithful animal on the altar of Mars. As such was the termination of this szial march, it is no wonder that the month in which it occurred is still called March, and that the same word is much in use among the votaries of the god of war. What a wonderful science is this etymology! and what convenient resources are these ancient poets! One of them, for instance, in enumerating the signs of the zodiac, says:

"First stands the ram that Helle bore away,
Making the night just equal to the day;
Which carried Phryxus safe—but Helle threw
Into that sea, which, from her drowning, drew
The name of Hellespont."

But, leaving the mythological fables of the heathens, the month of March is distinguished among christians by the number of saints to whom it has given birth. The very first day is consecrated to St. David, of Wales, who is said to have been extravagantly fond of leeks and toasted cheese. This saint was undoubtedly the first inventor of Welch rabbits; or rather, rare bits, as it ought to be written. The twelfth day of March is sacred to St. Gregory; the seventeenth to St. Patrick, an Irish gentleman, who freed the Emerald isle from reptiles of every species; the twenty-first is devoted to St. Benedict, an old bachelor, who never figured in a gallopade at a fancy ball!

March is generally a season of fasting, both for man and beast; some religious sects abstain from flesh because it is lent; others because they cannot borrow the means of obtaining it. Fishermen smile, and butchers frown. The prudent husbandman begins to husband his provender, while the patient kine chew the cud of reflection, ruminate on by-gone enjoyments, and look forward to the season of green timothy and juicy clover. Cocks crow, hens cackle, and fresh eggs begin to be thought no miracle. The city boys fly their kites, frighten horses, and sigh for pass, or Easter. Bishop sleeves are blown up like balloons, and ladies who keep a strict lent are seen to fly through the air, without even the support of a golden fleece. Let them take care of their hearts and their complexions, for "March winds and May suns" are celebrated in verse for the mischief they have produced on a fair skin, and their contrary effects on brown holland. Above all things, let them take care of their lungs and their feet, eschew tight lacing, and prunella shoes; avoid late hours at night, and look Aurora full in the face while she is yet blushing for her own indolence, at sunrise; so shall they secure health, and beauty, and vivacity, and mental peace, and steal the heart of many a cautious Benedict before the first of May.

Spring.—We have been really revived by a few days of genuine spring weather. After our long, cold, and tempestuous winter, the citizens greet it with every evidence of welcome. It was perfectly dazzling to look into Broadway about twelve o'clock. A man's eyes, from being useful objects by which on ordinary occasions he keeps from falling down cellar-doors, or running against lamp-posts, are now so bewildered among a throng of sweet faces, graceful forms, beautiful feet, &c. that he stands every reasonable chance of getting his neck broken. It is no joke for a nervous gentleman to look up from a dreamy gaze under a pretty bonnet, and find a pair of horses almost over his head. Yet it is very much in the fashion of worldly amusements. The bland and balmy atmosphere attracts forth with an almost irresistible power, all who are not tied down by positive necessity. One feels a sad reluctance to business operations with the breath of heaven fanning his face so softly, and surrounded by such crowds who seem fluttering in the sunshine with the carelessness of butterflies among roses. The whole scene awakens the truant propensities of our boyhood, which in that season of life did sometimes lead us to wish that our worthy school-master, with his tedious nouns and pronouns, his dividends and multiplicands, had never honoured us with his acquaintance. We envied all the surrounding children of animated nature who enjoyed the inestimable privilege of absolute freedom from care, restraint, and labour. The fact is, this everlasting necessity of making money, into which the grown up portion of the human race enter with so much cordiality, gives the birds of the air and the beasts of the field a great advantage over us; and these peaceful, sunny, genial, revivifying touches of spring weather bring it home to our bosoms with peculiar force. The indolence of these wild happy creatures has in it the very essence of luxury. It is crossed by no recollection of yesterday—no care of to-morrow—no anxiety for to-day. While thousands of their superiors are tugging, toiling, watching, and harassing their souls out to gain some petty pecuniary purpose, what unalloyed and delicious independence is theirs. We have scarcely ever conquered the lurking imaginations with which in our school-going days we amused our fancy during forced marches to the respectable seminary where we daily hied to be operated upon scientifically, "and all for our own good." In winter it was well enough—but about March, April, May, and the early part of June, our enthusiasm in the cause of learning did certainly suffer considerable abatement. We remember pausing one morning on the brow of a hill, with a satchel of interesting school-books flung over our shoulder. The last relic of hoary headed old winter seemed just then to have completely disappeared. The earth was every where tinged with bright green—the trees were in blossom—not a cloud was in the sky, nor a breeze on the earth. We leaned on the fence and looked down on the prospect of a little sunny vale and grove of trees, with a brook gurgling through, and lilac scenting the air. A herd of cows were lying idly around, chewing the cud and lashing their sleek sides with their tails. A large bird alighted near, and sung sweetly. Two little dogs were playing together. Bees were humming about the flowers, and we sat down and wished some good fairy would appear and change us into a bird, a bee, or even a cow, just till spring had passed, that we might get away for a time from grammar, geography, spelling, and the ceaseless ding-dong and bustle of our little prison, and just lie there in quiet and freedom, and breathe the fragrant, soft spring air. The bright days of a city are certainly of a different nature, but not less calculated to draw forth similar practicable wishes relative to the wonderful advantage of some people in not having any thing to do.

Ainsworth's Dictionary.—A new abridgment of Ainsworth's Dictionary, English and Latin, for the use of grammar schools, has just been published by Henry C. Sleight, of this city. Several alterations and improvements for the special purpose of facilitating the labour and increasing the knowledge of the young scholar, are introduced. This work was originally edited by John Dymock, LL. D., and the American edition contains new corrections and improvements by Charles Anthon, professor of languages, in the New-York Columbia college, and rector of the grammar school. The name of this latter gentleman is sufficient to give a character of respectability to any publication.

The Water Question.—The corporation have been for some time busily employed in discussing the best means of supplying the city with wholesome water. We hope no inconsiderate member of that body will oppose any obstruction to a measure, involving the interests of every individual in the community, and on which the opinions of the citizens are so distinctly understood. No one will have the effrontery to deny that the impurity of the water now in use is a glaring evil, and that its remedy is both possible and easy. In regard to the amount of capital requisite in order to effect it, we fear we shall be doomed to a great deal of superfluous eloquence. No necessary expense should be suffered to create delay. The enterprise can be efficiently prosecuted only with adequate means; and a narrow spirit of economy on this subject, if it has any tendency to interfere with its success, will assuredly meet with general disapprobation.

Junius.—In reply to our pugnacious friend "Junius," we have merely to remark, that we must decline noticing the aquibs pointed out by him. Our course is a pacific one. Had we not too much respect for our readers to intrude upon their attention the particulars of our editorial difficulties, we could diminish the little importance which these gentlemen possess, by the narrative of a few simple truths respecting the motives of their actions. For instance, one distinguished contemporary is using his press against us, because we refused to exchange; another, because he copied an article from the Mirror without giving credit; a third, because we said we liked Kean's Hamlet; a fourth, because one of our country cousins quarrelled with his brother-in-law; a fifth, because a particular friend of his failed in establishing a literary paper; and a sixth, (we assure Junius we speak in perfect gravity,) because we refused to publish a piece of original poetry—thirty-nine stanzas—written by his eldest son John, who had just come out of college—addressed to the moon, and commencing, "Oh thou!"

We believe, however, that the Mirror may be rendered sufficiently interesting without denouncing vengeance against every little fellow who, by hook or by crook, can foist an abusive paragraph into some public journal. A Boston friend of ours, whom, by the by, we never heard of before, the Daily Commercial Gazette, (we wonder which one of our country cousins, for we have an unreasonable number, he has quarrelled with,) gravely asserts, that we have bought up the National Intelligencer, and all the other gazettes in the United States, besides a few in Europe, except itself, the Communi-paw Patriot, and a waspish little literary paper printed somewhere in the vicinity of Skeneateles, whose title we do not recollect.

ALLEN-A-DALE.

FROM WALTER SCOTT'S POEM OF ROKEBY—MUSIC BY THE LATE CHARLES GILFERT.

Allegretto.

Al-len-a-Dale has no fag-got for burn-ing, Al-len-a-Dale has no fur-row for turn-ing, Al-len-a-Dale has no fleece for the spin-nig, Yet Al-len-a-Dale has red gold for the win-nig; Al-len-a-Dale has no fleece for the spin-nig, Yet Al-len-a-Dale has red gold for the win-nig: Come, read me my rid-dle, come, hear-ken my tale, And tell me the craft of bold Al-len-a-Dale.
Dale. Come, read me my rid-dle, come, hear-ken my tale, And tell me the craft of bold Al-len-a-Dale.

SECOND VERSE.

The Baron of Ravensworth prances in pride,
And he views his domains upon Arkendale side,
The mere for his net, and the land for his game,
The chase for the wild, and the park for the tame;
Yet the fish of the lake, and the deer of the vale,
Are less free to Lord Dacre than Allen-a-Dale.

THIRD VERSE.

Allen-a-Dale was ne'er belted a knight,
Tho' his spur be as sharp, and his blade be as bright;
Allen-a-Dale is no baron or lord,
Yet twenty tall yeomen will draw at his word,
And the best of our nobles his bonnet will vail,
Who at Rerecross on Stanmore meets Allen-a-Dale.

FOURTH VERSE.

Allen-a-Dale to his wooing is come;
The mother she ask'd of his house and his home:
"Tho' the castle of Richmond stands fair on the hill,
My hall," quoth Allen-a-Dale, "shows gallanter still,
'Tis the blue vault of heaven, with its crescent so pale,
And with all its bright spangles," said Allen-a-Dale.

FIFTH VERSE.

The father was steel, and the mother was stone.
They lifted the latch, and they bade him begone:
But loud, on the morrow, their wall and their cry,
He had laugh'd on the lass with his bonny black eye.
And she fled to the forest to hear a love tale,
And the youth it was told by was Allen-a-Dale.

THE POET'S WREATH.

"What shall we crown Ned's verses with, my friend?"
"With cypress wreaths, for they are near their end."

PLEASING ONE'S SELF.

"Why didst thou print this book, thou silly elf?"
"Why did I print it, sir? to please myself."
"You've gain'd your point," said I, "my honest friend, You'll please none other, that you may depend."

THE VICTIM OF TRIFLES.

BY J. K. PAULDING.

ACCORDING to all the rules by which we estimate worldly happiness, Mr. Irby ought to have been a happy man. He had health, wealth, an amiable wife, and obedient children. His integrity gained him the respect of the good, and his wealth secured the deference of such as only bow to worldly prosperity. But the most delusive estimates of happiness are those we erect on the basis of outward appearances. From these we decide that a man ought to be happy, and set him down as such without farther inquiry. Happiness is in the disposition, not in outward circumstances, and thus mainly depends on ourselves.

The subject of our story inherited from both parents an impatience of trifles. His father had not patience to do any thing that cost him a moment's difficulty. If he turned a key the wrong way, ten to one but he broke it before he could bring himself to turn it the other. In fact, he could not do any thing that required the least management or delay, and fell into a passion ten times a day about nothing. His mother left off sewing before she grew up, because she could not endure the trouble of threading a needle.

In the nursery, young master Irby broke all his playthings because it was so much trouble to use them; at school the trouble of learning the multiplication table made him so impatient that he tore it all to pieces; and, when a young man, he never hit his foot against a stick or a stone without giving it a kick and a malediction to boot. He could not bear a crowd because he was impatient of restraint, nor solitude because he was impatient of his own company. He was often known to delay reading a favourite book merely for want of patience to cut the leaves; and thus he missed a great portion of the pleasures of enjoyment solely on the score of his detestation of the trouble of obtaining them. We recollect that one morning he was going on an excursion from which he promised himself great satisfaction, when a pair of new boots was brought home, which he wished to wear on the occasion. He was fretting with impatience to join his party. Unfortunately they did not go on as easily as a glove, and after two or three pulls, our hero got into such a passion that he swore a great oath, and threw one of the boots with such violence from him that it upset the inkstand and spoiled his carpet. This caused him to fall into a still greater passion, he fired away the other and broke his looking-glass. For these two atrocious offences, he finally threw them both out of the window with such violence that he broke the head of an honest person who happened to be passing; at the same time denouncing the physical conformation of man, who being predestined to wear boots, was accommodated with a heel, as if on purpose to prevent his putting them on. He was so affronted at all these sore afflictions, that he determined not to go on the excursion. The next day he had to pay a round sum for breaking the poor man's pate, which made him ten times more impatient than ever.

Our hero found the life of a bachelor so full of little troubles, cares, and vexations, that he resolved in a fit of impatience to marry. Accordingly he reflected at least five minutes, when he got out of patience with thinking, and determined to have no more trouble of that sort. He decided at once, sallied forth, and knocked at the door of the fair Julia, whom he intended to address instantly. The servant was so long coming that he was out of all patience, and turned away in disgust, determined to have nothing to say to the fair Julia, who kept him waiting a whole minute at the door.

He bent his course to the dwelling of another fair lady, and unluckily found the servant on the steps, shaking a rug, which raised a cloud of dust which so seriously incommoded him, that he went away in great wrath without saying a word.

From thence he proceeded to visit the pretty, sprightly, brunette Eleanor, and fortunately was neither delayed at the door nor driven away by the dust. He was ushered into the parlour, and told the lady would be down presently. He waited a quarter of a minute, and then began to drum violently on the table. He waited another quarter, and fidgeted round the room three or four times. Still the provoking damsel did not come. "She's enough to tire the patience of a saint," quoth our hero, and stalked out of the room in a furious fit of impatience. The street-door was a spring lock, which delayed him an instant and threw him into an ecstasy of fretfulness; he slammed the door so hard that he alarmed all the old rats in the house.

Fortunately he at length found admittance into a dwelling, the door of which was open, and the young lady already in the parlour. He paid his compliments in a speech she could scarcely comprehend, for he had not patience to speak slow. The lady was rather slow in answering, and our hero was just getting out of all patience; but he restrained himself with wonderful self-command, and an agreeable conversation ensued. He was astonished to find when he went away that his visit had actually lasted fifteen minutes, during all which time he had not once got out of patience.

He went the next day, and found the old lady mother in the parlour, who pretty nearly annihilated him with an account of an attack of the rheumatism. Ye powers! how he did fidget, and stretch out his legs, and twirl his hat, and drum on the arm chair! He was just on the point of giving up the ghost when a great revolution took place. The young lady came in and the old lady departed. Mr. Irby thought the former one of the most charming of her sex, only she talked a little too slow for him. She was indeed a model of meekness, patience, and discretion. The very antipodes of our hero. It is therefore no wonder that they should fall in love. The two extremes generally come together sooner or later.

It was not long before he offered himself and was accepted; but the lady, as all delicate females should do, hesitated and blushed a little before she uttered the monosyllable which decides the fate of woman, and Mr. Irby was so out of patience that he was just about seizing his hat and bidding her adieu forever.

He was so impatient for the wedding that he could hardly wait for the wedding clothes, which we don't so much wonder at, as his bride was a charming creature. He was impatient because the clergyman was five minutes behind his time; he was still more impatient because the bride and her maids were not quite ready at the moment; and he was so out of all patience with the length of the ceremony that he answered sundry questions before they were asked. Never man was more miserable at the consummation of his happiness. It fell to his lot at supper to cut up a tough goose, and he was three or four times on the point of throwing it at the head of the old gentleman, his honoured father-in-law, for giving him such a diabolical task.

The parents saw all this; but as he was rich, they flattered themselves they had secured the happiness of their daughter; the bride saw nothing of it, as in duty bound. She was in love, and near sighted.

When Mr. Irby set up an establishment his troubles increased tenfold, and he got out of patience ten times oftener than ever. One morning, about a month or thereabouts after taking possession of his bride and his house, he rung the bell for a servant, and before the sound could reach the lower regions, repeated it with an expression of impatience at the laziness of the fellow.

"He has not had time to come," said his wife, in her mild dilatory way.

"Not time? I could have gone to the garret and back again."

"Indeed you are mistaken, my dear—have a little patience—here he comes."

Mr. Irby gave him a violent rebuke for being so long answering the bell.

"You sent me on an errand, sir," replied he.

"So you did, my dear—now I recollect," said Mrs. Irby.

Mr. Irby said nothing, but he was out of all patience, first with himself for not recollecting having sent the man away; secondly with the man for depriving him of so excellent an apology for being out of patience; and thirdly with Mrs. Irby for not being out of patience in the least.

"Upon my soul, madam, you are enough to provoke a stone."

"How so, my dear?" said she, smiling.

"You have the patience of Job."

Mrs. Irby had it just on the tip of her tongue to say she wished she could return the compliment; but we record it as a modern miracle that she resisted the temptation, and only said, making a low curtsy at the same time,

"I thank you for the compliment, my dear."

"Hem?" quoth Mr. Irby, and felt quite provoked at his wife for having so much more patience than himself.

On another occasion Mr. Irby fell into a great passion because his wife could not immediately find the key of a drawer when he wanted it.

"Zounds, madam," cried he, "you never can find anything when I want it. I believe half your life has been spent in looking for keys."

Mrs. Irby said nothing, but continued the search while her husband was fretting away his soul, and uttering irritating reflections. He was just going to break the lock when the lady all at once exclaimed,

"O, now I recollect—you have it, my dear—I gave it to you yesterday."

He denied it at first, and could not be persuaded to put his hand in his pocket to see if it was there. He was sure—positive, it was not. Mrs. Irby approached him with an irresistible smile, put her hand into his waistcoat pocket and drew out the identical key. She did not laugh, she did not give a look of triumph, but went and sat down to her employment.

"My dear," at length she said, "why don't you open the drawer, now you have the key?"

"O, it's no consequence—it will do just as well some other time."

Mrs. Irby was tempted by the evil one to tell her husband it was hardly worth while to get so out of patience about a matter of no consequence—but she was a model of discretion, and said not another word.

This was exceedingly provoking. Half the time Mr. Irby had nobody to dispute with about nothing, and it is but a dull business to be angry alone. He made divers attempts to put his wife out of patience, but all in vain, she neither joined in his anger against others, nor gave him occasion to be angry with herself.

"Zounds!" said he to himself, "I believe the devil is in the woman," and he got out of all patience because he could not put his wife out of patience. The truth is, she made him ashamed of himself, and his wayward disposition took offence at self-reproach. Instead of putting him on correcting his faults, it only made him the more testy and impatient.

Being of a domestic turn he generally staid at home almost all the day—and a man who keeps house without any business of his own, is pretty certain to interfere in the just prerogatives of his wife. Mr. Irby was always prying about, seeking causes of discontent and self-torment. If he detected a cobweb hanging from the ceiling, he got out of patience with his wife, his servants, the spiders, and himself. He could not rest till he had made an uproar in the house, and fretted himself sore about it.

By degrees he persuaded himself there was nothing done in the house as it ought to be, unless he attended to it himself. Under the dominion of this freak he set about meddling with what properly belonged to the jurisdiction of his wife. All human beings love power, and that too in proportion to the limited sphere in which they exercise it. Women are of course tenacious of their dominion within doors, the right to which they acquire by surrendering that without to their husbands. It was very vexatious to see Mr. Irby usurping the distaff. But Mrs. Irby was never known to get out of humour on these occasions, either because she was incapable of anger, or that she took warning from the example of her husband, who, with every thing in his power to be happy, daily and hourly fretted himself into a state of misery, at the same time that he made every body dependent on him as miserable as himself.

"I wish to heaven, Jane," said he one day, after having done and said enough to provoke meekness itself, "I wish you would get over that disagreeable, obstinate habit you've got."

"What obstinate habit, my dear?" replied Mrs. Irby, rather surprised at the charge.

"Why I mean that infernal provoking habit of keeping your temper when you see me out of patience with every body and every thing. An affectionate wife ought always to sympathize with her husband. But to see you sitting perfectly unmoved when I have a hundred causes for being in a passion, is too bad. It makes one feel as if one had no reason for one's conduct. Now do, my dear Jane, get angry sometimes, won't you?"

"My dear, I don't know what it is to be out of patience or angry. I wish I could oblige you."

"What a confounded disagreeable, ignorant, insensible woman I've got for a wife," quoth Mr. Irby. "Not know how to get out of patience! I'm sure I could have taught her that, if she hadn't been an insensible block." And away he went in a passion, to look for cobwebs and scold the servants.

By degrees he began to dislike his wife because she couldn't get out of patience and sympathize with him. It showed a want of sensibility, a want of affection, a want of sense, in fact. She was a great fool, and there was an end of the matter.

A woman will pardon any thing in a husband if she is only satisfied that he loves her truly. But if to occasional unkindness he adds indifference, not Griselda herself can persevere in obedience and tenderness. The faults of Mr. Irby were gradually estranging the affections of his wife; and though she preserved her patience, there was not the same sweetness of deportment towards her husband as formerly. They were on the high road to indifference, alienation, and mutual dislike, when a series of misfortunes by degrees united them once again in the bonds of mutual sympathy.

Mr. Irby had estates in St. Domingo, of which he was suddenly deprived by the bloody revolution that converted the oppressed slave into a remorseless tyrant. The loss of these, straitened his circumstances exceedingly, and obliged him to circumscribe his establishment. He could command nothing more than the ordinary comforts of life. But what was very surprising, the news of this serious loss neither put him out of patience nor made him angry. He communicated it to his wife in a cold, solemn manner that was quite edifying.

"Well, never mind," said Mrs. Irby, who felt her old affections awakened by the touch of misfortune. "Never mind, my dear, we have our children and the means of supporting them."

Mr. Irby kissed his wife with all the warmth of first love, and received a kiss sweeter than that of a bride.

He had now something to think of besides trifles; and it was several weeks before he undertook to look for cobwebs, scold the servants, get out of patience himself, or find fault with his wife for not doing it. Old habits are, however, obstinate things. They are like spaniels, you cannot beat them from you. Mr. Irby was gradually relapsing, when the news of the failure of a man whom he had entrusted with his outdoor affairs, while he was attending to those within, again relieved him from the dominion of littleness. He received the shock with firmness—kept his temper and his patience—although he was now reduced to poverty.

"Well, my dear," said his good wife, "we must exert ourselves for the sake of our children. I cannot earn, but I can save."

Mr. Irby was inspired by the cheerfulness of his wife. "I too can do something besides getting out of patience," thought he, "and I will."

He procured, by the influence of Mrs. Irby's friends, a respectable, though laborious employment, which occupied him so completely during the day, that he had not time to get out of patience. He was so tired when he came home that he had not the least inclination to trouble himself with the affairs of his household, and had no servants to worry his soul out by not answering the bell. In short, he had occupation for his time and his thoughts, and that pettish, feverish impatience which had been the bane of his own happiness, as well as that of his wife and children, yielded entirely and forever to the dignified impression of serious calculation, assisted by the necessity for constant employment. Their loss of fortune thus became the source of permanent peace and happiness.

"It is an ill wind that blows nobody good," thought Mrs. Irby.

"What a delightful thing it is to have something to do out of doors, instead of looking for cobwebs within," quoth Mr. Irby. "I've no patience with myself when I think how I used to get out of patience about nothing."

LETTERS FROM CORRESPONDENTS.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

MESSEURS. EDITORS.—I am what is called a fashionable young man; that is, I am received among fashionable people, dress according to the fashion, and do as other fashionable young men do, with the exception of wearing whiskers and carrying a little bit of whalebone. But though I do all these things from habit or imitation, I am not blind to the follies, fopperies, and extravagancies of the reigning modes, and am rejoiced to find some of your correspondents making merry with them occasionally.

It is, I think, high time that those who affect to lead the fashions among us, should be taught the secret of which they appear to have as yet no comprehension, namely, that there is all the difference in the world between elegant manners and a cultivated understanding, and mere paltry affectation, apings of foreign fopperies, and second-hand imitations of bad originals. Feeling as I do, a sincere desire to see our young ladies happy and respectable, I cannot but regret their daily increasing departures from that simplicity in dress and manners, that economy so becoming in the sex, and that retiring delicacy, without which they are little calculated to fulfill their high destiny as wives and mothers; as the companion and solace of man; as the presiding deity of his household and his domestic happiness.

Every young woman of good feelings and principles, ought to exert herself to become qualified for that station which nature and the usages of civilized society have assigned her. I mean that of the wife and mother. In no other situation can they be so happy, and let me add, so respectable, as when fulfilling these high duties. It is here that God and nature have ordained that woman shall bear her high and important part in swaying the destinies of the world; and here alone that her beauty, her gentleness, and her virtues shine out with a blessed lustre that warms and enlivens all within the sphere of her domestic and social influence. Whenever they depart from this, their proper sphere, to flare about by day in the streets in gorgeous, I might almost say, indecent finery, and waste their nights in waltzes and gallopadas, a spectacle for the gloating glare of travelled sensualists, they lose their real value in society; they exchange the jewel of their souls for false and fictitious fripperies, for the disgraceful admiration of juvenile libertines and worn out rakes.

It would be well for a certain class of mistaken females to be told too, that while their habits of extravagance in dress and dissipation disqualify them to be anything but objects to look at, the inevitable effect is to deter the worthy and valuable portion of the other sex from connecting their fates with those of young females, who appear to have no taste but for finery and dissipation, no feeling but for universal admiration. The former disqualifies them for becoming the partners of our fortune; the latter makes them unworthy of our confidence. Who that thinks and reasons before he links his fate forever with, and places his happiness at the mercy of another—who will dare to embark on the troubled ocean of life with a young woman who lives but in the glare of admiration—who is the life of the streets and of parties, the dosing nightmare of the domestic fireside; who sacrifices health, happiness, and decorum to dress and dissipation, and every hour exhibits new proofs that she is as incapable of performing her domestic duties, as of enjoying or administering to domestic happiness? The answer to these questions will be found in the palpable consequences that have already resulted from this state of manners.

Young men in genteel life, with but a moderate fortune, or just entering on the career of business, with a fortune to make, are afraid to marry any but a wealthy heiress. They cannot afford the means of supplying a host of extravagant habits and desires, which consume all the fruits of their exertions in superfluities, leaving the actual wants of life to be supplied by running in debt to tradesmen, or borrowing of friends. Hence among the more fashionable class of society spinsters and bachelors are daily increasing in numbers; neither will venture to marry, without a fortune on one side or the other; the former waits till he has amassed one, and the latter prefers leading apes to being led by a man who cannot supply her craving and insatiate vanities. In the middle classes of society we see early marriages, and it rarely happens that old maids and bachelors are found among them. It is because a young woman if she brings no fortune has not been brought up as if she had a fortune to spend. Her habits are domestic, and she has not wasted her health, her usefulness, and her desire to be useful, in a long course of dissipation, which has brought on a premature old age of ill humour and decrepitude.

I could say more on this subject, but am fearful of tiring both you and your readers. I will, therefore, only add, that I am under serious apprehensions that I shall be obliged to die a bachelor. I had almost brought myself to propose for a young lady not long since, and might have been a Benedict by this time had I not accidentally picked up a piece of paper the other day in the street, purporting to be a bill for a dress, which my mistress had worn at an assembly, and which had conquered my heart outright. That very evening, before going to rest, I sat down and calculated the cost of maintaining a fine lady per annum, and found that no man with less than three hundred thousand dollars ought to commit matrimony with a New-York belle of this age of development. I intend to make one more last desperate trial. I mean to go to the grand fancy ball, of which I am one of the benefactors; and if I can find a young lady there not absolutely and irresistibly ugly, simply and neatly attired, with inexpressibles at least as low as her instep, sleeves not much larger than a two bushel bag, and not much more than half naked about the shoulders, &c.; who neither dies away in a waltz, with up-turned eye, nor commits herself to the embraces of a stranger in a gallopade; why I am determined to pursue her to the uttermost ends of the earth, and lay myself, my fashion, and my fortune at her feet. If I should not meet with such a phenomenon, I am a dead man to a certainty—that is, I am determined to live the life of a bachelor.

I wish you would publish this in time for the bachelors' fancy ball, that the young ladies may be on the look out for a capital prize, to wit, a young man, with black romantic eyes, white teeth, tall, well shaped, and wanting nothing to be an adonis but a muzzle a-la-Bison. Adieu. ADRIAN MELMOTH.

N. B. I have about seven thousand a year.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

GENTLEMEN—People in distress always like to be pitied, and for this reason I write to you, in hopes that some of your good-natured readers will sympathize with me, for I can get no sympathy at home. If I complain in the least, my papa begins to scold, and all the comfort I get is to be told it is all my own fault. I am resolved to state the whole case, that you may decide whether papa or I is in the wrong.

You must know that some way or other, I can't tell how, I have quite lost my health and spirits, and when at home have not the heart to do any thing. I am so languid and sleepy all day that I do nothing but recline on the sofa, or lie down, till it is time to dress for an evening party. I have no appetite for breakfast or dinner, and am so thin and pale, that I sometimes think I must be going into a decline. Now, pa insists upon it, all this is owing to the life I lead, as if it was different from that of other young ladies. He says I am weak, drowsy, and out of spirits all day, because I am up four or five nights in the week at parties till one or two o'clock; and that I have no appetite for breakfast and dinner, because I eat pickled oysters, ice-cream, blanc-mange, jelly, confectionary, celery, and such trifles, at night. Did you ever hear such nonsense?

Then pa insists that the palpitations, tremblings, faintings, and all the other strange disagreeable feelings I am subject to, originate in my manner of dressing, as if all the young ladies of fashion did not wear corsets, thin shoes, short petticoats, and all that! Did you ever hear such nonsense in the whole course of your life?

Now, gentlemen, that you may have a fair view of the subject, and judge how far pa is behind the spirit of the age, I will tell you how I live and how I dress. You will see it is quite impossible that I should injure my health in this way, as pa insists I do.

All the time I am at home, which is as little as possible, I sit alone in the chimney-corner, with a Cashmere shawl about my shoulders, and keep myself as warm as I can. When I go out to walk I always put on my best, for you know it would be shocking to be seen in the street without feathers, and all that sort of thing. My hat is so large that it serves instead of an umbrella; only being made of thin gauze, it neither defends me from the sun, the wind, nor the rain. My shoes are of prunella, for you know it would be quite shocking to decency to appear in Broadway in clumsy thick-soled leather shoes, as I have seen some fashionable ladies do, that ought to know better. As for fur shoes or India rubbers—O! I can't bear them! I would rather get my feet wet every day, as I generally do. But then you know, what people do every day they soon get used to; and one may become accustomed to wet feet as well as wet hands, you know. Sometimes, when the weather is very bad, I put on my cloak; but really these cloaks make such a fright of one, that I never wear them when I can help it; and then, you know, my corsets are so stout with whalebone, buckram, and stuffing, that there is no danger of my catching cold. Pa says they are drawn so tight they stop the circulation of the blood, and prevent the action of the lungs. Did you ever hear such stuff? Why, it only takes two women to lace them! I will tell you a secret, though: I broke my lacings the other night, by a long-drawn sigh, occasioned by a pretty speech, and still prettier look, from a young gentleman who shall be nameless. I never sigh if I can help it, nor laugh loud for fear of accidents, when I am dressed for a ball.

When I go out to a party, which I do generally six nights in the week, I confess I do take a few liberties with myself, for who can bear not to be in the fashion? If I were to cover my neck and shoulders, what a fright I should be! and if I wear any thing but a little slight silk or gauze, or, what is still more charming, lace dress, broader than it is long, I wonder who would be fool enough to waltz with me? But I assure you I always cover my shoulders with a Cashmere when I go home, and always wait five minutes to cool myself after a dance. Many of my fashionable friends laugh at me, and say I am old maidish, because I take such care of myself. So you see pa is all in the wrong here too.

I must acknowledge I sometimes eat till I am almost ashamed of myself at parties, because you know I can eat nothing by day, and must make up for this sometime or other; and then I do love pickled oysters! Then there is such a delightful excitement in dancing, and looking charming, and being told so by a charming beau, and all that sort of thing, that I do get a most monstrous appetite.

Now, gentlemen, you have heard both sides of the question, and can judge who is in the wrong, pa or I. Just publish this letter, with a little note to let me know, will you? Heigho! I'm so tired, so nervous, and have such a pain in my side, I can't tell what ails me; can you, gentlemen? Your admirer,

CECILIA LAUREL.

P. S. I won't sign my real name for fear the old gentleman may see it.

C. L.

Miss Cecilia Laurel has entirely satisfied the editors that the old gentleman is altogether in the wrong. It is impossible that a young lady of her discretion, who leads such a sober life, dresses so prudently, and takes such a reverend care of herself, should lose her health and spirits through any fault of her own. As, however, mere change is often beneficial in these cases, we would humbly insinuate to Miss Cecilia Laurel the propriety of trying what dry feet, domestic habits, a cheerful fireside, early hours, and moderate meals at home, will do for her. Who knows but they may work a miracle?—Editors.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

GENTLEMEN—I confess myself to have been powerfully struck by an article entitled "Antiquity," in a late number of the Mirror. On reading it near the hour of rest, my dreams received their character from its import. I thought I wandered out a vast distance westward from the United States, proceeding towards the great waters of the Pacific. After travelling as much as two thousand miles through uncultivated deserts, I saw signs of civilization. The animals, though extremely small, were domestic. The horse and cow, though of diminutive dimensions, were grazing beside each other. The dog was heard to bark, but it was as the whine of a yearling; the cock was heard to crow, but it was with the feeble pipe of a chicken; and the smoke of chimneys, constructed by the mason, was to be seen ascending. On entering the first village, I was met by boys and young men, of the most uncouth and stunted appearance, and nearly in a state of nudity. The women were shy and reserved, but they were all young.

"Stranger," said one of the inhabitants, "when wast thou born?"

"Faith," said I, "that question I cannot exactly answer, for our family bible was burnt some years ago."

"Very fortunate," replied he, "for you, for no man is permitted in this country to date beyond 1800. Had you carried your birth-day as far back as 1799, you would have come under our law; and," pointing to his neck, "you know what I mean. But," continued he, "where is your home?"

"In the United States."

"The United States!" exclaimed the new man, "what country is that? When was its last form of government established?"

"Why," said I, "a little over half a century."

"That is coming nearer our point of optimism, but still the distance from us is highly dangerous and censurable. What a vast number of degenerate beings your country must contain! It is necessary for its happiness that no state should exist under one form of government longer than one generation, thirty years. Our last change was in 1830. All our people in that year, who were born before the commencement of the present century, perished. It is a fixed principle with us, that every thing degenerates by age. Our animals are all killed off; they do not live after a twelve month's existence. Our trees are cut down after they attain to a certain height and size, which are fixed by law. All our archives and records are carefully destroyed annually; and any literary production, written in or translated from a dead language, is burnt by the hands of the common hangman. Our school-masters teach the art of forgetting. Books we had, but they exist no longer, as they are contrary to the glorious, and primitive constitution of our community. Sleep is our great occupation. Narcotics, of all merchantable commodities, are the most costly and ready of sale."

"And," replied I, in some astonishment, "all this you think reasonable?"

"Reasonable," iterated the parvenu, raising his voice, "dost thou, or any one, doubt? Look at the tendency of all things to deteriorate. Men by age get crafty and corpulent; drawing sustenance from the national stock, and yielding none. Youth is gay and productive. The disappearance of one plant and one animal to make way for another is the universal law of nature; and, as the physicians say, we only assist nature by hastening the process a little."

"But," said I, "you allow nothing time to arrive at perfection!"

"Perfection, sayest thou? say, rather, we suffer nothing to decline. We anticipate the horrible moment, and thereby avoid it. This is the essence of wisdom; but thy miserable country—yet I will have further evidence before I finally and fully condemn. What may be the term for the administration of government by your chief magistrate?"

"Four years."

"Monstrous! What plots and machinations! What lavish and corrupt expenditure of money! What treasonable designs may not be hatched and perpetrated within that period! Know, degenerate stranger, that our chief magistrate continues in office one week, and does not live after thirty years. Thy countrymen must 'sit like owls hooting among ruins, stimulating their doting vanity by the remembrance of ancient glories, and seeking in the motley records of time, which exaggerates every thing, oblivion of their present decay.' My blood warms at such monstrous folly and heresy; and now I look in thy face and observe thy words, I am sure thou art one of the antiquity men. I must denounce thee to our assembly; and afterwards our executioner will relieve thee from thy dotage. Stay, I see him at the corner of yonder street."

On hearing this my legs began involuntarily to offer their assistance to carry me out of the new man's dominions; but the first step I took brought me upon the floor, perfectly awake from my horrible dream.

THE RECONCILIATION.

And did I leave her then in anger!
Resentment never touched her heart—
'Twas agitation—sorrow—anguish—
And I, a wretch! could thus depart!
Now she's in tears—her heart is broken!
And she will sigh—"he loves me not!"
He left me with a frown—sad token
That misery will be my lot!"

Have I such merciless pangs inflicted
On a fond heart that loves me so?
Have I on that sweet face depicted
The pallid portraiture of woe?

I cannot brook the thought! 'tis horror!
No—I will fly and give her peace—
Kiss from her cheek the tear of sorrow,
And cause its agonies to cease.

Emma, I come! your own Fitzharden—
Emma, look up! I love you still!
Nay—on my knees I beg your pardon;
Say you forgive me—or you kill!

She hears! she smiles! that lip of ruby
Will gently, tenderly reprove—
"Go to your business, silly booby!
Alas, what fools are men in love!"

MODERN POETRY.

A soundless voice that none can hear—
A rayless light that none can see—
A sorrowing smile—a mirthful tear—
A dismal hope—a lovely fear—
And this is modern poetry.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

THIS establishment, which has with great justice been termed the Drury-lane of America, has been in a state of great activity ever since the production of Cinderella. This delightful opera has been frequently represented with increasing success, and the off-nights have been varied by a melo-drama, called the Water Witch, from Cooper's novel, and a farce, entitled Separation and Reparation; the former, as bad as any quantity of nonsense we have ever witnessed on the stage; the latter, a very good specimen of Morton's dramatic efforts. It is a pleasing two-act piece, abounding in light and pointed dialogue, aided by strong situation. On Monday Mrs. Austin's benefit brought a thousand dollars into the treasury. Cinderella and Don Juan, with Mozart's music, formed the attractions. The first passed with its usual eclat, but the latter requires a few observations. Don Giovanni is an adaptation of Mozart's music to a version of the drama of Don Juan, by Picoke. It was arranged for Covent-garden theatre by Bishop; and, without retaining all the music, that gentleman has selected for the English stage, the most prominent morceaux which are popular in the Italian opera. The part of Don Juan is entrusted to an actor; Octavio and Massetto are retained as singers, as are Leonora and Zerlina. No opera can make a brilliant hit when played as a second musical piece; and the quiet, but rich beauties of Mozart, with a mixed audience, stand no chance after the rattle and glitter of Rossini, especially in an opera containing the essence of that author, as is the case with Cinderella. Mrs. Austin's Zerlina, however, is one of her happiest efforts; she throws a great deal of naïveté into her acting, and we thought that her "Batti batti" and "Vedrai carino," were admirably given. Jones sang the music allotted to Octavio well. Nevertheless we should have preferred the opera called Il Don Giovanni in a more original state, and less mixed up with the melo-drama, from which Mr. Picoke has altogether taken his materials. Mr. Barton, from the English theatres, made his first appearance on Wednesday evening in the character of Hamlet. We will notice his performance in our next. M.

THE TOILET.

PRESENT LONDON FASHIONS.

WALKING DRESS.—A dress composed of lilac gros de Naples, the corsage made up to the throat, and to sit close to the shape. It fastens behind. The upper part of the sleeve has the usual fullness to the turn of the arm; from thence to the wrist it sits close, but is disposed in horizontal folds laid one upon another, each about an inch and a half in breadth. A light fancy silk trimming a shade or two darker than the dress, goes round the border at the knees. The mantle is green velvet, lined with white gros de Naples, and made with long loose sleeves. The cape is something longer than usual, and rounded at the ends. The collar is composed of five points of black velvet; that in the centre of the back is the deepest, those at the sides are smaller. Black velvet bonnet worn over a morning cap of English lace; the brim of a moderate size, lined with rose-coloured silk plush. The crown is decorated in a very novel manner with black velvet ornaments, edged with black blond lace, and intermixed with knots of black satin ribbon of the tulip form.—La Belle Assemblée.

BALL DRESS.—The hair dressed with bows and braids mingled; two or three pink gauze bows are placed high on the back of the head, and two smaller near the brow on the right side; three small paradise plumes are put on the left; a row of pearls crosses the forehead from right to left: this style of head-dress, both in the arrangement of the hair and disposal of the ornaments, is exquisite. The corsage of the dress consists of an elegant white lisse chemisette made round to the bosom, with longitudinal plaits to the waist; long sleeves of the same material. Skirt of gauze d'orient of a pale maroon-colour, trimmed at the knees with long satin points of the same colour as the dress, headed by a beautiful cord of the chryséon gold; the points are edged with a looped trimming of the same gold. A large gauze bow is fastened on the front of the row of vandykes and another just beneath it, connected together by chryséon cords. Deep points of satin fall over the shoulders, and gradually diminish to the waist. Similar points finish the wrists. Necklace, bracelets, and waist-buckle, moon-stone set in wrought gold. Black satin shoes, and white gloves.—Ladies' Magazine.

EVENING OR DINNER DRESS.—An elegant robe of black or purple velvet, lined with satin; the corsage is of the most chaste and simple form; (which is particularly desirable, when the materials of which the dress is made are rich); a falling collar, handsomely vandyked, and sloping from the shoulder to the bust, gives a peculiar grace to the figure, the skirts of the robe are vandyked to correspond. This robe is worn over a dress of the richest satin, and of the simplest form. A chemisette à la vierge of blond, and very full sleeves sloped to the wrist, of the same material. A handsome toque of black or purple velvet, surmounted by a bird-of-paradise feather, and looped in the centre by a gold or silver band and splendid aggrafe. The hair is parted on the forehead, and arranged in full curls on either side of the face. Ear-rings, chain, buckle, and bracelets, of highly wrought silver (now à la mode,) white silk stockings, and satin shoes.—Royal London Magazine.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

FROM OUR LONDON CORRESPONDENT.

AMERICANS IN LONDON.

If you expect from me a "full, true, and particular account" of the sayings and doings of certain Americans here, who have made some noise in the world, and to whom I had the pleasure of presenting letters, you will be disappointed. I hope neither nature nor habit has qualified me for the task of picking up and noting down all the little off-hand, after-dinner scraps of conversation that may fall from the lips of persons of any notoriety, and then by the help of additions, exaggerations, and sage comments, manufacturing "articles" out of them. This disreputable practice has become so prevalent, that men are almost afraid to speak or move lest they should afterwards find their little trivial actions and sentences grandiloquently noticed and set forth in some future periodical as matter for history. Even the pure pages of the New-York Mirror have been defiled by this species of busy officiousness. John Howard Payne solemnly declared to me, that meeting with a number of that invaluable miscellany two or three years ago, on opening it he was horror-struck to see traced in large legible letter-press the words "Life and Character of John Howard Payne." Certainly this regular last-dying-speech manner of heading the article was enough to astound the boldest. John Inman stands chargeable for the principal part of this offence, and the colonel and editor—"he of the sword and pen"—for aiding and abetting in the commission of the same. You may perhaps retort upon me that when I undertook to write the biography of Jacob Hays I was not guiltless; but I contend that I managed that matter in a delicate, vague, and incomprehensible manner, never descending to petty detail; and I even did violence to my feelings by refraining from giving to the public a short but spirited conversation which took place between Mr. H. and myself one day in the city-hall, when he requested me to pull off my hat, and my alacrity was not great. A few general remarks and observations, therefore, such as can do no one any harm, are all that I think ought to be given. There is really no good and sufficient reason why a man who paints a good picture or writes a good book should have the penalty inflicted upon him of having his every-day actions and careless disjointed chat worked up into biography, without his knowledge or consent; and distinguished Americans are peculiarly liable to this species of persecution, in consequence of the number of their countrymen who travel and scribble—get a peep at them at a dinner-table, and then write their lives. However, I hope a few random remarks will not be deemed impertinent or offensive.

COLE.—This promising young artist is in good spirits, and much in love with his profession—two great points. He is not altogether satisfied with the taste here for literal rather than imaginative pictures, and complains that painting has become too much of an art—and that a piece is praised or blamed more for what may be termed the technical beauties or defects in the execution, than for the conception or design. He speaks with enthusiasm of English scenery, and thinks some of it perfectly beautiful, particularly portions of Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire. The latter county has furnished him with a view of Newstead Abbey—the evening sun showering a flood of fading radiance upon the home of the Byrons, and throwing its parting shadows over the clear, tranquil lake in front. It was unfinished when I saw it, but will, I think, make a fine picture, and is intended for the Royal Academy. Mr. C. appears to me scarcely to estimate highly enough the vantage ground on which he stands, in being able to handle American subjects. A bold, daring view, strikingly characteristic of the scenery of the new world, would, from its novelty, attract far more attention than an English landscape of equal merit; and if it was christened with a long unpronounceable Indian name, so much the better. He had, however, some intention of selecting a subject from Irving. I took the liberty of suggesting the scene in the Highlands, where Rip Van Winkle wakens after his twenty years' nap, and he said he would think about it. I inquired the fate of "Hagar in the wilderness," which was so much admired in New-York; when he pointed to a view of a lake amid the solitudes of New-Hampshire, and informed me poor Hagar lay buried beneath. Mr. C. had unfortunately used some colours that would not stand, and so destroyed the picture, and painted the canvass afresh. He particularized Rogers the poet as one who had purchased some of his pictures, and acted in other respects in the most friendly manner towards him.

LESLIE.—No painter in England enjoys a higher reputation

than Leslie, and certainly not one of them stands a fairer chance of being remembered by posterity. His subjects, which are mostly Shakspearian, will always be of engrossing interest in England; and such is the care and extreme attention to minutiae with which they are finished, that, like the great man he has undertaken to illustrate, new beauties strike you at every fresh examination of his works. Though industrious, he is by no means prolific, resembling most of those eminent in his art in the slowness with which he paints; but when his pictures are finished, they amply repay him for the time and labour they have cost, both in fame and profit. I had the pleasure of seeing a few days ago his last, and it is thought his best production. The subject is from the "Merry Wives of Windsor." No particular point of action is selected, but the principal characters in the comedy are seated round a table, covered with refreshments, in Page's house, with "sweet Anne Page" at the head of the board. The two merry wives, Mistress Ford and Mistress Page, are just entering the door in walking-dresses, apparently merry enough. Mrs. Ford's eyes are sparkling with mischievous pleasure, and Mrs. Page's pretty head is thrown back to conceal her chuckling laugh from Falstaff, who is turning round to survey them as they enter. Pistol, Bardolph, and Nym are on one side of Falstaff, and Justice Shallow, Page, and Hugh Evans at other parts of the table. What wonderful ability is required to do justice to such a subject! All who have read Shakspeare must have tried to imagine what sort of looking men Falstaff and Pistol and Bardolph and Shallow and Master Abraham Slender were, and must therefore be able to appreciate, in part, the difficulties under which a painter would labour in endeavouring to fix those strange and wondrous creations of the poet on canvass; and in giving to all characteristic forms, features, and expression, so that the spectators might exclaim, "Ay! these are they we have read and dreamt of!" That Mr. Leslie has succeeded in doing this, will, I think, be universally admitted when his picture comes to be seen, and what higher praise can be given him? Never did I in prints or paintings, or in real life, or on the stage, see a Falstaff before; yet he looks more like the Falstaff of the First Part of Henry the Fourth—the witty companion of Prince Hal, than the butt of the merry wives of Windsor. His features are those of one who has been handsome in his youth, striking and intellectual; and the mixture of arrogance, superciliousness, self-satisfaction, and sensuality depicted in his countenance, as he turns lazily round from the viands on the table to survey his two supposed innamoratas entering the door, well justifies the character given him by Ford, when he exclaims, "What a d— epicurean rascal is this!" Robert Shallow, Esq. justice and "coram," is as pompous, drivelling, and imbecile as he is described. He is the mere shell of a man, and looks as if he were hollow; and his tall, spare, gaunt form is a strong contrast to the gross, fleshy appearance of another sinner in years by his side, to wit, Bardolph, who is a most unreserved-looking personage, and a flat contradiction to the saying, that "old age is honourable." His nose glows as vividly as in Falstaff's description, and his bloated features, dull, glazed eye, and thin gray hairs, have about as anti-temperate and anti-respectable an appearance as can well be imagined. Anne Page is a piece of comely, substantial, English beauty; and the effect of her prim, demure look is much heightened by the hilarity of her buxom mother opposite. But one of the best, if not the very best character of the whole groupe is Master Abraham Slender, seated in an arm-chair, away from the table; and to the left of Anne Page, as much as to say he will keep his word good—"I faith I'll eat nothing; I thank you as much as if I did." He appears conscious of his vicinity to his mistress, and looks distressingly at a loss for the book of riddles and conundrums he had lent to Alice Shortcake, in order to furnish him with a subject for conversation. He is a picture of utter helplessness and fatuity—every part about him appears unstrung; and his long nerveless hands hanging over the arm of the chair, alone tell the character of the man. Pistol is a fierce-looking bully, with curled mustachios, but almost, I think, too decent a personage in appearance for that prince of braggarts. The chamber is painted from one in an old farm-house of the time of Elizabeth, yet standing; and the furniture and utensils are such as were in use at that period. Indeed, so particular was the painter in this respect, that even the "black-jack," filled with ale, which stands on the floor, and which used formerly to be made of leather, was copied from one preserved in the Tower. Independent of its other merits, the picture is pronounced by good judges to be a fine specimen of colouring, and time will therefore only go on making what is beautiful more perfectly so. Leslie is at present engaged with a scene from the "Taming of the Shrew," for Lord Egremont, a warm admirer of his.

Those who know this gifted man intimately say that he reads very few books—scarcely any modern ones, not even Cooper's novels; but such authors as he does read, he studies intensely—Shakspeare and Cervantes almost constantly; and verily he has given the world lasting proofs that he has not studied them in vain.

NEWTON.—This is another pet of the public's, and almost as deservedly so as Leslie. His pictures have a warmer, richer glow about them than Leslie's, and are more celebrated for striking "effects," but they have not the mind. He is also more a painter of feeling, and delights in portraying scenes of simple pathos, in which he is eminently successful. His best effort in this way is a scene from the "Vicar of Wakefield," the morning after the fire, when the worthy clergyman returns with his repentant daughter Olivia to his family. The imploring look of Sophia, beseeching her mother to forgive her sister; the sullen sorrow of Moses, and the mild dignity of the vicar, form altogether a most sweet and touching picture. It has been excellently well engraved, and I suppose prints of it have ere this reached New-York.

JOHN HOWARD PAYNE.—Never did man appear less likely to have perpetrated a tragedy than the author of "Brutus, or the Fall of Tarquin." He is more than ordinarily cheerful and merry—gay and debonair, and his conversation smacketh not the least of blank verse; indeed there is not the slightest symptom of poetry or authorship about him; but, on the contrary, he is one of the most pleasant and intelligent men of the world you will meet with in a summer's day. Yet he affirmeth that he has been severely tried, and has been visited in no slight degree by the evils which inevitably follow the handling of a pen, but says he has grown callous and proof against any future visitations. If a successful dramatist talks this way, what must be the life of an unsuccessful one? Oh incipient drama-mongers, beware! Oh juvenile gentlemen of great promise, who have bright visions commencing with "act 1. scene 1." awake before it is too late! Oh men of moody and melancholic temperament, who are subject to fits of inspiration, eschew ten syllables per line as you value your pocket and peace of mind! Set up a tavern, license a grocery, or start a lottery-office, and earn a decent and respectable livelihood, and you will eat of turkeys and capons and ducks with canvass backs, instead of bread watered with the muse's tears—and your apparel will be unimpeachable, your comforts many, and your names be engraved on plates of brass on your doors, without fear of consequences! Lo! have not I (now that I see no prospect of getting any money by it) repented of my transgression in three acts; and I have now an oath, never to be broken until it can be done with prudence and safety, not to repeat the offence. Some people, like Macbeth, are madly bent on knowing "by the worst means the worst" that can befall them. There is one state of being worse than that of either author, actor, or black boot-black, and that is a manager. Mr. Payne asked me what sort of a speculation I thought the Chatham theatre would be, and hinted that it was not impossible but he might try the experiment. Heaven forefend! He is a fine fellow, and deserves a better fate.

WASHINGTON IRVING.—This gentleman was out of town for some time after my arrival, but on his return I took the first opportunity of waiting upon him, and found him—as I suppose all really great men and gentlemen are—easy of access, agreeable, and without any peculiarities, or affectation of peculiarities. His personal appearance is that of a middle-sized, dark, good-looking man, rather stout, and with a countenance expressive of mildness and good temper. A love of truth compels me to say that I should never have been able to recognize him from a portrait professing to be a likeness, given in days of yore in the "New-York Mirror;" but as every thing connected with that work is perfect, I suppose the fact of there being no sort of resemblance is entirely the fault of Mr. Irving. After you have conversed with him a few minutes, you forget you are talking to a great author. He seems to retain a pretty distinct recollection of New-York, but appears quite lost as regards the distinctions and principles of the innumerable parties who are at present labouring for the public good. He inquired if there were any paper that could be called "federal," and who were the editors of the Evening Post—said it was a great pity that such a man as Bryant should be in such a situation, to be "poisoned with politics;" and added, "many of his poems would pass muster in any part of the world." He asked, with a good deal of apparent interest, if all the trees were yet standing in Broadway; and said the finest view in New-York was from the head of Vesey-street, looking in a slanting direction, so as to take in the edges of the trees at the bottom of the Park. As soon as the world is informed of this, through the medium of your paper, I expect the head of Vesey-street will be crowded with people to try the effect, much to the benefit of those anomalies in religion and politics, the Catholic-Orangemen, who congregate there for the sale of their goods. I am indebted to Mr. Irving's kindness for various New-York papers, so that I have still some idea how matters are going on in that unpretending and quiet city. As for the numerous other "Americans in London," without name or fame, I presume they go on smoking cigars and drinking mint juleps, (when they can get them,) much after the fashion of those among whom they were born and bred; though I think the high prices of both articles, and the bad quality of the latter, would be a subject of general execration, and materially tend, to use the established phrase, "to keep alive those feelings of ill-will unhappily subsisting between the two countries." SKETCHES FROM THE DIARY OF AN EDITOR.

INDEPENDENCE OF THE PRESS.

THE field was now clear, the little trumpeter dead, Colonel Jackson and his high-minded friends gave me no further trouble, I had completely appeased the wrath of the Cahawba Democrat, the Macdonough Jacksonian, and all that gang—and, as a distant relation died and left me an estate, I paid off my debts, and began to be called a "good man" in Wall-street. The president of the New-York Botanical Bank took off his hat to me in the street; and it was no sooner generally understood that my name was valuable on paper, than it was whispered about that I was a young man of talent. Now let the reader who, in the foolishness of his soul, is envying the prosperity of my affairs, tax his imagination to conceive the most extraordinary of all misfortunes that ever happened to mortal. It shows, however, what a stupid monster the public is, for whom I once cherished such profound respect. There was a time when the public was to me a monarch, gifted with the most sublime attributes. I approached him only with the deepest reverence, listened to his words as wisdom, and submitted to his decisions without presuming to dream of questioning their most unimpeachable correctness. I felt even as the lowest and most insignificant Turkish slave that ever crawled forth from the meanest abode of poverty and ignorance, when brought into the awful presence of his magnificent sovereign, whose glance could instantaneously consign him to the howling. But now I look upon him as a great, uncouth, senseless creature, who has not wit enough to see which side his bread is buttered. He is perfectly managed by a few ally rogues, who act as keepers, and bestow every exterior mark of respect upon him, bowing their heads down to the ground, and saluting him with swelling titles, but laughing all the while in their sleeves, and making merry at his expense as soon as they are fairly behind his back. He is the common butt of those who, before his face, treat him with the greatest reverence, and who derive the most profit from his friendship. The manager condemns his bad taste, and then writes his bill, "the public is respectfully informed," &c. The player, angry that his benefit is a poor one, utters an imprecation behind the scenes, smooths his brow, goes out, lays his hand upon his heart, and babbles about "eternal gratitude" and "profound respect." The publisher sends forth his book, and says, "it's wretched stuff, but it will do for him;" pockets the proceeds, and searches for more "stuff," to satisfy his craving appetites; and when something really meritorious comes before him, there is every probability that he will show his teeth, and growl at it, at the instigation of some of his keepers.

I soon surmounted the obstacles, which, in conjunction with the trumpet, had hitherto impeded my progress, and concentrated my exertions upon the paper. I excluded from its columns every thing common-place, and filled it with the best written essays upon scientific subjects. Men of education sent me complimentary notices, with requests to put down their names among my subscribers; and it was gravely pronounced by the critics, that my journal was worthy the perusal of the most learned classes, when my list of patrons began suddenly to diminish with fearful rapidity. The more praise I received, the worse the pecuniary aspect of my affairs grew. I only wanted a little more of the genuine spirit of poetry—a few just reviews of popular living authors—some impartial criticism on the theatres, and a series of essays, in the style of Addison, to ruin me beyond reparation. In a sudden attack of independence one day, I gave publicity to a critique upon pulpit oratory, wherein several ministers were handled according to their merits, and their whole congregations, with their cousins and friends, discontinued in one morning. At another time an admirable article on landlords and tenants, which I obtained with great exertion, caused a fat gentleman with a cane to come into my office in a passion.

"Let me tell you, Mr. Editor," said he, "that I am a holder of real estate in this city. I have fourteen houses, sir; free, unincumbered property. They are mine. I've worked forty years for them like a dog, and I support my family out of the rents, and I'll do with them just what I please, in spite of you, so don't send your miserable paper to me any more."

And about sixteen other fat holders of real estate, with canes, came around, one after the other, and discontinued their subscriptions.

I began to give up my theory of the independence of the press. It can never be independent, except it be rendered so by the public support. Its independence, I once believed, consisted in its willingness and its ability to express just opinions, without reference to the local interests of any party. Soon I found, however, that it consisted in something very different. If I had gone on improving the paper much longer, I should not have had a single reader; but a short fit of sickness compelled me to neglect it for a few weeks. I was no longer enabled to pay for valuable communications; I took up with whatever came in my way; praised every body, and every thing, through thick and thin, and my prospects began to revive a little.

One of my contemporaries found something to displease him in an article which I published, and in a very coarse and insulting paragraph held it up to public scorn. In reply, I remonstrated with him very temperately, and assured him that he had given the phrase an erroneous construction. In his next paper I read the following, which I suppose I am to consider as characteristic of the independence of the press:

"Mr. —, of the —, is a base assassin. He is one of your half-horse, half-alligator, and a little of the steam-boat men. He always goes the whole hog. This polluted wretch, whom I would not take hold of without a pair of tongs, nor then, unless to give him the chastisement his impudent audacity so richly merits; this degraded outcast from all human society, who talks about our institutions and our country, is himself an Englishman; and if he possessed sufficient wit to know the name of the corrupt party, whose filthy principles he circulates like a vile tool, would be a tory. We shall horsewhip him as soon as our leisure will permit us to visit the city, which he infests with his pestilential presence. Nor must he suppose that until then he can escape the exposure his long train of cowardly falsehoods deserves. We, Thomas Jenkins, pledge ourselves to show our readers that he is a perjured scoundrel, so totally destitute of every common feeling of humanity, that the earth groans under him as he walks."

Now Mr. Thomas Jenkins may be a very decent name, but I never heard it before. I was naturally very indignant, and inwardly vowed that if I should ever meet with Mr. Thomas Jenkins I would give him some slight testimonial of my regard.

One afternoon I was waited on by a little dandy of a gentleman, with a rattle and whiskers. He was pale and consumptive looking, and had that sort of cough that reminds one of a quiet corner in a country churchyard, and makes a man inclined to moralize. Yet a long collar protruding over his chin, and the air of studied grace with which he rapped his slender instruments of perambulation with his rattle, taught the observer that while the precarious personage before him did remain on earth, it was his wish to appear to every possible advantage.

"Pray, sir," said he, taking off his hat, and looking very amiable and interesting, "have I the honour of addressing the editor of the —?"

"I am the editor," said I.

"I am very happy to know you, sir," he said. "This is my first visit to your city, and my friends have been so kind as to furnish me with letters to many of your citizens. Do me the favour to peruse this."

He handed me a letter, tapped his boots with his rattle, yawned, and cast his eyes about, with the air of a well-bred fop, while I read the following:

"DEAR SIR—This will make you acquainted with my excellent friend, Mr. Thomas Jenkins, editor of the — of this place. He is a gentleman of education, and I should esteem myself greatly obliged by any attentions you may have it in your power to render him during his stay in your city. Yours truly,

"Why, you impudent scoundrel," said I, as soon as my surprise suffered me to speak; "how dare you, sir, presume to trust your body within reach of one whom you have so deeply insulted and aggrieved?"

I laid my hand on his collar, and paused at the expression of utter astonishment which appeared in his face, as he replied—

"Insulted! aggrieved! who? I? My dear sir, I beg your pardon. Some mistake, I presume. You have mistaken the person; my name, as you will perceive by the letter which you hold in your hand—my name, sir, is—Jenkins—Mr. Jenkins—Mr. Thomas Jenkins."

I took down a file of his paper. "Are you, sir," I asked, "the editor of this infamous, coarse, brutal, disgraceful, and licentious journal?"

"Why, here's my paper, sure enough," said Mr. Thomas Jenkins. "Yes, sir, I am the editor of this journal; but, sir, upon my soul—why, you use language in reference to it, I confess—I—"

"Look here," said I, dragging Mr. Jenkins by his collar to a position where the article which I have taken the trouble to copy above stared him full in the face; "look here, sir, at its licentiousness. Did you write that article, sir? answer me that."

"What! that article? Let's see?" And he hummed over the conspicuous words—base assassin—alligator—steam-boat—goes the whole hog—chastisement—vile tool, cowardly falsehoods—ah! yes, I remember—ba, ha, ha! What! that's the way the wind blows, is it? Yes, sir, I certainly did write that; but, sir, I hope you don't remember these trifles. We editors, you know, are privileged to a little freedom of speech; but bless my soul, sir, I meant no harm. Why, there is not a single human being, I do assure you, sir," laying his hand on his heart, "whom I respect more sincerely than I do you. I always have respected you, as every man must who knows you, but—this paragraph was written in a hasty moment. Perhaps I was a little warm; but that's the way we editors do these things; they give spirit to the paper. People understand these things; they mean nothing; but, if you were offended, I beg your pardon, and assure you it was unintentional."

Although I did not admire Mr. Jenkins' style of giving spirit to his paper, I could not proceed after such an humble apology, and so we parted. Y.

ITALIAN LITERATURE.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES OF EMINENT CHARACTERS.

PETRARCH.

No three men of genius, arising in the same age and country, formed on the same models, and writing the same language, could be more dissimilar than Dante, Petrarch, and Boccaccio. The one was proud and stern, the other tender and plaintive, the third ardent and lively; the one was a dignified and severe stoic, the second a contemplative platonist, the last a gay and graceful epicurean.

The name of Francesco Petrarch is repeated in Italy with almost the same veneration which hallows that of Dante. Though of a Florentine family, he was born and died out of that city, which is now eager to claim him as one of her children. The place of his birth was Arezzo, the date 1304. The whole tenor of his life was equally honourable and useful. It was devoted, without intermission, to the great objects of the improvement of his native language, the discharge of public duties, the dissemination of knowledge, the revival of literary taste.

"He arose
To raise a language and his land reclaim
From the dull yoke of her barbaric foes;
Watering the tree which bears his lady's name
With his melodious tears, he gave himself to fame."

Many have been equally zealous with Petrarch, when excited by fierce evil passions, but few were ever known to persevere in the dull path of patient industry, quiet literary pursuits, and solitary study with the same unwearied ardour. It is this laborious, benevolent, and useful spirit, more than the mere beauty of the works which record his poetic genius, that justifies his title of "the centre of Italian literature," and entitles him to the crown bestowed on him in the capitol. Perhaps no one was ever so great a benefactor to the republic of letters. To him principally is modern Europe indebted for those remains of the ancient classics, which have both delighted and disciplined its taste. He was the first to remove the monuments of antiquity from beneath the rubbish of ages, and to cleanse them from the rust of time and the stains of barbarism. We can now from its mutilated remains, judge of the colossal proportions and majestic beauty of the great edifice of ancient genius; without Petrarch and his fellow-labourers its very outlines might have been lost to memory. The Greek language was in his time almost unknown, and but for his efforts to introduce it and keep it alive, it might be now as completely antiquated and forgotten as the Sanscrit. To Latin literature, however, he devoted himself more particularly. He first collected the works of Cicero, for which object alone he made repeated journeys through France, Spain, and Italy. His literary pursuits did not make him neglect the brighter road of public honours; he found time to become an able, zealous, and honoured servant of the state. No man of letters, except perhaps Machiavelli, was ever entrusted with so many important charges. In him we see that full union of literary and political reputation, of which England offers few examples, except the illustrious ones of Bacon and Bolingbroke, and of which the Italians of this age are the most striking instances abroad.

Of Petrarch's voluminous writings many have fallen into oblivion. He was so passionate an admirer of antiquity, that he composed the greatest and most carefully laboured portion of his works in Latin. On these he rested his hopes of fame, not on the lighter trifles of which he made the Italian the vehicle. His preference of his Latin poems, like Milton's of Paradise Regained, shows how blind parental fondness can sometimes be. His studied and polished letters, in which he imitated and fancied he had equalled Cicero, are unknown by name to many of his admirers; and his huge epic, "Africa," has sunk into still more profound neglect. It richly deserves its fate; for, as Sismondi complains with naïveté, "the subject is so devoid of interest and so exceedingly dull, as absolutely to prevent the perusal of the work." It is on his Italian poems, then, and chiefly his sonnets, that his pretensions must now rest.

Lyrical poems answer better than any other to that definition which makes poetry the expression of feeling. It is the outpouring of the poet's own sad or joyful emotions, which, too powerful to be kept silent, break forth in the trumpet tones of triumph, or the low plaintive notes of sorrow. In its best forms it is the most spirited of all compositions; but when the free and graceful measures of Pindar and Horace are exchanged for the stiff constraint of the sonnet, all its life and vigour vanishes. This kind of poem is a sort of Procrustes' bed, and the ideas must be stretched or shortened to fit it. The rapid rushing tide of powerful thought will not be confined within such banks; it is only the dull stagnant waters of common-place reflection, or the sparkling but shallow stream of conceits, that can be thus pent up or poured out at will.

We never, for our own part, could find much beauty in Petrarch's sonnets, the very model of this class of writing. They want strength, freshness, and variety of thought. They are as frigid and lifeless as they are polished and refined; the blaze of genius, the glow of passion, are ill supplied by sparks of conceit, hammered out like fire from flint; by the glitter of fancy, as cold, though as brilliant, as that of frost-work in a winter's sun. There is a great sameness in the sentiments, and when the changes are rung through three or four hundred sonnets on lovers' hopes and lovers' complaints, no wonder that the chime is monotonous.

In fact, we doubt whether Petrarch's poems would ever have been so popular, had not the name and fame of Laura been associated with them, and had they not been consecrated by the divinity of the goddess at whose shrine they were offerings. The love of Petrarch and Laura has become one of the most familiar chapters in the history of the tender passion. It has passed current for centuries as a beautiful tale of fond and faithful love, ardent without grossness, earnest without impatience, and constant even without hope. It is only of late that the prying, doubting spirit of modern times has questioned the authenticity of this the most sacred of all the legends of love. Laura certainly was a real character. We are acquainted even with her family history. She was the daughter of Audibert de Noves, and the wife of Hugues de Sade, both of Avignon. We know the very spot, and the very day on which Petrarch first met her. His passion remained constant, at least on paper, for twenty years, during which time he seemed never weary of celebrating her beauty, and his love. He wrote within that period near three hundred sonnets; and if his writings are sufficient proof of the strength and purity of his affection, both must have been great indeed, when the good fortune of only finding his lady's glove could afford inspiration for three or four poems. We, however, judging from internal evidence alone, must doubt whether this passion, so fondly cherished, so plaintively sung, so widely celebrated, was ever deeply felt. He admired Laura probably, and chose her as a fitting theme and inspiration for amatory poetry, in the same way that a Greek would invoke a muse or a nymph to smile upon his labours; but we do not believe that he ever loved her. That sorrow could not have been very deep which exhaled for twenty years, without increase or diminution, in "The windy suspiration of forced sighs," not that desire very strong which fed for the same period on useless tears and monotonous complaints. If Petrarch ever was in love with any thing, it was with old manuscripts and classic authors; and he was much more zealous in their service than he ever was in Laura's. His poems, too, are not those of a true lover—one whose thoughts lie too deep for words—whose strong, struggling desires burn and rage in silence within; and whose words when they do break forth, "stand not upon the order of their going;" do not wait, like Petrarch's, to be marshalled into ranks, and drest in uniform. There is too much fancy to leave room for any feeling. A mind wholly engrossed by one image cannot turn aside as his does, to cull prettinesses of speech, or manufacture refinements of sentiment. A man who feels the passion within, like a vulture gnawing his vitals, is not thus anxious to "writhe with grace and groan in melody."

As a poet then we cannot allow Petrarch a very lofty rank; but as a man of letters, a public benefactor, a great teacher of the world, he deserves the very highest honours. The faults which we may censure are a subtlety of intellect, fond of refining every subject, and wire-drawing every idea, and a variety as great, but almost as pardonable as Cicero's. These are blemishes of no very deep or disgraceful dye, and they are fully redeemed by the pure, honourable feelings his whole life exhibited, the noble ends to which he always turned instinctively, as the congenial themes of his mind, and that enthusiasm of a kindred spirit, which made him love every better principle, every elevated aspiration of our nature. For the New-York Mirror:

A TALE.

It is a tale too often told,
Of love betrayed for sordid gold—
A cloud upon his hallowed flame,
A current slander on his name!
For love to avarice never bowed;
So vile a passion cannot cloud
The lustre of his holy fire,
Or bid his quenchless light expire.
Yet 'twas a tale, that, in my youth
Was told me, with the stamp of truth;
And then I, doubting, shook my head,
And to the grave narrator said,
"Can this be love? It cannot be!
If such be love, oh, keep me free!"
I often since have heard a tale
Of broken faith and trust betrayed;
But then it made my cheek turn pale—
'Twas of a fair, young, happy maid,
Who timidly, yet fondly dreamed
Of one in fortune's favoured lot,
Yet, such his arts, the maiden deemed,
Such false distinctions were forgot.
And love, his dazzling halo threw
Round calmer reason's colder light,
And from her own fond heart she drew
Pictures of his, all pure and bright!
He spoke of truth, of holy vow,
Of journey to a distant clime,
When all who barred their union now,
Would yield to distance and to time.
He said "his race were cold and stern,
And bowed the knee at fortune's shrine,
And my true heart can never learn
To break its faith and ruin thine!
But scowling look, and hostile word,
Would ill besem our bridal hour—
Then fly with me!" The maiden heard—
Oh, love! thine is a conquering power!
She left her calm and happy home,
And fled with him across the sea.
Another year beheld him come
With a gay bride—and who was she?
Not the fair girl his arts had won—
Who fled to shun his kindred's ire—
But one on whom a southern sun
Had fiercely shed his glowing fire;
Whose boundless wealth, and spreading lands,
And gorgeous pageantry, and pride
Had torn apart the sacred bands
That bound him to an humbler bride!
And where was she? No clue was there
That lost one's hapless fate to trace;
Yet there was one, whom fierce despair
Had led to search that fatal place—
A grey-haired sire, whose tottering frame,
Bowed down with agony and years,
Bore him to find, without a name,
A grave, to water with his tears!
One told him all the harrowing tale
Of his desertion—her despair—
And worse—but what could now avail,
The deed was done—and she was there!
"Tis an old tale, and often told,"
Yet say not love can yield to gold!
Love lifts the soul far, far above
All baser views, or 'tis not love!

ORIGINAL ESSAYS.

A CHAPTER ON DOMESTIC TROUBLE.

BY A SUFFERER.

I AM a young gentleman of rather a literary turn of mind, and withal very domestic. For this latter virtue I am indebted to my dear little wife Lucy, whose amiable and affectionate disposition and engaging manners render home the pleasantest place to me in the world. It is but lately that she and I have concluded that we loved each other well enough to be united, for better or for worse; and notwithstanding the jibes and jests of people who sneer at every thing, I have ever since found the cup of my happiness filled up nearly to the brim. Our family circle is not large, consisting of ourselves, one of her sisters, whom I love almost as well as I do her, and one of mine, whose presence also contributes largely to our cheerfulness and contentment. Although we have many agreeable friends, who often spend an hour or two with us, and whose visits we return as a pleasing duty, yet we are far from being fashionable people. We never give jams, nor make pretensions to lead the ton. On new-year's day the girls received visitors without any affectation of superiority; not even requesting them to send in their cards before they could be admitted, in order to avoid the society of those whose gentility they considered equivocal. They have not yet grown so far above the ordinary civilities of life, as to refuse their arm in the street to any gentleman with whom they are accustomed to associate; they have all been educated to seek their principal amusement at home, and are each of them admirably well calculated to make it lively and attractive. You will not be surprised, therefore, that all the splendid diversions which this city affords cannot allure me from the peace and merriment of my own hearth. The girls play with great taste on the piano, and sing sweetly; and to vary the charms of music and conversation, they sometimes apply themselves to needle-work, while I read to them aloud some interesting novel, poem, or other work of fancy. I can assure you, Messrs. Editors, the evening hours pass away with delightful rapidity, in the exercise of these agreeable occupations. Yet as there is no heaven without a cloud, so there is no situation without care. I need not tell you how sincerely I love every member of my family, for that is sufficiently proven by the eagerness with which I fly to their society as soon as the toils of the day are over; but they are, the whole set of them, Lucy and all, addicted to one fault, which, although trifling, has been to me an exceeding annoyance. They are such affectionate and beautiful creatures that I cannot bear to scold, or show any other signs of dissatisfaction before them; but I apply to you, as the sovereign redressers of all that class of wrongs which do not fall under the jurisdiction of the courts of justice, that they, and all others like them, of whom I shrewdly suspect among your fair readers there is a great number, may read and take the hint.

The girls are, or pretend to be, amazingly fond of poetry; think Byron must have been a heavenly fellow; would give any thing in the world to get one peep at Washington Irving; and declare continually, and with much enthusiasm, that Walter Scott is the greatest man that ever lived, except Shakespeare. I have experienced great pleasure in reading to them in this way the Sketch Book, Bracebridge Hall, many of the Waverley novels, and other productions of merit. They seem to enjoy it very much, and are quite vociferous in their expressions of disappointment when the exigencies of my business occasionally detain me until a late hour in the evening; yet, (mark me, lovely reader, for this is my charge against the whole sex, with very few exceptions,) I scarcely ever can get through twenty pages, no matter what it may be, poetry, prose, Shakespeare, Irving, or Scott, but some one of them will exclaim aloud, make the most trivial and unnecessary observation, or enter into a brisk dialogue, aside, in a whisper, to the total disregard of the subject matter, and the destruction of the effect upon the whole circle of my hearers.

There are certain pieces of composition so refined and beautiful that it seems almost sacrilege to read them to any who are not competent to appreciate them, or who are so differently engaged as to have their attention repeatedly diverted by other objects.

The other evening one of them had found an old volume, containing the "Essays of Howard" upon the subject of imprisonment for debt, first printed about twenty years ago in the New-York Columbian, and said to contain the most touching and interesting pictures of human misery which ever took place within the gloomy walls of our detestable jail. The author of these charming sketches has passed away from the earth; but I retain a recollection of him sufficiently distinct to give a strong additional interest to his stories. When I recalled the ardent and glowing enthusiasm with which he was wont to advocate the cause of humanity, his deep earnestness respecting every thing connected with the subject upon which these essays are composed, and the indignation with which he used to speak of those who behold with indifference the horrors which actually disgraced our country and human nature within those damp and wretched walls, I was more than usually impatient under any unnecessary interruption. Imagine us, if you please, now all comfortably seated around a cheerful fire; my "bonny wee wife," and her sweet sister Maria on one side, gradually giving some shapeless pieces of silk the form of a dress, while Eliza on the other was also plying her needle to the completion of some one of those nameless pieces of wearing apparel of which ladies find themselves in need. I proceeded to my pleasing task, and we shall have a specimen of the grievance complained of. The story ran as follows:

"I have had a pretty good opportunity to know something of that class of people, (debtors,) having myself been more than sixteen years a prisoner for debt! I had the misfortune to have a wild and very extravagant brother; but he was such a liberal and generous fellow, that I could not help loving him dearly. When he was in distress I gave him money; and if I could not readily raise it for him, (as my credit was good,) I lent him my notes. My brother was one of the greatest speculators that ever lived in America, and more than once made an immense fortune on paper. Several times he would really have made himself rich as Croesus, and me also, (for I always shared with him,) if it had not happened, most unluckily, that just at the moment he was about to realize all his ardent hopes, he wanted more money to perfect the scheme than could possibly be obtained. It was one of these glorious speculations that ruined my brother and me. He died of a broken heart. Heaven bless him, I say. But the usurer who bought of him my lent notes at thirty per cent. discount, by combining with others, has kept me sixteen years a prisoner in the jail of the city and county of New-York. It is a horrid place—and many a time when, through the grates of my prison window, I have watched the last rays of the setting sun, as they gilded some neighbouring spire—"

"Bless my soul!" said Maria, "where in the world did I leave my thimble?"

"You put it in my box," said Lucy.

"Here it is."

I finished the sentence, and it was a beautiful one—but no one heard me.

I soon came to another fine passage. It was the interesting account of Brown, who was cast into prison for debt.

"Nothing gave Brown pleasure but the daily visits of his amiable wife. By the help of a kind relation she was able to give him sometimes soup, wine, and fruit; and every day, whether clear or stormy, she visited the prison to cheer the drooping spirits of her husband. She was uncommonly pretty. She seemed an angel, administering consolation to a man about to converse with angels. One day the hour of one o'clock passed, and she came not. Brown was uneasy. Two—three, and four o'clock passed, and she did not appear. Brown was distracted. A messenger arrived. Mrs. Brown was very dangerously ill, and supposed to be dying in a convulsive fit. As soon as he received this information, he darted to the door with the rapidity of lightning. The inner door was open, and the jailer, who had just let some one in, knocked him down with the massy iron key which he held in his hand, and—"

I looked up to catch the expression of anxiety which I presumed was glowing on every face. Eliza's countenance was indeed lighted up with the most intense interest, but her eyes were intently fixed upon a cape, which Lucy was holding up to her admiration.

"It's too long," said Lucy, softly.

"I made it so on purpose," said Eliza.

"Is that the twilled Levantine silk?" said Maria.

"No, it's Florence," said Eliza.

I laid down the book. They all begged my pardon. They looked very pretty—I said nothing, but continued the story.

It seems to me that my fair hearers always break in upon the most interesting passage with their interruptions. I accomplished a number of pages very quietly, and was becoming myself quite absorbed with the subject. The history of Danvers I thought could not fail to command their attention. I read on:

"It was winter, and as Danvers, peeping through the grate of the prison, saw his cheerful and amiable wife trudging through the snow to carry his blessing to the 'darling Eliza,' 'Now, Howard,' said he, 'by the goddess of mercy! (and I think her the best goddess in the catalogue,) I feel at this moment that I am gay in spite of oppression. My wife there is an angel, and the daughter whose fourth birth-day now makes me so happy, is worth more in my estimation than all the wealth in the world. Dearly as I love my liberty, I would sooner remain a slave than part with this little darling of my heart. Come, Howard, here's to many happy returns of Eliza's birth-day.' So saying, he took up the cup, and was just applying it to his lips, when suddenly the door of his room flew open and in rushed his eldest child, covered with snow, her hands and face purple with cold, her eyes wild, and the tears frozen on her cheeks. It was some moments before her excessive grief would permit her to speak. At length she exclaimed—"

"Plush bonnet and gaiter boots," said Lucy, in a loud whisper to Maria.

"Yes, and book-muslin collar," interrupted Eliza.

"No," said Maria, "mull-mull."

"No," said Lucy, "bobbinet lace."

They had been talking together by signs for half an hour, until the debate grew too warm to be carried on any longer in an inaudible manner.

Now, Messrs. Editors, if I were a young lady, and any gentleman had the kindness to read to me, I should either yield him attention, or frankly request him to suspend operations until I was fully prepared to do so. I should take care to have my thimble, needles, scissors, thread, &c. &c., all ready before I commenced; and if I had any thing to say about bobbinet-lace or mull-mull collars, I would at least wait till he had reached some passage not particularly remarkable for beauty. I fear I shall have to read hereafter to myself, as I do not know any thing more calculated to vex me and make me feel like a fool, than to find, after I have been perusing with fine emphasis, some admirable passage, of pathos sufficient to bring tears into the eyes of any intelligent listener, that my auditory, instead of appreciating it, have been whispering to each other about bobbinet-lace.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

The letter from England.—However cordially we subscribe to Mr. Irving's opinion, as expressed in the letter of C. in a previous page, of the great beauty of Mr. Bryant's poetic writings, we do not precisely perceive any thing to regret in his present station. His occupation as one of the editors of the Evening Post is highly respectable, and we hope lucrative; and if he were disposed to cultivate a further acquaintance with the muses, whose favours he has already wooed so successfully, we doubt whether he has participated so zealously in our political contests as to disqualify him for their society. Besides, at this very interesting period of our history, it is such men as he whom the disinterested lover of his country must wish to see imparting all their influence to the public press.

Streets again.—We do not know a body of gentlemen more independent than the corporation. They seem as regardless of the opinions of their sovereigns, the people, as our old anti-revolution governors, who were sent over from England on the appointment of the king. The whole city have called for the destruction—the annihilation, if possible, of the jail and bridewell; yet there they stand, the imperishable monuments of the despotism of the common council, and the helplessness of the people. We have been crying for a supply of water for sixty or seventy years; yet here we are, drinking from the brackish pools that poison the health of every individual; and now the streets have been all winter nearly as impassable as the Alps; many accidents have occurred, endangering the limbs and lives of the inhabitants; and the approach of warm weather finds us wading through masses of mud and filth, and inhaling contaminated air; yet our dignified rulers go on, immortalizing themselves in long speeches upon abstract subjects, turning their honest political enemies out of office, and eating grand dinners, for the benefit of the country. After, however, the winter had fairly passed away, one gentleman did propose "that it be referred to the committee on cleansing the streets, to empower them to employ men to break up the snow which still lies in the streets." The committee on cleansing the streets! In the name of wonder, who are the gentlemen who have devoted their talents to this laudable design, and what have they been doing for the last two months? Although the public journals have been hammering away upon the subject till it has become so hacknied that we are almost afraid of touching upon it again; although a petition, signed by more than one hundred cartmen, praying that the corporation would take measures to remove the snow and ice, has been presented to the mayor, yet this efficient "committee" have been surprised in their active debates by a melting spring sun. So much more easy it is to talk than to act. Yet even this reluctant and dilatory motion to refer the subject to the "committee," was too important an innovation upon the established quiet, and business propensities of the corporation, not to meet with some enlightened opposers. A patriotic member bristled up at the startling proposal, and advanced some arguments of extraordinary solidity against the measure. The petition and resolution were, however, referred, and a motion made that the committee have powers granted them, which was negatived, and they proceeded to the more important consideration of purchasing a library for themselves. So the books will probably be bought, and the city remain as filthy as ever. To be serious, the streets are in a most disgraceful state; equally detrimental to the health and comfort of the citizens, who are unanimous in their reprobation of the neglect with which the subject has been treated.

The Savoyards' Song.—In the third number of our present volume, a charming piece of poetry appeared as original, under the above title. We have recently discovered that it was written by Mr. Charles Sprague, to accompany an engraving in the "Youth's Keepsake." The print which it was intended to illustrate, represents two or three young Savoyards, dancing before a party of ladies and children, and holding out their caps for charity. We re-publish it in a more perfect state, with an additional stanza, in order to ascribe it to its proper source. The little poetry Mr. Sprague has chosen to give to the world has been highly finished and very favourably received, and, like Mr. Halleck, he has been justly censured by the critics for the rarity of his productions.

Far away, far away,
By Geneva's blue waters in gladness we dwelt;
Kind hands there caressed us,
Sweet voices there blessed us,
As low at our vesper devotions we knelt—
Far away.

Far away, far away,
One morn' flew our father's light vessel in pride,
But the storm gathered o'er,
And his bark came no more;
Our father's bones sleep in Geneva's blue tide—
Far away.

Far away, far away,
Our heart-broken mother gazed out on the wave;
O'er her children she sighed,
For her husband she died;
On Geneva's green bank is our mother's cold grave—
Far away.

Far away, far away,
From the haunts of our childhood in scorn we were driven:
Out of kindred and home,
To a distant land we must roam,
Not to rest in you, and no trust but in heaven—
Far away.

Far away, far away,
The poor Savoyard orphans to-morrow must go;
Then pity, kind strangers,
The world's friendless rangers,
And bless with your bounty our journey of woe—
Far away.

The last words of Bolivar.—Firth and Hall have published a new elegiac song, or monody, entitled "I pity and forgive, or the last words of General Simon Bolivar," the music of which is of the very first order. The dying expressions of the liberator, as translated from a letter written on the spot to a gentleman in this city, are said to have been, "My enemies have trampled on my heart—I pity and forgive them!" This magnanimous sentiment has been wrought into an exquisite little song, by one of our best lyric poets, and the music selected from Beethoven. There is no doubt it will become extremely popular among the friends of liberty.

Legends of New-England.—We have read, with much pleasure, a volume under the above title, from the pen of Mr. Whittier, editor of the New-England Review, and will endeavour to notice it more at length in our next. In the meantime, we recommend it to general perusal.

[Communicated.]

Germanicus.—We really cannot follow Germanicus through his verbose lucubrations; when smarting under our just castigation he twists and writhes about to avoid our blows, finally attacking an individual whom he had previously eulogized; but until he can prove the facts we have stated untrue, he but wastes his time and exposes the publication which gives admission to personality instead of argument. Until he can show by some better authority than himself, that portamento di voce is not requisite in such an aria as "Angels ever bright," he merely renders himself ridiculous by keeping up a war of words, and until he can give some satisfactory cause for his assertion that portamento di voce is possessed in perfection by a lady who, according to his statement, has more difficulty in holding one note than in running a division on a hundred, and one whose firmness of tone is impaired, he is but as "one of the foolish in Israel."

GO THEN—'TIS VAIN.

WRITTEN BY THOMAS MOORE—COMPOSED BY BISHOP.

Mournfully.

Go, then, 'tis vain to ho-ver Thus round a hope that's dead, At length my dream is o-ver, 'Twas sweet—'twas false—'tis fled. Fare-well, since nought it moves thee, Such truth as mine to see, Such truth as mine to see; Some one, who far less loves thee, Per-haps more blest will be.

2d—Farewell, sweet eyes, whose brightness
New life around me shed;

Farewell, false heart, whose lightness
Now leaves me death instead.

Go, now, those charms surrender
To some new lover's sigh;

One who, though far less tender,
May be more blest than I.

CHARITY.—The rich transgress in safety when they are told that charity covers a multitude of sins. Hence people become charitable not from motives of pity or generosity, but self-interest. With such, a gift to the poor is but a composition for a crime.

LAW.—Law has been called a bottomless pit, not so much because of its depth, as that its windings are so obscure nobody can see the end.

A BITTER MALEDICTION ON A WOMAN.—May thy face speedily become like the sea, and the wrinkles follow each other as thick, ay, and as deep too.

LOVE OF FAME.—Common men mistake that generous aversion of glory which produces emulation among great souls, for envy of each other.

COTTON MATHER.—Old Cotton Mather, addressing the aged people of his flock, told them, "You have given your flour to the devil, and now you bring your bran to the Lord."

VULGAR PREACHER.—Instead of enforcing the beauties of virtue, he frightens his hearers with exaggerated pictures of the punishment of vice.

KINGS.—Kings who are subject to the laws should bless themselves, they have not the power of oppressing mankind.

A LAUGHING FOOL.—This creature seems born for nothing but to show his teeth.

A DOCTOR.—A doctor's blunder is death.

IGNORANCE AND SUPERSTITION.—The world has seen most visions when it was most blind. Men are always the most superstitious in darkness.

ABSOLUTE GOVERNMENT.—One of the greatest objections to absolute power is that it involves millions in the crimes or weakness of one.

HOMER.—Paterculus says of Homer, that there was no man before him whom he could imitate, and none that came after that could imitate him.

MARRYING DAUGHTERS.—The Spaniards say, "at eighteen marry your daughter to her superior; at twenty to her equal; at thirty to anybody that will have her."

DUTCH ARCHITECTURE.

OLD DUTCH HOUSE IN PEARL-STREET.
Built 1626.—Rebuilt 1697.—Demolished 1898

ORIGINAL TALES.

OLD 76.

We present to our readers a correct and striking view of the ancient Dutch house, formerly familiarly known as "old seventy-six," and which was pulled down about three years since, in compliance with that irreverence for antiquity which so grievously afflicts the good people of this city, many of whom, we are credibly informed, demolish one house just for the pleasure of building another in its place. The original edifice was probably erected soon after the first settlement of New-Amsterdam, say about 1626. It was, many years afterwards, partly destroyed by fire, and the date of 1697, it is believed, was that of the re-building.

The following curious tale relates to the family of Mynheer Van Heilig Schrift, by whom the house was erected, and who died, leaving a widow and one daughter by a former wife. It is derived from a tradition still current in the family of Wessels, of whom, Dirck Wessels, was one of the seventeen members of that assembly which met in New-York on the ninth of April, 1691. It has regularly been handed down from generation to generation to this blessed day.

THE MYSTERIOUS INTERLOPER:

Or the man that never answered a question.

It was the eve of the first day of May 1641, as I think, and the town of New-Amsterdam was in a prodigious uproar, which, for such a sober little Dutch built place, was almost miraculous. News had just arrived that the English, from the Varsche river, had overspread the eastern part of Long Island as far as Oyster bay, and taken possession of all the oysters. It was moreover currently reported that they had beaten with oyster-rakes two negroes of Mynheer Alderman Van Breuchelen, who had come thither to catch oysters, and sent them away with a cargo of shells, as it were, in derision of the dignity and authority of New-Amsterdam. In addition to this stirring news it was rumoured that the Indians about Pavinia, Haerlem heights, and Gawanus, exhibited symptoms of hostility, and had been seen prowling about near the great windmill, outside the wooden walls. During this memorable day not a pipe was smoked by the honest burghers, nor a word spoken by their dames above their breath.

To add to these appalling circumstances, the night had set with a terrible storm from the north-east; the thunder rattled and the lightning flashed incessantly over head; the dogs howled, and the wind whistled in concert around and around the houses, and you might hear, in the momentary pauses of the storm, the waves dashing furiously against the ridge of rocks which extended along the point of the battery. Ever and anon the dismal sounds of a bell mingled in the wild concert, giving token of some new and unknown danger, and frightening the peaceful citizens with vague apprehensions of they knew not what.

The buxom rosy-checked widow of Mynheer Van Heilig Schrift was sitting with her step-daughter, Marithee, cowering in a corner with fear and trembling. Often did the disconsolate dame wish from the bottom of her heart that she had a man about the house to take care of her and her daughter and go to market; and in the bitterness of her despondency she determined to look out betimes for such a necessary ingredient in house-keeping.

It was now waxing towards the witching hour of night, and the uproar without seemed to gather new vigour every moment. There was no soul in the house but the dame, her daughter, and an old black sybil, who had her hands full every night in fighting with the witches, that came in the semblance of cats, black, brindled, and spotted, and molested her sorely. The house in which the widow sojourned was a sort of frontier post on the East river at that time. It stood close to the beach, and the waves, when the wind was high at east, sometimes threw their spray against the windows.

The clock struck—no, there was no clock in the city to strike at that time—but if there had been a clock, and it had chanced for a wonder to be right, it would have struck twelve. Our readers will marvel, perhaps, what could keep two honest, sober, well-disposed women, a widow and a maid, up at such an unreasonable hour. But the truth is, they were afraid to go to bed.

At this moment a loud knock was heard at the street door. It went to the hearts of the two forlorn women, whose heads were full of Indian plots, midnight robberies, and conflagrations. They sat trembling—neither uttering a word nor moving a step. The wind whistled louder, the thunder roared, and the lightning flashed through the crevices of the windows and doors.

After a few minutes the knocking was renewed with still greater force. It seemed as if the person, whoever he was, seriously meditated beating down the door. It roused the old sinner in the kitchen, who feared nothing but the witches. She went to the door and asked in excellent low English, who was there? Some one answered:

"I guess I want to know who lives here."

"And I want to know who you are."

"Why, Lord bless your soul, who are you?"

"It's none of your business."

"None of my business! that's tarnaal likely. What do you calculate I came here for except on business?"

"You must tell me who you are first."

"Why, you won't be a bit the wiser for that as far as I know; but did you ever hear of one Philo Popsin?"

"Philo who? there's no such person in the place."

"Why, how should you know? Can't a man be drove ashore here in the dark and you know nothing at all concerning it?"

"You're no nigger, nor thief, nor any thing of that sort?"

"Did you ever see a man as white as a lily, with cheeks like a red apple?"

"Well, what if I have?"

"Aint I the very boy, I guess?"

The good widow Van Schrift listened at first to this dialogue with fear and trembling. But when her ears caught the music of the skin like the lily and cheeks like a red apple, her apprehensions at once subsided. She thought to herself there could be no possible danger in admitting such a harmless man, and accordingly forthwith caused the door to be opened unto him.

Then did there enter unto them a tall, plump youth, as wet as a drowned rat. He advanced towards the ladies with little or no ceremony, pulled off his hat and overcoat, and sat down without an invitation. He did full justice to his description of himself, for his forehead was fair to look upon, and the pelting of the pitiless storm had caused his cheeks to assume the hue of celestial rosy red.

The heart of the widow yearned with compassion at his forlorn wet state, and she ordered a suit of the deceased worshipful Mynheer Van Schrift, her late husband, to be brought, decorously retiring with her daughter into the adjoining bed-room while the stranger was investing himself therewith. When the widow returned, she was delighted at the improvement which the person of the stranger exhibited, and little Marithee, who was then just beginning to unfold those mysterious sympathies of womanhood which wake the first sigh in the innocent, uncorrupted bosom, almost wished that "heaven had made her such a man."

The widow, as she certainly had a right to do, felt somewhat curious to know who her visitor was, and whence he came. But it seemed as if he had been born without the faculty of answering questions. He dealt altogether in the interrogative.

"I suppose you come from up Sound?" she ventured to ask.

"Was you ever up that way?" replied the mysterious visitor.

"I've been as far as Hell-gate."

After a pause the widow commenced again, while her little daughter could not keep her eyes off the stranger, whose forehead was so white and cheeks so red.

"I suppose you were driven in here by the storm?"

"Did you ever happen to see such a gale as this before?" answered Joe Bowers, for that was his name, although as yet it remained a profound secret.

"Did you come from Varsche river, or along thereabouts?"

"Did you ever hear of Old Hadley?"

"No—I can't say I did."

"Well, I didn't come from quite there. But did you ever hear of East Hadley?"

"No—not that I know of."

"Well, I didn't come from quite there neither. Maybe you've heard of South Hadley?"

"Never heard of such a place."

"I suppose you think I come exactly right off the reel from there, don't you?"

"Well," said the widow, a little impatiently, though she couldn't help admiring his red cheeks and blue eyes; "well, I don't want to know where you didn't come from, but where you did."

"A pretty considerable nice room you've got here, I cus-notcher," quoth Joe Bowers, looking around with a pretty particular knowing look.

The widow began to feel fidgety. Her curiosity waxed troublesome, and she thought to herself that she would get it all out of him on the morrow. Accordingly she questioned him no more that night, and shortly after Joe Bowers was fast asleep in the spare bed-room. As for the widow, she could not sleep all night for her curiosity, and little Marithee was not much better off, though not exactly troubled with the same inconvenience.

Next morning Joe Bowers arose betimes, and so did the widow, and so did little Marithee, who put on her best cap and high-heel shoes to make herself look tall. But her mother scolded her and made the poor girl go and put them off. Before Joe Bowers had been up half an hour, he had travelled from the garret to the cellar, and could have made an inventory of every thing in the house, without missing a tea-cup.

"A pretty considerable comfortable place," thought Joe; "and a pretty considerable clever likely-looking widow, and what a spruce little kritter of a gal!"

Joe staid all the next day at the house of the widow; that is, he made it his "hum," as he said, but he was running in and out all day long; seeing into every thing, asking questions of everybody, and answering none. The honest citizens began to wonder who he could be, for the town was at that time so small that a stranger made almost as great a sensation there as in a country village.

"Mein goot!" said Claus Ripse to Hans Elsnyck—"mein goot, if I don't believe he is an interloper or a spy from Varsche river!"

"He speered me a thousand questions," said Hans, "and never answered me one."

"Dat is very suspicious."

"Very—I tink I don't know what to tink—I shall go to Alderman Kortrecht about it."

"Stay, stay, stop a little while till we see more of him," quoth the other; and it was agreed they should have an eye on this curious stranger.

But the widow—the buxom widow! Body o'me, what a quandary she was in before this day was over. Her curiosity became insupportable. She had no peace of her life, and did nothing but drop stitches while she was knitting stockings. She tried Joe Bowers at all points, but it would not do. She might as well have let it alone; for though she got answers, they were nothing but questions.

All that day passed, and Joe seemed, by the time evening came, to be quite as much at home as the widow or little Maritchee herself, who were born and brought up in the place. He was a gay, diverting busybody of a fellow, always making himself agreeable by telling stories about other people, and guessing where everybody else was certain. Joe was never quite certain of any thing in his life; but he was sometimes pretty considerably so or thereabouts.

"I shall die if I don't find out who he is, where he came from, what brought him here, and, above all, what keeps him here," sighed the widow Van Heilig Schrift, whose husband never kept a secret from her in his life. I suppose this was the reason she was so impatient to get at the secret of Joe Bowers.

Little Maritchee sighed too, but I believe it was not actually so much from curiosity to know who he was, as from not knowing exactly what ailed her.

By the time Joe Bowers had staid three days in New-Amsterdam, the widow was bewitched, and the whole town be-devilled with curiosity. Not a soul knew any more about him than the moment he first appeared, while he had got at the bottom of all the secrets in town, not forgetting those of the widow. The most interesting of all those secrets was the secret that the widow, though neither so young nor so pretty as her daughter, was what might be called the gray mare—that is to say, she was twice as rich as little Maritchee.

The unfortunate widow Van Schrift grew worse every day. She had no peace of her life, and at night, when she did chance to fall asleep, did nothing but toss about and dream of the boy with a white skin and cheeks as red as an apple. Such are the melancholy consequences of unsatisfied curiosity in the female mind.

"Mein goot!" said Claus Ripse, after Joe Bowers had turned him inside out, and pumped him of all his affairs without answering a single question of honest Claus. "Mein goot, Hans Elsnick, but he must be a spy. It is high time to go to the governor and the scheepens about it."

"By mein zeil," quoth Hans, "and I tink so too." So away they went to report the mysterious stranger to the city authorities.

The destinies of the good city of New-Amsterdam were at this period confided to the direction of his excellency William Kieft, a most vigilant and valiant guardian, who suffered neither wrong nor encroachment without manfully defending himself by argument and scholarship. All his wars were carried on with his arch enemies, the interlopers of Varsche river, in Latin. If they took possession of his territory, he fired away a Latin manifesto; in doing which he displayed great statesmanship, seeing this was the way they at that time exorcised witches and evil demons; and as the worthy and worshipful magistrate was wont to affirm, the English about Varsche river were one-half witch the other half duyvel. "Pro agro nostro Hartfordiensi, annuo persolvent præpotentiss. D. D. Ordinibus Fœd. Provinciarum, Belgicarum," &c. &c. said Governor Kieft; but the English paid no attention to his conjuration, while they continued overrunning his oyster-beds.

These disputes, combining with the difference of language, habits, and manners, had prevented all intercourse except diplomatic, between the people of the Varsche river and the citizens of New-Amsterdam; the latter had never before seen such a specimen of a man as Joe Bowers, and it is therefore not to be wondered at that he occasioned a mighty sensation among them.

Being, in consequence of the information of Claus Ripse and Hans Elsnick, brought before the governor and his council, the former proceeded to interrogate him, through the medium of an interpreter.

"What is your name?"

"Do you think I can remember when I was christened?"

said Joe. "I say, mister, what might your name be?" continued he, addressing himself to the interpreter.

"Verdraagen den Duyvel," muttered the interpreter.

"That's a tarnaal queer name," said Joe.

"I say, what is your name?" repeated the interpreter.

"Did you ever hear of one Abishai Peabody?" quoth Joe.

"Write down Abishai Peabody," said the interpreter to the clerk. "He says his name is Abishai Peabody."

"I say, mister, what makes you think my name is Peabody?"

"Why, you said so just now, didn't you?"

"But maybe you've heard of one Zerubbabel Doolittle?"

"Write down Zerubbabel Doolittle," shouted the interpreter, "and scratch out Abishai Peabody."

"Why, plague on't, do you think I've got such an ugly name as that?" said Joe.

"By St. Van Paulus!" cried the impatient little governor, "if you don't plead guilty to some name, you shall have no name at all before long."

"Why, darnation, squire, how will you make that out?"

"By Herodes den Grooten, but I'll show you!"

"You will, will you?" answered Joe.

"Did you come here by land?"

"Why, do you cusnotcher I'm a fool to come by land when I can come down by water?"

"Then you came by water?"

"Why, d'ye think I'm such a clear fool as to come by water when I've got two such legs as these to carry me?"

"Der blindheed!" quoth Governor Kieft, "but I believe the duyvel dropt him flying."

"What brought you here?" resumed the interpreter.

"What brought me here? Do you think I couldn't get here without being brought, squire?"

"What business have you?"

"Can't you see with half an eye? Maybe, I'm a gentleman."

"So then you had no business here?"

"Do you think I'm such a gander as to come here for nothing at all?"

Thus the examination went on in the most satisfactory manner, and, at the conclusion, Joe was shut up with the constable in a back room, where he got out of him all the history of his family for ten generations. In the mean time the governor and council were listening to the clerk, who, in a sonorous voice, was reading the questions and answers he had written down with particular accuracy. Never were a set of worthy city magistrates so puzzled. They could make nothing out of Joe except a most artful and thorough-bred spy, who had come among them for the purpose of debauching the subjects of their high mightinesses from their allegiance. The little testy governor declared it was a series of the most artful evasions he ever saw, and forthwith proposed to issue a Latin proclamation, in the mean time holding this suspicious personage to bail. All which was agreed to nem. con., from a clear conviction that the governor would turn every one that differed with him out of office in the twinkling of an eye.

While this was passing, the widow Van Heilig Schrift was in great tribulation of spirit, and so, for that matter, was her pretty little daughter Maritchee. Both knew that our hero was in the hands of justice, and neither for what.

By and by, after the breaking up of the council, the governor took his stick, and, as he was wont in those rustic times, walked forth smoking his pipe, joking the wealthy burghers, chucking their buxom wives under the chin, and puffing tobacco smoke into the eyes of the little urchins, wherat they were right pleased, having a sort of instinctive love for such savoury incense. In the course of his walk he came to where the widow Van Heilig Schrift was sitting disconsolate on her stoop, with her daughter, devoured by curiosity about honest Joe Bowers. His excellency had a great respect for the widow, and loved little Maritchee as if she had been his own daughter, always calling her his "leetle blumenchee," which means rosebud.

The widow inquired anxiously about the young man who had been taken away from her, and the governor was just as eager for information. Both found they were equally ignorant of the name and purposes of the mysterious stranger. The widow, who yearned to see Joe Bowers once more, in hopes of gratifying her curiosity, cunningly insinuated that if his excellency would place him under her care, she would not only be answerable for his conduct and forthcoming when required, but would engage "to get it all out of him in the course of a few days."

The governor had a great opinion of Madam Van Heilig Schrift's skill in affairs of this sort, never having himself been able to keep a secret from that worthy woman. He therefore assented to the proposal, and accordingly Joe Bowers again gladdened the heart of the widow and little Maritchee by his agreeable presence.

The widow commenced by asking him fifteen thousand questions, which he answered by fifteen thousand questions more; so they were even thus far. Little Maritchee uttered not a word, but she looked fifteen thousand with her dark eyes.

"So, den, the widow Schrift is going to be married to dat blindheed dere dat nobody knows any ting about," quoth Claus Ripse to his wife.

"Yaw," said the good woman, "and her husband has pees teat only eleven months and thirteen days."

"Huyswife der duyvel!" muttered Claus, and soon enveloped himself in the obscurity of a great fog of his own raising.

It was even so. The curiosity of the widow had become ungovernable. It was a matter of life and death with her. She must know all about Joe Bowers or die. At last she came to a determination to marry him, having discovered with the sure instinct of an experienced widow, that Joe had no objection to such a procedure.

"If I don't get it all out of him, then," thought she, "I'm no widow. One thing is certain, I shall get at his name."

Not long after, the good people of New-Amsterdam, more especially the widows, were scandalized at the marriage of the widow Van Heilig Schrift and Joseph Bowers, Esquire, as he was pleased to denominate himself. The widow at last got at his name, but she had like to have missed it; for when the dominie came to inquire about it, he asked the good man so many questions in reply that he shut up his book in dudgeon, and was just on the point of breaking off the match. So Joe Bowers was obliged to answer one question at last.

But this was the beginning and the end of his communications. The widow never got another direct answer from him during the whole course of her life afterwards; at which she was sorely disappointed, especially as the governor called almost every day to know if she had brought her husband to confession. She took these disappointments so to heart, that she pined away and lost all her beauty. And so, indeed, did little Maritchee, though it was not on account of being disappointed in her curiosity.

"You don't love me, Josey," said the good whilome widow, coaxingly. "You don't love me, or you'd tell me all about it, Josey."

"All about what?" quoth Joe.

"Why, about who you are, how you came here, and what is your business at home, my dear. Now do tell me, won't you?"

"You've maybe heard something of Connecticut river?" said Joe.

"O, to be sure I have, my dear," said the good creature, rubbing her hands and thinking it was all coming now—"you mean the Varsche river; well?"

"Well, do you think I was such a gander as to be born there? But you've heard of the Housatonic, close by, just a great way off yonder?"

"O, yes! Well."

"Well, I suppose I wasn't born in another guess place than that?"

The whilome widow hereupon took up a broom and made such martial demonstrations towards Joe Bowers, that he vanished from her sight in the twinkling of a bed-post. She took to her bed and sent for a doctor, who said she had something on her mind, and so she had—it was curiosity.

But Joe was inexorable, or rather he could not get over the force of habit. Upon this the widow went all about town praising her first husband to the skies. But Joe was not content with keeping his own secrets; he had another pestilent habit, which at first excited the disgust, then the wonder, then the admiration, and finally the imitation of the good people of New-Amsterdam.

He was forever moving about from one house to another, and hardly ever staid six months in the same place. He was perpetually making alterations and improvements, and confounding his fellow-citizens with new plans. But the climax of his enormities was building a house with the front to the street instead of the gable end. The good people looked on at first, as I said before, with disgust and horror to see Joe Bowers buying one house, selling another, renting and abandoning, till in process of time he had lived in almost every house in the city. They inquired what could possibly set him whizzing and frisking about in this fashion, but all they got was a question, how they could bear to live all the time in one place.

I don't know how it came to pass, but so it certainly is, there is in all living things a sympathy, which renders it next to impossible for one person to sit still when all about him is in motion. It was not many years before the next door neighbour of Joe Bowers was smitten with this habit of locomotion, and began to move from one house to another. Anon, a third, a fourth, and so on, followed his example, until at last the "duyvel," as Governor Keift said, got into the whole town, which seemed running round in a circle, as children do in the sport of the hen and chickens. They were in such a hurry to get out of one house into another, that they trod on each other's heels, and such was the confusion occasioned by this perpetual motion, that Governor Keift was fain to pass an ordinance that they should be restricted to one day in the year for playing puss in a corner. And this is the origin of that ancient and venerable custom of moving on the first day of May, which is peculiar to the city of New-Amsterdam.

In the mean time poor Mrs. Joe Bowers had fallen a victim to her unsatisfied curiosity. She died of what the doctor called a decline; but it was in fact nothing but a broken heart, occasioned by her unsuccessful endeavours to find out what brought Joe to town, and where he came from.

Not many years after her decease, Joe, not being able to endure the tyrannical restriction of being allowed to move only once a year, disposed of all the property of the widow and her step-daughter, little Maritchee, and departed from New-Amsterdam with that desirable maiden as his lawful wife. Report says that she actually got at his secret at last, but the story is somewhat doubtful. Joe Bowers (thus far is certain) passed the rest of his days moving to and fro, and building houses up and down Varsche river, which he sold before they were half finished, and was wont to boast till his dying day that he never directly answered but two questions in his life, and those he would have dodged could he possibly have got married without telling his name.

PAST, PRESENT, AND FUTURE;

OR WAS, IS, AND WILL BE.

A DECREPID old gentleman being once overtaken on the road by a lusty youth, they agreed to jog on together, as they were travelling the same way. The former was armed with a tremendous sword, which he could just trail along the ground; and the other with a smaller one, which he hardly seemed to feel.

As they proceeded on, the old gentleman talked a great deal of the antiquity of his family, the dignity of his ancestors, and what a strong, valiant, learned, rich, powerful man he was a great while ago. Whenever the youth ventured to make an observation, give his advice, or do any thing of his own accord, he flouted him about his being but a boy, and bade him look up to him on all occasions, follow in his footsteps, and do as he did.

One day they came to a great forest, out of which there rushed a roaring lion, who made after the old gentleman, with his mouth wide open. The good man called upon his ancestors, and invoked their bones to come and protect him. But the youth, without saying a word, drew his sword, and saved the old gentleman's life by slaying the lion.

"Pretty well, I declare," cried the old gentleman, "considering how young you are. But what a pitiful little sword you've got there. Look at mine—if I could only draw it out, and manage it afterwards, I should be invincible. But of what consequence is that? My renowned ancestor, Sir Guy of Warwick could wield it in his left hand. Did you ever hear of him? He killed a great red cow with it one day."

Passing on through the forest they met a couple of robbers, and the old gentleman, who insisted on always going before, was near being killed, because he was too weak to manage his great sword, before the other came up to his assistance; which he did, however, just in time to slay one of the robbers, and put the other to flight.

"By the glory of my illustrious ancestors!" exclaimed the old gentleman, "but you're quite a promising lad; not that I think it any great feat to kill a robber or two. My great-great-grandfather's uncle's cousin, Sir Bevis of Hampton, once slew a hundred and sixty of them before breakfast. But don't be discouraged, my good lad, you'll be able to do something clever by and by."

Proceeding onwards they came to a river, which they attempted to wade through, the old gentleman insisting, as usual, to go before. But he had not yet come to the depth of the stream before his great sword got betwixt his legs, and he would have been carried away by the current and drowned, if the youth had not come to his assistance, and borne him safely over.

"Bravo!" said the old gentleman, his teeth chattering and his limbs trembling; "bravo! I declare you're quite a considerable swimmer. But you should have seen me when I was young. I once swam over the Hellespont and back again; but never mind, don't be discouraged, I dare say you'll make a tolerable swimmer in time."

As they emerged from the forest, they came to a great city in ruins, which the old gentleman pronounced the most glorious relic of antiquity he had ever seen.

"Heavens! what a superb place this has been in its day! I must announce my arrival to the governor. But, now I think of it, my fingers are grown so stiff, and my eyes so dim, I can't write. Do you pen a note for me."

The youth did so, and the old gentleman expressed his surprise that he wrote such a good hand, and spelled his words so correctly.

"But you should have seen what a hand some of my illustrious ancestors wrote. My great-great-great-great-aunt's second cousin by the mother's side was the best writer of his age, and composed books of philosophy, which were the admiration of the world. But never mind, boy, you'll improve in time."

The youth smiled good-naturedly, and archly replied, "What a glorious piece of work it is to have had every thing done for us by our ancestors!"

"Glorious, indeed!" cried the old gentleman; "I can neither fight, write, nor swim, but then my ancestors were prodigious hands at all these."

After travelling several days they came into a new country, just settled, where the youth had built himself a snug, comfortable house, and frankly invited the old gentlemen to stop and rest himself a while. He did so, and sojourned several days, partaking of the plenty and hospitality of the youth. When going away he said,

"Very well; upon my soul, quite respectable. I declare I'd no idea you were so comfortable. But you must go home with me, and then you'll see something worth seeing. I'll show you how people with a long line of ancestors live. But you must not be discouraged. You are getting on quite cleverly and your posterity a thousand years hence may very likely be quite decent fellows."

The youth being fond of roving and seeing sights, consented, and they departed together. It was a long way off, but at length the old gentleman exclaimed proudly,

"See! yonder is the abode of my illustrious ancestors!"

The youth raised his eyes, and saw an old ivy-crowned turret, rearing its gray head above a wood. They passed up a long avenue, shaded by decayed old trees, the straggling branches of which bore a few pining yellow leaves, and on each side were decayed old walls of bricks, half crumbled to pieces.

The old gentleman conducted the youth to the door of his castle, where sat an aged, gray-headed porter, so stiff in the joints that he could scarcely stand, and he took almost a quarter of an hour to open the door.

"Poor fellow!" said the old gentleman proudly, "his ancestor was one of the strongest and most active men in the world. He kept out a whole troop of rebels once by placing his back against the door."

The old gentleman led his guest through a long suite of unfurnished rooms, cold, gloomy, and comfortless, until at last he came into one that was hung with old tapestry, the figures and patterns of which had become so indistinct nobody could tell what they were.

"There!" cried he, with exultation, "there is one of the records of the glories of my illustrious house. That tapestry was given to an ancestor of the sixteenth generation backwards, by King Fergus, or Farragut, or—no matter what his name was—for having run down a fat buck, that had so tired the hounds of the king that his majesty was doubtful whether he should have any dinner that day. My ancestor was ennobled at the same time for this feat."

At supper there was great state and little to eat; but the old gentleman made it up by detailing an account of a grand entertainment given to king somebody by his great ancestor, earl somebody, whereat was served up six thousand hens, fifteen hundred geese, forty thousand red herrings, and as many thousand fresh eggs, and where was drank and wasted beer enough to make a Serpentine river. Upon the whole, however, the youth had a pretty uncomfortable time of it. He slept in a cold damp chamber, the curtains of which were half mouldered away, like the old tapestry, and the windows rattled and squeaked and groaned at an awful rate. His meals were scanty and unsocial, but always seasoned by his host with long narratives of times past, and of the glories of his illustrious ancestors.

When the youth took his leave, nearly half starved, the old gentleman said, with a proud condescending courtesy, mixed with a vast portion of the overweening vanity of dotage,

"Well, you see how my illustrious ancestors lived, and what great things they performed in their time. But you must not be discouraged when you think of the vast difference between us. I dare swear you'll be a tolerably decent sort of a fellow, WHEN YOU GET TO BE AS OLD AS I AM!"

Letters from Correspondents.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

MESSRS. EDITORS.—So much has been lately said in your amusing paper, respecting the modes and manners prevalent among the higher classes of this city, and the articles generally have been written in such a sprightly tone of ridicule, that I feel inclined to trouble you with a few remarks on the other side of the question. I belong to that portion of the children of humanity which you gentlemen are accustomed to call the fair sex, and whom every polite writer terms "lovely reader," and "dear reader," with other winning specimens of conciliating phraseology, while they seize upon our little peculiarities of dress or conversation with as much avidity as a hungry dog snaps at a piece of meat. I am willing to admit that, as we progress towards a state of wealth and luxury, and the distinctions between genteel society and mere human beings begin to arise, as insurmountable barriers, which forbid their mutual intercourse, innovations upon the old style of things will invariably creep in, which sometimes assume the shape of absurdities or abuses. It is not my intention to deny that these do exist among us, nor that they are proper themes for the satirist. His pen is more effectual than the sword of justice in frightening away paltry foibles and vices; but it is not fair for the lively and forcible writers of the day to confine themselves exclusively to those features of our manners which are unworthy approbation. They should at least allow, that only a small proportion of our young men are fops and dunces, and that all our ladies are neither coquettes nor ambitious belles. I never heard of any state of society which was entirely free from objects of derision, and whenever they appear they should be lashed till they are ashamed or afraid to show their faces. But compare the circles which at present enliven the dwellings of this city with grace, wit, and beauty, with those of other countries, and you must acknowledge that our subjects of complaint are nothing to our themes of congratulation. It is complimentary to our moral character that even the penetrating glance of irony can detect in the community no crimes more atrocious than a too eager desire for display, an increasing interest in social enjoyments, and a slight tinge of aristocracy, calculated to awaken rather merriment than indignation. Long may it be before we furnish more serious cause for the shafts of wit or the frown of wisdom, before the brilliant halls of fashion are infested with more dangerous individuals than rustling maidens, with leg of mutton sleeves, and aspiring young gentlemen with harmless mustachios. At present the moral perceptions of all classes are not undimmed; custom has not yet afflicted us with flagrant outrages upon decency and virtue. We are not compelled to endure violations of laws, human and divine, by the overbearing influence of wealth and power. In many of the old countries of Europe the fashionable villain passes triumphantly through the highest circles, glorying in the effrontery with which he tramples on every honourable principle and natural feeling; and females, studying intrigue as a science, turn innocence and modesty into derision. Praised be fortune, if there are profligates among us they are amenable to the tribunal of public opinion, which, happily combining integrity to reprobate, with authority to punish, brands the practised libertine as an object of abhorrence.

The best method, however, of guarding us from those vices which have corrupted others, is to watch their origin, and kill them before they arrive at maturity. I trust, therefore, your esteemed and talented correspondents will not lay aside the whip, but use it with an unsparing hand, against every thing calculated to interrupt our peace or profane our simplicity. Be assured, gentlemen, in the prosecution of so laudable a design, however you may be abused by those who smart under the castigation, you will be supported by the approbation of all who really belong to what some have, in derision, termed "good society."

LITERARY NOTICES.

Legends of New-England. By John G. Whittier. Hartford. Hanner and Phelps. 12mo. pp. 142. 1831.

THERE could scarcely be a more imposing title to an American public than that of the present volume. It has been generally believed that our country labours under an immense disadvantage in its inferiority to other nations in traditional lore, and in those materials of history which, imperfectly seen through the dim mist of time, are calculated to arouse the most interesting associations. This is partially true; but we have scarcely yet a right to complain, as those materials which do actually exist among us, have by no means been exhausted. Productions similar to Yamoyden and Hope Leslie are rarely given to the world; and although Irving, Paulding, Halleck, Bryant, Brainard, and a few others, have produced several graphic delineations of American scenery; and Mr. Cooper has in one or two instances endeavoured, with much success, to interweave with his narratives, characters, and incidents purely American, yet we contend that a very rich soil has yet been left for the cultivation of the future poet and novelist. It is true, that the traveller over the United States does not feel himself at every step treading upon classic ground. He cannot go forth in the shades of evening, and muse among ivy-grown castles crumbling into ruins, and swarming with the associations of history. He cannot brood over the tombs of kings and warriors, poets and philosophers, like the sojourner in "earth's proudest isle." The hallowed influence of ages is not upon our cities, our temples, or our institutions; and it would be useless to deny that we have had no Shakespeares and Miltons to hallow the spots where they have lived, and where their ashes repose; yet we are by no means destitute of themes for the writer, both curious and interesting, although they are of a different description, and the title of the volume now before us is precisely of a kind to awaken expectation. Mr. Whittier has very happily chosen his subject; but he has not availed himself to a very great extent of the advantages which it affords. Indeed in his preface he frankly declares that he has no hope but to call the attention of others to the legends upon which he has only slightly touched. We can scarcely forgive him for having shuffled off his task in so careless a manner, especially as the few trifles contained in his work are exceedingly well wrought up, are clothed in the language of a practised and able writer, and touch upon the most curious features in the history of New-England, viz. the Indian traditions, and the dark and bloody period of witchcraft. He offers no satisfactory apology for having opened the mine, without exploring more thoroughly its treasures. It betrays that absence of literary enthusiasm, for which perhaps the public is more to blame than the author; and that exclusive devotedness to the mere business transactions of life, which may create good merchants and rich men, but which will never make successful writers. He is on the spot, and probably within reach of the best sources of information at present in existence, and is hardly excusable for having used so little research in preparing the present collection. His little volume, however, will be acceptable to the public. It consists of several sketches, in prose and verse, all of which we have read with pleasure. As a poet Mr. Whittier possesses undoubted genius; and his prose efforts, although apparently thrown off without labour, are evidently the offspring of a ready pen.

We are so much pleased with the following that we extract it, notwithstanding several inaccuracies of style, which might have been easily corrected:

A NIGHT AMONG THE WOLVES.

"The gaunt wolf,
Scenting the place of slaughter with his long
And most offensive howl, did ask for blood."

"The wolf—the gaunt and ferocious wolf! How many tales of wild horror are associated with its name! Tales of the deserted battle-field—where the wolf and the vulture feast together—a horrible and obscene banquet, realizing the fearful description of the Siege of Corinth, when—

"On the edge of a gulf
There sat a raven flapping a wolf," amidst the cold and stiffening corpses of the fallen; or of the wild Scandinavian forests, where the peasant sinks down exhausted amid the drifts of winter, and the wild wolf-howl sounds fearfully in his deafening ear, and lean forms and evil eyes gather closer and closer around him, as if impatient for the death of the doomed victim.

"The early settlers of New-England were not unfrequently greatly incommoded by the numbers and ferocity of the wolves, which prowled around their rude settlements. The hunter easily overpowered them, and with one discharge of his musket scattered them from about his dwelling. They fled even from the timid child, in the broad glare of day—but in the thick and solitary night, far away from the dwellings of men, they were terrible, from their fiendish and ferocious appetite for blood.

"I have heard a fearful story of the wolf, from the lips of some of the old settlers of Vermont. Perhaps it may be best told in the language of one of the witnesses of the scene:

"'Twas a night of January, in the year 17—. We had been to a fine quilting frolic, about two miles from our little settlement of four or five log-houses. 'Twas rather late—about twelve o'clock, I should guess—when the party broke up. There was no moon—and a dull, gray shadow or haze hung all around the horizon, while overhead a few pale and sickly-looking stars gave us their dull light, as they shone through a dingy curtain. There were six of us in company—Harry Mason and myself, and four as pretty girls as ever grew up this side of the Green Mountains. There were my two sisters and Harry's sister and his sweetheart, the daughter of our next door neighbour. She was a right down handsome girl—that Caroline Allen. I never saw her equal, though I am no stranger to pretty faces. She was so pleasant and kind of heart—so gentle and sweet-spoken, and so intelligent besides, that every body loved her. She had an eye as blue as the hill-violet, and her lips were like a red rose-leaf in June. No wonder that Harry Mason loved her—boy though he was—for we had neither of us seen our seventeenth summer.

"Our path lay through a thick forest of oak, with here and there a tall pine raising its dark, full shadow against the sky, with an outline rendered indistinct by the thick darkness. The snow was deep—deeper a great deal than it ever falls of late years—but the surface was frozen strongly enough to bear our weight, and we hurried on over the white pathway with rapid steps. We had not proceeded far before a low, long howl came to our ears. We all knew it in a moment; and I could feel a shudder thrilling the arms that were folded close to my own, as a sudden cry burst from the lips of all of us—'The wolves—the wolves!'

"Did you ever see a wild wolf—not one of your caged, broken-down, show-animals, which are exhibited for sixpence a sight, children half price—but a fierce, half-starved ranger of the wintry forest, howling and hurrying over the barren snow, actually mad with hunger? There is no one of God's creatures which has such a frightful, fiendish look, as this animal. It has the form as well as the spirit of a demon.

"Another, and another howl—and then we could hear distinctly the quick patter of feet behind us. We all turned right about, and looked in the direction of the sound.

"The devils are after us," said Mason, pointing to a line of dark, gliding bodies. And so in fact they were—a whole troop of them—howling like so many Indians in a powwow. We had no weapons of any kind; and we knew enough of the nature of the vile creatures who followed us to feel that it would be useless to contend without them. There was not a moment to lose—the savage beasts were close upon us. To attempt flight would have been a hopeless affair. There was but one chance of escape, and we instantly seized upon it.

"To the tree—let us climb this tree!" I cried, springing forwards towards a low-boughed and gnarled oak, which I saw at a glance might be easily climbed into.

"Harry Mason sprang lightly into the tree, and aided in placing the terrified girls in a place of comparative security among the thick boughs. I was the last on the ground, and the whole troop were yelling at my heels before I reached the rest of the company. There was one moment of hard breathing and wild exclamations among us, and then a feeling of calm thankfulness for our escape. The night was cold—and we soon began to shiver and shake, like so many sailors on the top-mast of an Iceland whaler. But there were no murmurs—no complaining among us—for we could distinctly see the gaunt, attenuated bodies of the wolves beneath us, and every now and then we could see great, glowing eyes, staring up into the tree where we were seated. And then their yells—they were loud and long and devilish!

"I know not how long we had remained in this situation, for we had no means of ascertaining the time—when I heard a limb of the tree cracking, as if breaking down beneath the weight of some of us; and a moment after a shriek went through my ears like the piercing of a knife. A light form went plunging down through the naked branches, and fell with a dull and heavy sound upon the stiff snow.

"Oh, God! I am gone!"

"It was the voice of Caroline Allen. The poor girl never spoke again! There was a horrible dizziness and confusion in my brain, and I spoke not—and I stirred not—for the whole was at that time like an ugly, unreal dream. I only remember that there were cries and shudderings around me; perhaps I joined with them—and that there were smothered groans and dreadful howls underneath. It was all over in a moment. Poor Caroline! She was literally eaten alive. The wolves had a frightful feast, and they became raving mad with the taste of blood.

"When I came fully to myself—when the horrible dream went off—and it lasted but a moment—I struggled to shake off the arms of my sisters, which were clinging around me, and could I have cleared myself I should have jumped down among the raging animals. But when a second thought came over me, I knew that any attempt at rescue would be useless. As for poor Mason, he was wild with horror. He had tried to follow Caroline when she fell, but he could not shake off the grasp of his terrified sister. His youth, and weak constitution and frame, were unable to withstand the dreadful trial; and he stood close by my side, with his hands firmly clenched and his teeth set closely, gazing down upon the dark, wrangling creatures below, with the fixed stare of a maniac. It was indeed a terrible scene. Around us was the thick, cold night—and below, the ravenous wild beasts were lapping their bloody jaws, and howling for another victim.

"The morning broke at last; and our frightful enemies fled at the first advance of daylight, like so many cowardly murderers. We waited until the sun had risen before we ventured to crawl down from our resting-place. We were chilled through—every limb was numb with cold and terror—and poor Mason was delirious, and raved wildly about the dreadful things he had witnessed. There were bloody stains all around the tree; and two or three long locks of dark hair were trampled into the snow.

"We had gone but a little distance when we were met by our friends from the settlement, who had become alarmed at our absence. They were shocked at our wild and frightful appearance; and my brothers have oftentimes told me that at first view we all seemed like so many crazed and brain-stricken creatures. They assisted us to reach our homes; but Harry Mason never recovered fully from the dreadful trial. He neglected his business, his studies, and his friends, and would sit alone for hours together, ever and anon muttering to himself about that horrible night. He fell to drinking soon after, and died a miserable drunkard, before age had whitened a hair of his head.

"For my own part, I confess I have never entirely overcome the terrors of the melancholy circumstance which I have endeavoured to describe. The thought of it has haunted me like my own shadow; and even now, the whole scene comes at times freshly before me in my dreams, and I start up with something of the same feeling of terror which I experienced when, more than half a century ago, I passed A NIGHT AMONG THE WOLVES."

The following is a specimen of Mr. Whittier's abilities in the ballad style. We have no hesitation in awarding to it our most unqualified approbation, and congratulate the public upon the appearance of a writer capable of picturing, with such a vivid imagination, the old floating traditions of the country. The story is founded on a passage in the works of Cotton Mather, where that learned divine informs us, that, at the dead of the night, the "witches and prestigious spirits and demons," who persecuted, by means of their spells and incantations, the good people of Massachusetts Bay, were assembled together by the sound of a great trumpet. The place of the evil gathering was somewhere near Naumkeag, now Salem.

THE WEIRD GATHERING.

A trumpet in the darkness blown—
A peal upon the air—
The church-yard answers to its tone
With boding shriek and wail and groan—
The dead are gliding there!
It rose upon the still midnight,
A summons long and clear—
The wakeful shuddered with affright—
The dreaming sleeper sprang upright,
And pressed his stunning ear.
The Indian, where his serpent eye
Beneath the green-wood shone,
Started, and tossed his arms on high,
And answered, with his own wild cry,
The sky's unearthly tone.
The wild birds rose in startled flocks,
As the long trumpet swelled;

* Perhaps the foregoing may be deemed improbable. It is, however, an oral tradition, which is as well authenticated as any thing of the kind may well be. It is one of a series of strange legends of encounters with the wild beasts of a new country, which have descended to us from our hazy forefathers, and which are still preserved in the memories of their children.

And loudly from their old, gray rocks,
The gaunt, fierce wolf, and caverned fox
In mutual terror yelled.

There is a wild and haunted glen,
'Twixt Saugus and Naumkeag—
'Tis said of old that wizard men
And demons to that spot have been
To consecrate their league.

A fitting place for such as these—
That small and sterile plain,
So girt about with tall old trees,
Which rock and groan in every breeze,
Like spirits cursed with pain.

It was the witch's trysting place—
The wizard's chosen ground,
Where the accursed of human race
With demons gathered, face to face,
By the midnight trumpet's sound.

And there that night the trumpet rang,
And rock and hill replied,
And down the glen strange shadows sprang,
Mortal and fiend—a wizard gang—
Seen dimly side by side.

They gathered there from every land
That sleepeth in the sun—
They came with spell and charm in hand,
Waiting their master's high command—
Slaves to the evil one!

From islands of the far-off seas—
From Hecla's ice and flame—
From where the loud and savage breeze
Grows through the tall Norwegian trees,
Seer, witch, and wizard came!

And, from the sunny land of palms,
The negro hag was there—
The Greece-greek, with his Obi charms—
The Indian, with his tattooed arms,
And wild and streaming hair!

The gipsy, with her fierce dark eyes,
The worshipper of flame—
The searcher out of mysteries,
Above a human sacrifice—
All—all—together came!

* * * * *

Nay, look not down that lighted dell,
Thou startled traveller!
Thy christian eye should never dwell
On gaunt gray witch, and fiend of hell,
And evil trumpeter!

But, the traveller turned him from his way,
For he heard the revelling—
And saw the red light's wizard ray
Among the dark-leaved branches play,
Like an unholy thing.

He knelt him on the rocks, and cast
A fearful glance beneath—
Wizard and hag before him passed,
Each wilder, fiercer than the last—
His heart grew cold as death!

He saw the dark-browed trumpeter,
In human shape was he;
And witch and fiend and sorcerer,
With shriek and laugh and curses, were Assembled at his knee.

And lo—beneath his straining glance,
A light form stole along—
Free, as if moving to the dance,
He saw her fairy steps advance
Towards the evil throng.

The light along her forehead played—
A wan, unearthly glare;
Her cheek was pale beneath the shade
The wildness of her tresses made,
Yet nought of fear was there!

Now God have mercy on thy brain,
Thou stricken traveller!
Look on thy victim once again,
Bethink thee of her wrongs and pain—
Dost thou remember her?

The traveller smote his burning brow,
For he saw the wronged one there—
He knew her by her forehead's snow,
And by her large blue eye below,
And by her wild, dark hair.

Slowly, yet firm she held her way—
The wizard's song grew still—
The sorcerer left his elvish play,
And hideous imp and beldame gray
Waited the stranger's will.

A voice came up that place of fear—
The trumpeter's hoarse tone—
"Speak—who art thou that comest here
With brow baptized and christian ear,
Unsummoned and alone?"

One moment—and a tremor shook
Her light and graceful frame—
It passed—and then her features took
A fiercer and a haughtier look,
As thus her answer came:

"Spirits of evil—
Workers of doom!
Lo—to your revel,
For vengeance I come!
Vengeance on him
Who hath blighted my fame—
Fill his cup to the brim
With a curse without name?
Let his false heart inherit
The madness of mine,
And I yield ye my spirit,
And bow at your shrine!"

A sound—a mingled laugh and yell,
Went howling fierce and far—
A redder light shone through the dell,
As if the very gates of hell
Swung suddenly ajar.

"Breathe then thy curse, thou daring one,"
A low, deep voice replied—
"Whate'er thou askest shall be done,
The burthen of thy doom upon
The false one shall abide."

The maiden stood erect—her brow
Grew dark as those around her,
As burned upon her lip that vow
Which christian ear may never know—
And the dark fetter bound her!

Ay, there she stood—the holy heaven
Was looking down on her—
An angel from her bright home driven—
A spirit lost and doomed and given
To fiend and sorcerer!

And changed—how changed!—her aspect grew
Fearful and elvish there;
The warm tinge from her cheek withdrew,
And one dark spot of blood-red hue
Burned on her forehead fair.

Wild from her eye of madness shone
The baleful fire within,
As, with a shrill and lifted tone
She made her fearful purpose known,
Before the powers of sin:

"Let my curse be upon him—
The faithless of heart!
Let the smiles that have won him
In frowning depart!
Let his last, cherished blossom
Of sympathy die,
And the hopes of his bosom
In shadows go by!
Ay, curse him—but keep
The poor boon of his breath,
'Till he sigh for the sleep,
And the quiet of death!
Let a viewless one haunt him
With whisper and jeer,
And an evil one daunt him
With phantoms of fear!
Be the fiend unforgiving
That follows his tread;
Let him walk with the living—
Yet gaze on the dead!"

She ceased.—The doomed one felt the spell
Already on his brain;
He turned him from the wizard-dell;
He prayed to heaven; he cursed at hell;
He wept—and all in vain.

The night was one of mortal fear;
The morning rose to him,
Dark as the shroudings of a bier,
As if the blessed atmosphere,
Like his own soul, was dim.

He passed among his fellow men,
With wild and dreamy air,
For, whispering in his ear again
The horrors of the midnight glen,
The demon found him there.

And, when he would have knelt and prayed,
Amidst his household band,
An unseen power his spirit stayed,
And on his moving lip was laid
A hot and burning hand!

The lost one in the solitude
Of dreams he gazed upon,
And, when the holy morning glowed,
Her dark eye shone—her wild hair flowed
Between him and the sun!

His brain grew wild—and then he died;
Yet, ere his heart grew cold,
To the gray priest, who at his side
The strength of prayer and blessing tried,
His fearful tale was told.

* * * * *

They've bound the witch with many a thong—
The holy priest is near her;
And ever as she moves along,
A murmur rises hoarse and strong
From those who hate and fear her.

She's standing up for sacrifice,
Beneath the gallows-tree;
The silent town beneath her lies,
Above her are the summer skies—
Far off—the quiet sea.

So young—so frail—so very fair—
Why should the victim die?—
Look on her brow!—the red stain there
Burns underneath her tangled hair—
And mark her fiery eye!

A thousand eyes are looking up
In scorn and hate to her;
A bony hand hath coiled the rope,
And yawns upon the green hill's slope
The witch's sepulchre!

Ha! she hath spurned both priest and book—
Her hand is tossed on high—
Her curse is loud—she will not brook
The impatient crowd's abiding look—
Hark!—how she shrieks to die!

Up—up—one struggle—all is done!
One groan—the deed is wrought.
Wo—for the wronged and fallen one!—
Her corse is blackening in the sun—
Her spirit—trace it not!

The reader will discover in the "Rattle-snake Hunter," a page of animated and beautiful description, which will impress him with an exalted opinion of the author's versatility of talent. It seemed at first difficult to decide whether he is more fluent in prose or poetry, but the "Weird Gathering" turns the scale in favour of the latter.

"Metacomb," or King Philip, or, according to the fancy of Mr. Stone the dramatist, Metamora, opens with a glowing and truly poetic picture of sunset, and a fine portraiture of the red hero.

"The Spectre Ship" is a poem, imbued with the spirit of the "Rime of the Ancient Mariner."

The "Spectre Warriors," the "Human Sacrifice," the "Indian's Tale," the "Powwow," and the "Last Norridgewock," are beautiful and original Indian sketches. The rest of the volume consists of the "Midnight Attack," the "Murdered Lady," the "Unquiet Sleeper," the "Haunted House," the "White Mountains," the "Mother's Revenge," and the "Aerial Omens," all founded on some legend of New-England. Several of them are productions of superior merit; and we are sorry that the limits of this article will not permit us to notice them more at length.

We cannot conclude without a few observations respecting the tone of modern criticism, which has been so long practised by persons of all classes of information and intellect, as to render its phrases unmeaning, its censure harmless, and its praise mere puffing, without either influence or value. In considering Mr. Whittier's book we have, perhaps, in a measure checked the enthusiasm of our admiration, in order to avoid the inflated style which too universally prevails. Books, infinitely inferior to the "Legends of New-England," have been introduced to the public in terms of unlimited rapture, until all the phraseology of critical applause has been exhausted upon the most insipid and meretricious offsprings of vanity, ignorance, and dullness. The volume before us, if it is to be compared with many others with which the teeming press inundates the community, and if it is to be reviewed in the same spirit, is justly deserving of a much more exalted style of praise than it has received at our hands; for, without exaggeration, we may assert that, with only one or two exceptions, it is decidedly the most agreeable work of the kind we have read since the days of the Sketch Book. Before we opened it, from our previous knowledge of the literary abilities of the author, we anticipated much pleasure, but our expectations were more than realized; and though we will not, in the usual style, inform the public that he is equal to Scott or Irving, we can assure them that the "Legends of New-England" is no trifling addition to the stock of American literature.

Narrative of Discovery and Adventure in Africa, from the earliest ages to the present time; with illustrations of the Geology, Mineralogy, and Zoology. By Professor Jameson, James Wilson, Esq. F.R.S.E., and Hugh Murray, Esq. F.R.S.E.; with a map, plans of the route of Park, and of Denham and Clapperton; and several engravings. New-York. J. & J. Harper. 12mo. pp. 359. Family Library, No. XVI. 1831.

This is a clear and valuable epitome of the various expeditions made into the interior of Africa, and will be advantageously read in connexion with the recent work on the polar regions. It contains much that is interesting and instructive. A mass of information is conveyed in a pleasing and spirited style, by which the utility of historical and philosophical works is combined with the charm of productions of fancy. Hundreds of persons, so actively engaged in business transactions as to be unable to devote much leisure to the study of the interesting subjects which the narrative of discovery and adventure embraces, will here find themselves, at a small expense of time, placed in possession of much to gratify their curiosity; and no intelligent youth can peruse its pages without at once feeling his thoughts exalted to manly subjects, and imbibing a partiality for useful learning. The more we see of this series of publications the more we are inclined to like it. By its means the knowledge, talents, and research of a variety of scientific and enlightened men, in different parts of the world, are concentrated within a small compass, and diffused among a multitude of persons. The volumes are issued at a moderate price, are conducted with care and industry, and in every way deserve immediate and extensive patronage.

Collection of Sermons on the death of the Right Reverend Bishop Hobart, D. D. of the Protestant Episcopal church in the state of New-York; with a Memoir of his Life and Writings. T. & J. Swords. 12mo. pp. 250. New-York. 1831.

A memoir of Bishop Hobart, by the Rev. Mr. Shroeder, is welcome to all classes of society, but particularly to that extensive portion who are attached to the episcopal church. It is in that circle that the virtues and attainments of the distinguished prelate are most justly appreciated, and where deep regret for his loss will induce the most eager avidity to become acquainted with every information relative to his life and opinions. An original sketch of our universally-lamented bishop has been already published in the Mirror, from the pen of Mr. Shroeder, which renders it unnecessary for us to dilate at length upon that which accompanies the collection of sermons, as the leading facts are the same. As a composition it is, as might have been expected from the author, a clear, chaste, and graceful production. The sermons are thirteen in number, and are well calculated to add to the established reputation of the reverend gentlemen by whom they were delivered. Upon a theme so affecting, and addressed to an auditory in whose recollections the virtues and talents of their departed pastor were so vivid, these impressive discourses could scarcely have failed to excite deep interest. The volume does much credit to the taste of the publishers as a specimen of neat typography, to which the fine engraving and accurate likeness of the esteemed subject of the memoir, engraved by W. Maine, from a painting by Paradise, adds an additional value.

Cobb's Juvenile Reader. In Three Books. Collins and Hannay. New-York. 1831.

Agessilaus, king of Sparta, when discovered by the foreign ambassadors playing with his children, asked them if they were fathers, and on being answered in the affirmative, said, "Then I have no occasion to apologise for my occupation." Mr. Lyman Cobb, like his royal prototype, needs no excuse to all fathers, mothers, schoolmasters, &c. for the present series of publications. The first book will be a valuable auxiliary to little curly-headed and rosy-cheeked gentlemen who plume themselves upon having passed through the intricate mysteries of the alphabet. It consists of short and pithy sentences upon familiar subjects: "I never saw a little dog or cat learn to read;" "When you are a large boy you shall have trowsers and a pair of little boots;" and other valuable apothegms, in the spelling-book style.

The second book is adapted to children of a more advanced age, and may be very appropriately used by those who have mastered the first. It contains several stories, written in clear language, and inculcating useful morals.

The third claims a more serious notice. In it much instruction in the elements of natural philosophy and history is conveyed to the more advanced and intelligent reader. The brief chapters on the dog, alum, cork, the horse, heat, liquorice, and light, are precisely the kind of composition to be placed in the hands of youth; and when supported by careful assiduity on the part of the teacher, in explaining in a gentle tone of voice, and in a patient and attractive manner, the proper meaning of the more difficult words and abstruse ideas, Mr. Cobb's book is really worthy the attention of parents and instructors.

New-York Annual Register for 1831.

Only the most indefatigable industry and perseverance, combined with a very general acquaintance with the subject, could have produced a volume so replete with interesting miscellaneous information, as that which Mr. Williams has just published under the above title. It is afforded at a very reasonable price, and should be promptly purchased by all men of business.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

MR. BARTON.

THIS gentleman, from the Theatre-royal, Edinburgh, has appeared as Hamlet, Lear, and Werner. The first is among the most difficult parts he could have attempted. It requires brilliant declamation and marked originality to impart interest to its long speeches and melancholy adventures. Mr. Barton was, therefore, injudicious in his selection. The most prominent features were given about as correctly as they generally are; for it would be difficult for an intelligent man, and one familiar with good acting, as Mr. Barton evidently is, to go altogether wrong in the hackneyed and well-trodden pathway of such characters; but he was plainly treading in the steps of a host of celebrated predecessors. Neither should he have undertaken Lear. The wonderful powers of the elder Kean in the wretched imbecility of the "weak and despised old man," are yet altogether too fresh in the recollections of the public. Mr. Barton's personation, however, was not without good points, and, as a whole, more than respectable. He was applauded throughout. In Werner he was yet more successful. It is better adapted to his capacity than the two former. There is also something in being familiar with the style of a player, who gains confidence, and frees himself from embarrassment, as he becomes accustomed to his audience, and feels that he is appreciated. Werner displayed Mr. Barton very advantageously. He looked and read well; and, at certain periods, particularly the last scene, confirmed us in the opinion that one may make a poor business of Hamlet, Lear, &c. and yet possess fine requisites for success in a different walk of the drama. We would sum up the attainments of Mr. Barton in a few words. A gentlemanly figure and good head, experience in his profession, and intelligence sufficient to render him a favourite, in a sphere, however, less elevated than that in which he has chosen to make his first appearance in America.

LETTERS FROM ENGLAND.

LONDON THEATRICAL PORTRAITS.

MADAME VESTRIS.

ARCH, easy, impudent, pert, sprightly, and agreeable, with a handsome face, a delicious person, a rich, musical voice, and an inexhaustible fund of self-possession, this vivacious lady has pleased, and continues to please on every stage, and in every department of the drama in which she appears. She suits all tastes. It is impossible for any one to dislike her; and just as impossible, I should think, for any to become enthusiastically fond of her acting. There is no depth, nor power, nor sensibility about her. Neither is there the aping or affectation of these things. She is, emphatically, a clever actress, which stands in about the same relation to a great actress as an epigrammatist to a poet; or a shrewd, worldly man to a wise one; and her being a more universal favourite than others of a higher order of merit, is only another proof of what has been proved some thousand times since the world began—that success is a very fallacious test of ability, for the simple reason, that the more the kind of merit is upon a level with the intellects of the majority of the judges, the more likely it is to be appreciated. The lady's talent is purely executorial, and has nothing to do with the higher province of conception—indeed the characters in which she generally appears are not conceptions but copies, or copies of copies of the ephemeral whims and vagaries of the passing hour—trifling and agreeable, and well suited to the prevailing light and superficial taste in theatrical matters; for, without cant, it is light and superficial. I have been told that she plays Rosalind. I should like to see her do so for curiosity's sake; for I cannot imagine a more pleasant and amusing performance, and at the same time more decidedly different from what it ought to be, than Madame Vestris's Rosalind. She will be the arch, lively, free-spoken, well-bred lady of the French court to the life; but any thing rather than the wild, daring, susceptible, romantic Rosalind.

Two-thirds of Madame Vestris's notoriety has arisen from the facility with which she can unsex herself, and the confident boldness with which she makes her bow to the audience in breeches. It is all very well that she does so—half measures are very perplexing and disagreeable; and if a lady makes up her mind to wear this article of apparel, either in public or private, the more decidedly and gracefully she does it the better; but still there must be some affectation in the raptures of the town at witnessing the same. To be sure, no one buttons a coat, adjusts a cravat, wears a hat, handles a cane, or draws on a pair of gloves in the true spirit of knowing and irresistible coxcombery equal to Madame Vestris; and it is really pleasant to sit and see those manly airs and graces played off by a woman, affording, as it does, conclusive evidence that such deep-laid schemes to ensnare the admiration of the fair sex do not always escape detection; yet still the skill and observation requisite to do this may be rated too highly. But Madame Vestris has better, though perhaps weaker claims than this, on the public favour. She has the ability to make wearisome common-place passable, frivolity agreeable, and sprightliness fascinating—a never-flagging jousness of spirit, and an almost Promethean power of imparting a portion of her exuberance of life and animation to the walking, talking, mechanical blocks, by which she is occasionally surrounded. To use a striking, technical phrase, she "keeps the stage alive;" and no man readeth a play-bill while she is there. Her motions are graceful in the extreme, and like a grayhound or a thorough-bred racer, she cannot put herself in an awkward attitude. Her chambermaids have an archness inexpressible; and, if it be a merit, (a stage one it certainly is,) no one equals her in a certain quiet and unutterable mode of giving a double entendre. As a singer, Madame Vestris is deservedly admired. There is a hearty, sensible, straight-forwardness in her manner, and an absence of quackery and pretension in her style that is extremely agreeable. She is a good enough tactician to know exactly what she can do, and though a spoiled favourite, discreet enough seldom to attempt more than she can, with credit and safety, go through with—a rare merit. Her voice is none of your common, thin, clear, unsubstantial organs, but of a full, round, rich, satisfying quality; her manner of giving the arch, and what may be called dashing songs, she is in the habit of singing, is charming, and the effect of the whole—voice, look, and action—delightful.

There is another particular in which Vestris is unrivalled, though, from the extraordinary notions of delicacy prevalent in the western hemisphere, wherein you are located, I almost despair of making myself understood. I mean as regards the symmetry of those portions of the human frame which are situated between the knees and ankles, but which it is the custom of the country never to name by the right name, except when attached to the bodies of inferior animals, such as dogs and horses; though wherein consists the harm, even when speaking of a lady, of plainly using the monosyllable beginning with an l and ending with a g, with an intermediate vowel, I cannot say, but leave it to people much better acquainted with delicacy, metaphysics, and association of ideas than I pretend to be to determine. But this I can say, that, after having repeatedly looked upon those two unmentionable pieces of humanity belonging to Madame Vestris in the most critical manner, I think them, as far as my judgment goes, perfect in every point. Madame Vestris is also highly accomplished in other matters, being mistress both of French and Italian.

THE FINE ARTS.

MR. DUNLAP'S NEW PICTURE,

THE ATTACK ON THE LOUVRE.

THE production of an historical painting on a large scale, by an American, is an event to be regarded with peculiar pleasure. Even if the artist does not entirely satisfy the rigid severity of professed critics, there is something in the attempt which should excite the interest and claim the indulgence of the admirers of the art. Perfection is not to be expected among us, till after years of laborious practice, rewarded by judicious and liberal encouragement. The restraints which exist here upon the art, and the impediments to the progress of the artist, are numerous, and nearly insurmountable. He must struggle as he best may, through the tedious years of preliminary and unproductive study, driven by necessity into the strictest economy; for it is not the children of wealth who embark in so arduous a profession. No magnificent patron cheers him in his weary and toilsome seclusion, and it too frequently happens that the public remains careless of his merit and indifferent to his success. Among the aspirants in this lovely art Mr. Dunlap holds a conspicuous station. He has attained considerable distinction in literature, both as a poet and dramatic writer; and the offsprings of his brush have met with general applause. Among them are "Death on the Pale Horse," "Christ Rejected," "The Bearing of the Cross," and "Mount Calvary." Upon the last, the late Mr. Isaac Harby wrote for the Mirror a laudatory critique, which was widely circulated, and in the justice of which the public acquiesced. Mr. Harby was a man of taste and genius, and placed Mr. Dunlap "among the first painters of the land."

The picture upon which he is at present engaged represents a scene in Paris during one of the famous three days. The subject is very happily chosen, and, at this period, will probably attract a host of visitors.

The painter has imagined himself to be posted at a point nearly opposite the toll-house of the bridge of the Louvre, and consequently nearly opposite the gate from which the royalist troops swept the bridge by discharges of artillery. The Louvre, as seen across the river, fills the distance of the painting; the soldiers of the Bourbons occupying the windows, and drawn up in front of the magnificent building, are seen obscurely through the smoke of their own fire-arms, and those of the citizens of Paris, who occupy the foreground of the picture and make the attack.

The artist has represented one of those barriers which the patriots threw up, by unpadding the streets, extending from the extreme right of his composition to the toll-house of the bridge; and behind it men, youths, and boys with guns and pistols, are repulsing an attempted charge of the royalists. The horses are in confusion, and some of the riders falling. The first figure on the right, and nearest the spectator, is a youth, without coat or waistcoat, a long sword at his side and a cartouch-box under his arm. He has a large pistol in his hand, which is prepared for action; but his attention seems called to the groups on the other side of the scene of action, and his fire is suspended. Next to this figure is a young female, who, with the assistance of a boy, is bearing off a wounded and dying brother. A group behind the last is formed of boys, some of whom are firing pistols at the cavalry and others busily loading under cover of the barricade. A soldier of the national guard is conspicuous, who is deliberately ramming down cartridge and firmly eyeing the enemy. More in front, another national-guardian is sinking under a death-wound.

The centre of the picture, in front, is filled by a group, on which the greatest light falls, and the action represented is that of the young man, who, in the agony of death, gives his arms to his friend with the injunction, "to use them for the country."

Under the cover of the toll-house is a group of citizens in the various attitudes of firing and loading their muskets. Among them is seen, as having taken shelter in a place of comparative safety, a female with an infant in her arms.

To the left of the picture, is, perhaps, the most interesting group of the whole. A wounded man is supported by two elegant females; one of whom administers drink to him, and the other endeavours to stanch the flow of blood from his wound. A rough, but compassionate man of the people, pauses to look on for the moment, and immediately behind him we see the tri-coloured flag waving, and a crowd prepared to rush upon the bridge, which is occupied by one figure, who points his sword to the Louvre with his right hand, and with his left supports the banner of the people. This figure is a youth of the polytechnic school. He may be called the hero of the piece, and must be considered as the representative of the gallant band of which he is a member.

The rush of citizens over the bridge, following the self-devoted boy, determined the combat. The royalists retreated, and France was free.

There are many actions and figures in this very large painting which we have omitted in our description. The canvass is twenty-one feet by fourteen, and every part is full of the spirit of the day. The fighting, the dead, the wounded, the dying, and their arms, accoutrements, and discarded clothing, cover the field of battle.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

To correspondents.—We have received a number of well written and spirited communications, for the unavoidable delay of which we crave indulgence. Letters from correspondents are pouring in from every quarter; many of them are fair hits, and shall appear as soon as possible. Late publications also, both foreign and domestic, have for some time been accumulating on our hands, and shall receive early attention. We promise, especially, a prompt notice of the Discoveries of the Companions of Columbus, by Washington Irving.

New-year presents.—It is said that the French excel all other nations in the extent and costliness of their new-year gifts. The Parisian confectioners on the first day of the year, sell twenty thousand pounds sterling worth of sugarplums and sweetmeats alone; while the sale of jewelry and fancy articles in the first week in January is computed at one-fourth of the sale in the twelve months. An ancient English writer terms the celebration of this festival "a mere relique of paganism and idolatry;" but, if all the superstitious rites of antiquity were as conducive to cheerfulness as this, civilization has done little service to mankind in abolishing them. We think these trifling features in the manners of a people discover a social and amiable character. Even so simple an incident as a present may ripen an ordinary acquaintance into a friendship, or perpetuate the existence of an affection; and we fully agree with a London contemporary, that "nothing can be more truly christian than to usher in the new-year day with every cheerful observance that may express gratitude towards heaven, and promote a kindly and a social feeling among our friends and fellow-creatures."

The Press.—There is probably no subject upon which the Americans have felt more keenly the lash of foreign criticism than that of their claims to a literary reputation. While, with the pride and confidence natural to a young and prosperous nation, we have anticipated the appearance among us of poets and other authors, as well as brave soldiers and gallant seamen, opinions have been freely expressed abroad of our incompetency to produce writers above mediocrity; and against the few who have found favour with the world, has been arrayed the list of immortal geniuses who have adorned the history of other nations. It seems to be generally acceded, that, while the great mass of our population is as much enlightened as any other, we can boast of no brilliant circle who, like the British classical writers, have united a perfect knowledge of our language with extensive scientific attainments, or extraordinary natural talent. We cannot deny the truth of this assertion. We have had no poets like those who have devoted themselves exclusively to the art of poetry in Great Britain. None whose efforts have been deliberately made—whose faculties have been concentrated exclusively to that point—and whose productions have been matured and chastened by laborious study, and elicited by discriminating patronage. Our wealthy men do not seek honourable fame by associating their names with the treasures of genius. The public is not, or at least has not been, a literary one, and has never sought to kindle or to foster genius. Even the periodical press, through which should be derived so much instructive gratification, has not yet met with a support sufficient to establish it on an independent basis, and allow its conductors confidence and resources fully to develop the latent talent of the country. A character of fickleness fatal to literary success, has uniformly pervaded the people, and unless interwoven with the interests of a party or a sect, and for the accomplishment of some private end, a journal, whatever transient popularity it may gain, is soon abandoned for some new attraction. Individual enterprise has thus wasted itself in fruitless endeavours. Those who, backed by uniform patronage, would have succeeded in improving our literary character, have too often left the ungrateful task, as one which must end in heavy pecuniary embarrassments; and, while others have held honourable stations, and realized valuable incomes from their labours, the public press has struggled along without sufficient strength to enable it to break through the enslaving influences which render it the tool of designing men, when it should be their master and their judge.

Nothing can be more disgraceful, and in a country advancing unqualified claims to independence, more absurd, than the existence of an influential journal, pursuing plans of a private nature, and praising or condemning at the caprice of a single individual, without reference to any immutable standard of right and wrong—a press acted on successively by publishers, managers, and actors—and yet this species of control is exercised frequently and universally; and the public, who suffer by it, look on with the utmost indifference. We have few journals identified with our common interests, which have attained to any great degree of health and maturity. They are too generally sickly and feeble creatures, destitute of energy or authority; and waiting, with fear and trembling, till some new caprice wafts away their subscribers, and brings them to an end. Yet, any one who will take the trouble to examine the state of our affairs, to see how often insolent presumption wears the wreath of fame, and how often merit sickens for the want of some power to make it known and felt, will acknowledge that there is a rich field in the midst of us yet to be cultivated. If we want an independent and flourishing press, the people must strengthen it with a uniform and general support, that it may become as a common reservoir, wherein the wise and the talented may pour their gifts. Nor must we withhold patronage from all until one appears suddenly invested with the charm of merit and the force of power. The time has past when Minervas leaped fully armed from the brain of Jove, in all the dignity of matured strength, beauty, and wisdom. In these matter of fact days, we can discover no other method of obtaining so desirable an object than by a more concentrated and uniformly rendered public support. It should not be expected that a single individual will superintend all the various and extensive operations incidental to a literary establishment, and emit from his own brain a continual and inexhaustible fund of original matter worth reading; nor can he, in addition to the heavy preliminary expenses which he must incur, immediately employ the talent lying idle around him. The public must come forward and place resources in his hands, which he will find it to be his interest to wield for their advantage. It is not that we want more papers, but those which do exist should feel that they are treading on firm ground, before they can move with a manly bearing; and until the nation be impressed with the necessity of a generous liberality on their part, they cannot have, and they should not expect, an American literary journal to be in all respects worthy their approbation. They must be contented with the cheapest stuff which accident or the vanity of juvenile ambition flings in their way.

New-York Dispensary.—The trustees of this institution have just put forth their annual report, by which document it appears that during the last year no less than seventeen thousand individuals have received benefit from this charity. When we consider the unostentatious and quiet manner in which the medical officers attached to it discharge their arduous and extensive duties, and calculate the amount which must necessarily be saved to the public through their efficient instrumentality, we feel called upon to bestow the meed of our warmest commendation on the founders and supporters of the dispensary. Yet, strange to say, it does not seem to be as yet a favourite object of patronage—nay, its very existence and doings are but little known. The Greeks implore aid against the Turks, and our population flock to succour them. The Cherokees send out a lamentation and wailing because of the oppression of their powerful pale brethren, and our public halls are thronged with beauty and fashion and wealth to unite in raising an appeal in their favour. Japan and "far west Ind," receive the collections of our sympathy. Yet the poor at home are scarcely considered. Is this just? The dispensary is largely in debt, and receives little support, although its claims are paramount to most of those which are daily, nay, hourly attracting generous attention. The report is drawn up by the secretary, Mr. James F. Depuyser, in a neat business-like style, and deserves perusal. The efforts making to diffuse the benefits of vaccination, and to improve the quality of this preventive against that frightful disease, the small-pox, are worthy of all praise. Nearly four thousand individuals were vaccinated during the last year by the officers of the dispensary.

Rural Repository.—The editor of this periodical, published semi-monthly at Hudson, offers a premium of twenty dollars for the best original tale, not to occupy less than two pages; and five dollars for the best poem, between forty and one hundred lines in length. The authors of the second and third best of each will be entitled to several volumes of the Repository, handsomely bound. The communications must be post-paid, directed to William Stodard, Hudson, and forwarded previous to the first day of July next. This agreeable little work comprehends a selection of many of the sprightly and popular articles of the day, and has reached its eighth volume.

Penmanship.—We are pleased to direct public attention once more to the specimens of original and improved writing exhibited by Mr. Bristow at his rooms, over Buloid's store, in Broadway. This gentleman has been highly recommended as a most successful teacher of penmanship. We are informed by a respected correspondent, that the hand-writing of his little daughter has been improved so much in fourteen lessons under the tuition of Mr. Bristow, that, although before totally ignorant of the art, she now writes beautifully. This is strong praise, and we know it to be well deserved.

Chronometer.—A splendid piece of workmanship is exhibited by Mr. Mott, at his store in Pearl-street, in the form of a full-jewelled chronometer clock of uncommon dimensions. The American Institute awarded a premium to it as being the best finished article of the kind ever seen in the United States. As an object of curiosity it is well worthy attention.

New Lamp.—A lamp has lately been invented in Lincoln, England, which, it is said, is much less expensive than those now in use, while it emits a more brilliant flame. It burns spirits of tar.

GIVE ME, MY LOVE, THE ROSEATE FLOWER.

WRITTEN AND COMPOSED BY THOMAS MOORE, ESQ.

ANDANTE.

Give me, my love, the ro - seate flow'r, I saw thee cull from yon - der bow'r, And with thy gift I ne'er will part, But fond-ly wear it next my heart, But fond-ly wear it next my heart.

SECOND VERSE.
Then if perchance I feel a thorn,
'Tis but an emblem of thy scorn;
Yet not the thorn shall make us part,
Still will I wear it next my heart.

ORIGINAL MISCELLANY.

SCRAPS FROM MY COMMON-PLACE BOOK.
NUMBER VI.

LONG SPEECHES.—In the year of Rome 702 a law was passed, called de ambitu, limiting the pleadings in criminal cases to one day, allowing two hours to the prosecutor and three to the accused. There was some sense in this, independently of the saving of time. There can be no greater absurdity than to suppose a good cause can be benefited by pleadings, the beginning of which must be quite forgotten before they come to an end.

NATIONAL CHARACTER.—It is almost impossible for a nation long to retain its power and independence without possessing the respect of its neighbours. A good name is quite as valuable to a community as to an individual, and is equally a shield against insult or oppression. A profligate or quarrelsome nation is like a mad dog, every body makes war against it.

NICKNAMES.—The bloody animosity which subsisted for more than two centuries and a half between the Beni Isah and the Beni Maad, two tribes of Africans, was occasioned by the nickname of monkey, applied by the latter to the sheik of the former.

STUDYING A PART.—An actor in Paris, some years ago, acquired immortal honour by personating a monkey on the stage. In order to become perfect in his part he daily visited the menagerie and studied from nature.

BURKE.—Burke had a pension of three thousand pounds sterling a year. His executors two thousand five hundred—his widow twelve hundred. His son was to have been elevated to the peerage had he lived.

CONQUESTS.—The union of different nations by conquest is like a new coat which does not show the seams at first; but a good deal of wearing makes them become conspicuous, and at last break out into rents.

SELF-BLAME.—Self-blame is equally to be distrusted with self-praise. I no more believe a man when he speaks ill than when he speaks well of himself. In the former case he only does it to be contradicted.

A GOOD MAN.—A virtuous man who has passed through the temptations of the world, may be compared to the fish who lives all the time in salt-water, yet is still fresh.

A GRAND TURK.—Mahomet the second caused seven of his pages to be ripped open to find out who had eaten one of his cucumbers.

RELIGIOUS WARS.—The first war undertaken for religion was that of the Arminian christians to defend themselves against the persecution of Maximian.

WISDOM AND CUNNING.—Wisdom and cunning may often employ the same means, but wisdom stoops to them and the other cannot rise above them.

CHIEF JUSTICE OF ENGLAND.—The chief justice of England has fifteen saleable offices, for which, it is said, seventy thousand guineas were once refused.

SALIQUE LAW.—It seems somewhat singular that a nation which, like the French, values itself on its gallantry, should be almost the only one to exclude women from the throne.

TEMPERANCE.—Temperance, if not the virtue of a cardinal, is at least a cardinal virtue.

HUNGER.—The stomach has no patience.

SIMPLICITY.—Simplicity is often the cloak of evil as well as the robe of virtue.

SAVAGES.—There is no nation of white savages in the world.

AFFECTATION OF GENTILITY.—Fish is good, but fishy is detestable.

TOO MUCH OF A GOOD THING.—Too much fat puts out the candle.

SILK WORM.—The silkworm weaves its own winding-sheet before it dies.

DEATH.—There's none that die as poor as they were born.

GRIEF.—Deep grief bleeds inwardly.

A GOOD STYLE.—Proper words in proper places.

A CLIMAX.—His passions boiled from a fever to a phrensy.

UNDESERVED HONOURS.

Wear them as servants do gold lace,
Not as a badge of honour, but disgrace.

GOVERNMENT.

Mankind, like miserable frogs,
Are always king'd by stocks or logs.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR:

A REPOSITORY OF POLITE LITERATURE AND THE ARTS.

VOLUME VIII.

NEW-YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 26, 1831.

NUMBER 38.

For the New-York Mirror.

TO THE SOUTH-WEST.

BY WILLIAM F. PALMER.

"The sweet south-west
That breathes upon a bank of violets,
Stealing and giving odour."

CHILD of the glorious sun,
Born of the living splendor of his ray!
Oh, haste thee, lingering one,
From thy bright dewy chambers far away,
Where day's last gleam of rosee beauty fades
Above the evening bowers of Lerma's dark-eyed maids.

For long and lonely hours,
Hours unendeared by hope's accustomed smiles,
Amid the dearth of flowers,
And devastation of the forest aisles,
We've mourned thy hapless absence, while around
The wintry winds sent forth their wild triumphant sound.

Along thy sylvan walks,
Erst hung with curtains of the summer's green,
Stern desolation stalks,
The hoary tyrant of the faded scene,
Crushing the widowed autumn's mummied dead,
The sere unburied leaves, beneath his ruthless tread.

The blush of crimson skies
Paints the sweet dimples of the lake no more,
Beneath whose surface lies
Th' imprisoned trout, while on its naked shore
His pomp of gems the frost-king forth has thrown O'er every bending reed, gray rock, and mossy stone.

The redbreast's peaceful nest,
That haply 'scaped the school-boy's eager look,
In downy softness drest,
Hath fall'n to ruins in its leafless nook,
And as the eye its crumbling form surveys,
We sigh to hear again its far-flown minstrel's lays.

Therefore, fond loiterer, come
To those that grateful own thy genial worth;
Forsake thy blossomed home
Of sunny islands for the lonely north,
And on the pinions of thy gentle wing,
Back to our waiting woods the summer warblers bring.

Oh linger not away
Amid the glory of the tropic bowers!
Though bright their proud array,
And ever sweet their Araby of flowers,
They cannot prize thy soft and balmy breath,
Like those that long have slept in nature's cheerless death.

The daisy's pleasant eye,
That 'neath the chilling snow-wreath deep reposes,—
Where the young violets lie—
And all the lovely sisterhood of roses,
Await thy kindly influence to rise,
And fill the vernal air with perfume and bright dyes.

But to our withered hearts,
Benumbed and stript by many a wintry time,
No sweet south-west imparts
The joyous beauty of their early prime;
Nor to the desert of our hope returns
The long-lost friendship flowers for which the spirit yearns!

ORIGINAL TALES.

THE UNLUCKY HALF DOLLAR:

OR THE UGLY MAN.

MR. AMOS TRYON (an excellent name by the by) was a bootmaker. He had just moved into a fashionable shop, and he thought it was a good time to raise his prices; so when one of his customers, Mr. Justus Hateful's bill was brought in at the end of the year, he was charged for his boots half a dollar beyond his usual price.

"I'll be switched if I pay it," cried Justus. "I never have paid so much, and, so help me, I never will. The price has been the same for the last six years, and why shouldn't it be so now? He may sue me; but, unless compelled, I never will pay that half dollar."

He determined, however, he would be calm, and he went to the bootmaker, and said, holding the bill in his hand,

"Mr. Tryon, there is something here I wish to speak to you about. Here is a half dollar for boots I never have paid before. It is the first of our dealings in your new establishment, and we had better understand each other," and he spoke in a kind and affectionate tone.

"We always have charged too little," answered Mr. Tryon. "We have nearly killed ourselves with low prices."

"The deuce you have," said Mr. Hateful; "but," added he, "I never have paid this sum—it is idle to talk—I pay now all your charges—you take your course as to the reduction, and I will take mine," and he gave the full amount of his bill.

Amos took it—he went to his desk—he paused—which of the two to do—take off or not take off—but he was so greedy after that half dollar—he could not bear to give it up—it was the pet lamb of all his flock of prices—he had fixed his heart and hopes upon it—he found himself unequal to the effort of resigning it—and the bill was returned receipted without a cent's diminution; but, what was worse, when Mr. Hateful was leaving the shop, Tryon laughed and said to his foreman,

"It isn't destruction if he does go. I'm not ruined for ever if he should take away the light of his countenance and his amazing custom."

The fatal sentence was borne through the air by imps of mischief to the ears of Justus as he let fall the latch of the shop-door—in other words, he heard what Mr. Tryon said. To be charged with weak conceited pomposity, guiltless as he felt himself to be, touched the very nerve of irritation; for Justus was one who was always munching his character, (if I may use the expression) and watched it as a dog does a bone. Let any man try to take it away, I pity him. To be the theme too of another's scoffs and mockery, made him murmur like the rising wind with rage.

"Am I laughed and sneered at—made a mark for him to spit his malice and his wit upon before obsequious apprentices? By heavens! you yet may find, my gentleman, the poorest worm can turn on its offender."

Just after revenge raged in Hateful's breast, trivial as the cause may seem to be, and his unbounded desire set both his mind and body furiously going. He went about industriously publishing Tryon's extortion. Now, although ill-tempered, Justus was a man of good judgment and strict integrity, and all his friends thought so and said, "I want no better criterion of what's right than his opinion, though he is sometimes a little hateful." So, when he told the story of Amos's imposition, every one listened and heeded, and resolved to beware of the gentleman, and always after, when they met him, thought, "I suspect he's one of your extortioners;" and, when they heard others speak of his skill as a workman, they said, "yes, he's very clever," and they emphasized "clever," and smiled as "if there were some monster in their thoughts."

But this was not the fatal blow Hateful gave to Tryon's credit. He was intimate with Tryon's broker, from whom he knew he occasionally borrowed money; and one day, as if by accident, he made the mistake that infected him the subject of conversation; and the broker happening to speak highly of Tryon, Hateful said,

"Yes, he's a good workman; but he pays a heavy rent—he's obliged to charge extravagantly, and in this way he's losing all his customers—I wouldn't trust him a cent."

And then his snake-like eyes glistened, and he looked a thousand things more than he uttered, like a lover; so that the heart of the money lender became chilled towards his particular friend, and he said one day to his partner, when the bootmaker had left the office,

"He is what you call a bold gentleman—an elegant, dashing speculator, who disregards his present means and looks to the angels for his future. He is a good-hearted fellow, and it is natural enough we should feel inclined to serve him; but we must not trust him too far. He has just now applied for a loan, and I have told him I would speak to you and he must call to-morrow. Now I propose we grant him one this time, and tell him it is the last that we can make. The truth is, I have had a conversation with Hateful, who is a shrewd fellow—he said very little, but he looked a world of doubts."

"I agree with you perfectly," said his partner, a hen-pecked little man in the mercantile way; who talked very decidedly, but always took care to agree with his partner, (a lesson, by the by to other partners.) "Undoubtedly," he said, with an emphasis, "I think so too."

So the leading and the led determined they would very coolly rid themselves of their unfortunate Tryon, should he come again, which he did, for he had made a large purchase of leather, and could not meet his notes. But his friends, the brokers, bowed and smiled very politely and turned their backs to him. Tryon was a high-spirited man, and his rage you may imagine. He could have feasted on the luxury of knocking them both down; but to knock people down because they would not lend him money, would show a state of beggary—would lose him all his friends—for it is a very extraordinary fact that your particular friends are apt to cut you if they think you are getting poor.

"And besides," he thought, "the more I seem to suffer, the more will these wretches feel their own importance; and smile at it in vulgar satisfaction and complacency; and the scene, too, would be talked of; his credit go! 'we must look after our money,' his creditors would say; 'this rage is suspicious.'"

Unfortunately they did say so; for, although the scene with the brokers did not turn out a scene, and Amos did not strike the brokers, but behaved like a philosopher, and should have been rewarded for forbearance, he was not—his rejection became suspected—how, it was never known, perhaps he betrayed himself by his manner—perhaps little Consequence, the broker's partner, could not keep the secret—no matter how—"the gorgeous palace" of his credit, like "an unsubstantial pageant," faded—and no wonder, for his creditors thought, and thought is but air, or something still more immaterial; then how easy is it to be shaken and dispersed.

No sooner was Tryon's rejection rumoured in the city than dismay, something such as you will see on people's faces after the lightning and before the thunder, was on the faces of his creditors. Such hosts of visitors as our bootmaker had that day he never had before—to see the goings in and comings out you would have thought it had been new-year's day, if it had not been for that thunder and lightning expression. The consequence of the rush was that most of the creditors' debts became not worth a rush—they were clamorous for their money—he very calmly told them he would pay them when he could, and they had better let him go on with his business; and they met and consulted; and in their wisdoms determined "a bird in hand," &c.; and they took all he had, and forced a sale, and were cheated, as is usual in such cases; and they got about one-half their due. So our bootmaker was left in debt for the other half. To be working to pay old debts was beyond his energy, and conscious of ill-conduct, he became suspicious of disgrace. He thought his good character was gone, and he might as well make the best of a bad one. He maintained himself for a while by lying and knavery; then by forgery—and at last he was maintained in the state prison. Hateful smiled like Satan himself, for Hateful was an "ugly man."

LITERARY NOTICES.

Voyages and Discoveries of the Companions of Columbus. By Washington Irving. Philadelphia. Carey & Lea. 8vo. pp. 360. 1831.

This work is an appropriate successor to the author's last production, the Life of Columbus. It is in fact a sort of appendix to it, narrating more briefly the fortunes of some of the most distinguished followers of the discoverer of America. It has not the unity of design nor the historical dignity of its predecessor, but possesses all that richness of coloring and easy grace of style which adorn every page of Mr. Irving's writings. Its subject, too, is one of high and peculiar interest. Every thing connected with Spain and Spaniards, at least with the better days of their history, is imbued with romance. The character of the people proud, sensitive, and fiery; their bloody, yet chivalrous contests with the Moors, and the tinge of oriental fervour reflected from their conquerors' character on their own, make up a picture of brilliant and striking hues. To an American there is something peculiarly interesting in the history of that race, to whose daring we are indebted for a rank among the nations, and whose influence spread for centuries so widely over the fairest portion of our continent. To us the present is a national work, and the author is entitled to our gratitude for having brought to light much that was hidden in old and neglected histories, and made it accessible and interesting to all.

The discovery and early history of America is and will forever remain an anomaly in the annals of the world. We can scarcely conceive what a spur was given to enterprise, what an exciting reward was held out to ambition, by the vague but glowing descriptions of the first successful adventurers who returned to Europe laden with the "barbaric pearl and gold" of a distant world, hitherto untrodden by the footsteps of civilized man, and offering wealth equal to the wildest dreams of the imagination as the easy prey of the soldier of fortune. The invention of printing and the gradual dissemination of knowledge, had already scattered in part the darkness which hung over the minds of men. A spirit of enterprise was abroad, and a new channel opened wherein it might flow freely. We can never hope to have the dull uniformity of our lives again broken by tidings of such new and startling discoveries. The secrets of nature are exhausted, "the great globe, and all that it inhabit" have been explored and studied. The world of romance has been gradually narrowed, till few vestiges of it are left save in the airy castles which the imagination is equally active to build and to destroy. But we can even now partly conceive how the minds of men must have thrilled at the news of the discovery of regions of gorgeous beauty and boundless riches, and how the mounting spirits of those stirring times rushed forward to carve their way with the sword to their wealth and honours. The inhabitants of Europe could look across the unknown ocean which washed their shores to scenes of beauty and bliss, such as we can behold only "in the fervour of a poet's dream." The gardens of Alcina and the land of fairy were realized. Here was a country of surpassing loveliness, inhabited by a people of primeval simplicity and innocence, rich in all natural blessings, and abounding in those treasures which are more precious in the eyes of civilized man than the free bounty of the earth. It wanted but little stretch of the imagination to place in this land of wonders the fountain of perpetual youth and the golden region of El Dorado. It was a sort of neutral ground between truth and fiction, which both delighted to embellish. The illusion is gone, but much of its charm remains, and we can fancy, if we can no longer feel, the enthusiasm with which the Spanish soldiers lanced their barks into the western ocean, flushed with wild hopes which yet could scarcely be called unreasonable. Religion, too, mingled strangely with their avarice and ambition. They were not merely roving adventurers, but champions of the cross, commissioned by the head of the church to carry the knowledge of the true faith to distant and benighted savages, and in the true crusading spirit, while one hand brandished the sword, the other held aloft the symbol of "peace and good will among men." Pride, daring, and bigotry have always been among the elements of the Spanish character; and in their American conquests they were put forth in strange and appalling union. It is this which makes the history of the southern so different from that of the northern portion of our continent. The former, with all its natural wealth, soon became the prey of misery. Its possession added no true strength to the parent country, but on the contrary served to hasten its downfall. It maintained with difficulty an oppressive and exhausting dominion, and now has not a foot of ground in that vast continent, over almost the whole of which its power once extended. The eyes of the persecuted pilgrims of New-England rested on no fertile plains or broad savannas, no peaceful rivers and sheltering bays opened their broad bosoms to receive them, but they were tempest-tost on a rocky and inhospitable coast, the haunt of the savage and the wild beast, where "the heaven was as brass and the earth as iron." They were not, like Columbus and his companions, courted and worshipped by a peaceable and timid race, but were exposed in the infancy of their existence to the assaults of warlike and powerful tribes. The ungrateful soil on which they landed offered no gold nor pearls to tempt their avarice. But they knew what were the true riches of our bountiful mother earth, and sought them by the labour of their hands and the sweat of their brows. They did not seek to propagate a set of doctrines at the sword's point. Their faith was not of this world, neither did they look for their reward on earth. By prudence and perseverance they gradually grew into prosperity, and their industry has made "the wilderness to blossom as the rose," while the southern portion of our continent, which nature intended for the garden of the world, has become helpless and neglected, and already bears the marks of premature old age.

We have wandered far from our immediate subject. But when the only duty of the critic is to award praise, his task is soon done. We shall not make any extracts from the volume before us, because, doubtless it is already, or soon will be, in the hands of all our readers. It is a national work, from the pen of one of the most eminent of our countrymen, and every American owes it to himself to become immediately acquainted with it.

The Stanesse Twins. A Satirical Tale of the Times. With other Poems. By the author of Pellam, &c. &c. New-York. J. & J. Harper. 12mo. pp. 306. 1831.

We scarcely know what to say of this book. Ignorant, of course, of its local allusions, and scarcely competent, therefore, to judge of it as a whole performance, we feel something in the situation of the embarrassed clergyman at a christening, who, after several unsuccessful endeavours to find the right page of his prayer-book, exclaimed, "Bless my soul! this child is very difficult to baptize!" That Mr. Bulwer is a polished writer, and what is more, perhaps, a fashionable one, is very certain. In his novels there are whole pages of fervid description, often philosophy, and wit that could only have come from a scholar and a man of talent; but his numerous and noisy admirers have overpraised him. We have waded through his poems without any rapture; meeting occasionally some very good things sprinkled upon a rather tedious quantity of lines, over which his reputation will cast a sort of reflected lustre. It will be enjoyed, doubtless, by the knowing part of his British readers, and their praises will be echoed from our shores; but, although the book will sell, we question whether it will afford any general satisfaction to the American public. Whatever talent may be discovered in it, there is a lack of interest, which, after the newspapers have printed their extracts, and the brief comments of the critics and literati are over, will cause it to float rather quietly down the stream of time.

A writer, signing himself "Crito," in the United States Gazette, has given birth to the following enlightened opinions:

"From the specimen Mr. Bulwer has exhibited of his poetical talents, it is sincerely to be hoped that he will favour the world with a volume of poems. I am inclined to think his genius for poetry is little inferior to that of the brilliant Byron. As to his novels, for my part, (and I am by no means singular in my opinion) in all the requisites of a good novel, I do not consider any of Walter Scott's equal to those of Bulwer."

Now, Mr. Bulwer is graceful, witty, eloquent, declamatory, fervid, sweet, and sometimes philosophical. He will describe a scene or a passion—sketch you a character, with which you shall be fascinated—but to pronounce him superior to one who has conjured up such a world of breathing, acting beings as Walter Scott, is flat heresy in literature, and carrying the joke a little too far. Bulwer holds about the same rank in relation to Scott that the latter does to Shakspeare. Their spheres are totally different, and the friends of the former inflict upon him a fatal injury by attempting to institute any comparison.

The Unique: or Biography of many Distinguished Characters; with fine Portraits. Illustrated with Anecdotes. Third edition—improved. Boston. Charles H. Peabody. 18mo. pp. 254. 1831.

This is a flimsy member of the tribe of annuals which have recently swarmed over the literary world like a cloud of locusts. The best of these, with two or three exceptions, possess no powerful claims to admiration. They are costly, glittering, and often valueless; thrusting themselves into notice, like fashionable fops, who, by the mere gaudiness of their apparel, attract attention from plain, sensible citizens. They are, in the feast of reason, what whip-syllabub and blanc-mange are in more substantial banquets, which destroy the appetite without nourishing the system. For our own part, we prefer an old tattered volume of Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy, to "a whole wilderness" of such expensive and unnecessary ephemera. Of some, however, it is but just to admit that, as specimens of typography, they are creditable to the country, and that they also exercise a beneficial influence upon engravers, in eliciting from them agreeable illustrations, and in making their merits known.

The "Unique" cannot even advance this slender claim to indulgence. It is a collection of biographies, huddled together from the floating rumours or unauthenticated publications of the day, without originality, novelty, or taste. Among other important flashes of information, we are informed that Napoleon Bonaparte was born at Ajaccio in Corsica; that he was emperor of France; that he died at St. Helena, and was considered quite an extraordinary man! A humorous biography of Jacob Hays, by William Cox, which, by the by, is the best thing in the book, and which originally appeared in the Mirror, figures away gravely between George the Fourth and General Lafayette! We congratulate the distinguished high constable upon his having attained a society so different from that into which his professional avocations usually lead him. The article, however, is injured by alteration, and is stolen from our pages without credit. The fine portraits mentioned in the title page are unequivocal libels upon the unfortunate persons whose names appear beneath. The head of Washington Irving is accompanied by the following observation:

"His works are characterized by fine humour and great sweetness of style, which, with the flatteries he has bestowed on foreign countries, have made him a favourite there."

We have before seen this piece of anonymous impertinence travelling around the country; but did not expect to meet with it in a book intended to please an American public. If this, as the title-page informs us, is the third edition, improved, the first must have been unique indeed.

The Comic Annual. By Thomas Hood, Esq. Second edition. London. Charles Tilt. 1831.

We have heard it rumoured that some discriminating publisher proposes to give us an American edition of this melancholy attempt at fun. For the honour of the country we trust it is a false alarm. We hold laughter to be one of the most delightful, heart-relieving, health-preserving enjoyments that a sensible person can expect in this world of woe; and he who does not improve every possible opportunity to indulge in a right hearty roar, is no true philosopher, does not know the use of life, and should buy for himself a decent durable tub, and set up for Diogenes forthwith. With these favorable prepossessions we opened this very neatly printed volume; but, by the memory of Momus! how we were disappointed! We have heard better puns from the clown in the circus. For instance, a plate of three children gormandizing, is termed infantry at mess; a brilliant play upon words only equalled by the point of the accompanying sonnet:

"Sweets to the sweet—farewell."—Hamlet.

"Time was I liked a cheese-cake well enough;
All human children have a sweetish tooth—
I used to revel in a pie or puff,
Or tart—we all are tartiers in our youth;
To meet with jam or jelly was good luck,
All candies most complacently I crumpled,
A stick of liquorice was good to suck,
And sugar was as often licked as lumped;
On treacle's 'linked sweetness long drawn out,'
Or honey I could feast like any fly—
I thrilled when lollipops were hawked about," &c.

In a second plate a drunken man with wooden legs is falling, and cries, "Well, I never could keep my legs!" A third represents an old lady with her turban on fire, a negro extinguishing the flames with a kettle of boiling water, and saying with great wit, "By gum, him turban on fire!"

We would not waste so many words upon this elegant specimen of humour, but to hope no one will be silly enough to reprint it. We have not met with anything so bad for many a day. There is already sufficient stuff in the market to satisfy the "sweetish tooth" of the full-grown babies on this side the Atlantic. If their appetite craves more food, we would recommend the rotaries of fun to buy up Mr. Finn's comic annual. This has at least the merit of being native stupidity; and why should we travel three thousand miles for a disease which grows so luxuriantly in our own soil?

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

Letters from Correspondents.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

MESSRS. EDITORS—Nothing short of pure compassion for that portion of your unfortunate readers who inhabit remote regions, where the bright beams of fashion seldom or ever penetrate the darkness of their obscurity—by the way, what do you think of that touch; isn't it worthy of Croly?—but I can't recollect the names of all these fellows—I say, nothing but sheer compassion for that part of your unfortunate readers who missed the great fancy ball of the eighteenth, if any such survive the mortification—prompts me to take up my pen to describe the glories of that unequalled spectacle. I hate writing—everybody can write now-a-days, and the distinction is not in favour of who can, but who can't write. It is a mighty vulgar business, and I shall certainly never forgive my honoured parents for having me taught such a common-place, every-day accomplishment. But, as I said before, though I hate to repeat, and can't bear the repetition even of a great pleasure, except it is eating—I must try and overcome my dislike to this gothic habit of writing, for the sake of thousands of your readers in village, town, and city, who must be dying to hear of the bachelor's fancy ball. Have at ye, then, bucks and bolles, old maids and bachelors—have at ye all!

You must be apprised, Messrs. Editors, that I am the man born and selected by fate for this great purpose. I was, the first that hinted the first remote idea of a fancy ball. A ball in itself is nothing—a bachelor's ball is next to nothing—but flatter myself a bachelor's fancy ball is perfectly original. I also conceived the idea of the decorations of the room, and many of the dishes, that puzzled the untravelled youth of the city to name or to eat, were ordered expressly at my suggestion. In short, between ourselves, I was the creator, the presiding genius of the whole; there is no man living can give so graphic a description of this unequalled gala, nor will there ever be another full and true account written by mortal man or woman. The others must and shall be spurious, counterfeit—utterly unworthy of notice. Your obedient servant,
FELIX FLIPPERSON

THE BACHELORS' FANCY BALL.

"The inferior priestess, at her altar's side,
Trembling begins the sacred rites of pride.
Unnumber'd treasures ope at once, and here
The various offerings of the world appear;
From each she nicely culls, with curious toil,
And decks the goddess with the glittering spoil.
This casket India's glowing gems unlocks,
And all Arabia breathes from yonder box.
The tortoise here and elephant unite,
Transform'd to combs, the speckled and the white.
Here piles of pins extend their shining rows,
Puffs, powders, patches, bibles, billet-doux."

At six in the morning the belles began to announce the dawning of the illustrious day, greater than the "three days of Paris" put together, or the fourth of March, the fourth of July, the eighth of January, the twenty-second of February, or any other vulgar anniversary, commemorated in the vulgar records of our history. The belles, I say, announced the dawning of the eighteenth of March, being many of them obliged to get up at that most heathen hour, or foreverforego the glory of having their heads tortured into matchless beauty by the thrice immortal Monsieur Manuel, king of the curling-irons, grand Turk of curls, quintessence of essences, and despotic sovereign of ladies' hearts as well as heads. For not a gentle female who aspires to the skirts, yea, the very outskirts of fashion, but sets her heart on being celestialized by the magic tongs of Monsieur Manuel, who perfected his inimitable art by curling the celestial beards of all the comets of the universe.

At the hour of six up rose the sun, and uprose Lindamira, who never had risen at that hour before, presenting in her eyes brighter splendours than ever glanced from the god of day, or the bright curling-irons of Monsieur Manuel. Reader, dost thou know Lindamira? If thou dost not, despair and die; and if thou dost, thou wilt not know thyself long, for she will steal away thy very soul, and destroy the consciousness of thy own identity. I will describe her, for I have her all by heart. I will describe her as she entered the ball-room at nine o'clock, on the illustrious eighteenth, put the orchestra out of time, disconcerted the great serpent, silenced the big fiddle, and prostrated sixteen invincible bachelors with a single blow from a beam of her eye.

But, now I think of it, I have not time; nor do I wish to annihilate one sex with envy, the other with despair. Besides, a greater even than she demands my pen, one who may be justly said to be at the very head of fashion, since he dresses the heads of all the fashionable ladies. Need I name the inimitable Manuel, the hero of the glorious eighteenth, without doubt or controversy.

At six "the hero rose." He seized his curling-tongs, more potent than the sceptre of Jove or the trident of Neptune; more magical in their wonders than the far-famed cestus of the queen of love and beauty. He entered a locomotive carriage of sixty miles an hour, which had been provided for him by the subscriptions of charitable young ladies, and whirled down Broadway with such inconceivable velocity, that he became invisible, and ran over at least half a dozen little milliner's apprentices, trudging along under handboxes that rendered them invisible too. But he went so fast that they actually did not know that they had been run over. The illustrious tongs—hear it, ye village maids and village shavers—the illustrious Manuel had three hundred heads of angels to dress that day, at a dollar a-piece! Hear it, and die of wonder one, and one of envy!

Torturing and soul-harrowing were the feelings of many a beauteous belle, and terrible the conflict of doubts, fears, hopes, apprehensions, and despair, lest Monsieur Manuel should break his word, and break their hearts, by not coming in time, or not coming at all. If heaven had made me a barber, and such an one as Monsieur Manuel, I should certainly have run stark mad at sight of the beautiful tresses displayed to my wondering gaze, and at the touch of their soft glossy luxuriance.

Why didst thou, fate, deprive me of the fame
Of Manuel's skill and Manuel's matchless name;
And why, instead of making me a beau,
Was I not bred a barber here below?

But, enough of regrets, since I cannot be Monsieur Manuel, I rejoice that I am Filmer Flippington.

On entering the assembly room at nine, leading the fair Lindamira—think of that, ye illiterate scribes and pharisees, who never saw the glories of her face, or the splendours of a fancy ball—on entering the room, I found myself all at once struck dumb, deaf, and blind; in short, I lost the command of all the five senses at one single blow. The lights took away my eyes, the music my ears, and the trout ensemble carried off the rest of the five. But luckily the deprivation was not permanent, and I soon recovered the powers of perception as well as locomotion.

It is quite impossible to describe the scene, so as to convey to those unfortunate doomed beings who were playing Cindrella that night in the chimney-corner, a shadow of an idea of the combined effect of lights, music, dancing, dresses, all deriving grace and splendour from the presence of a thousand of nature's master-pieces, glittering and fluttering to and fro, like the creations of the imagination in her happiest moments. Nor is the task of doing justice to each of the magic figures of this magic scene less hopeless. No one can describe the groups of crusaders, who, if the holy land had been still to conquer, would have laid it at their feet; or the peasant girls, from whom the graces might have borrowed grace, and the goddess of beauty, beauty; or the little non-combatant quakeresses, before whom the hearts of the stoutest bachelors trembled; or the single figures, each a wonder in herself, the Armidas of the scene, who alone discomfited whole hosts of beaux, that feared not even their own shadows, or shrunk from the sight of their whiskers in a looking-glass.

The catalogue would fill a volume, which, if it only did justice to the scene and the actors, would distance all the wonders of the Arabian nights. All I can aspire to is the sketching a few shadows, the substance of which has, as it were, dissolved in the ink that flows from my pen.

First came the inimitable Lindamira, followed by a large train of admirers, myself among the rest, of whom, to use the language of the poet, with a little variation:

"Some died in metaphor, and some in song.
'O cruel nymph, a living death I bear!'
Cried Dapperwit, and sunk behind her chair.
A mournful glance Sir Fopling upward cast;
'Those eyes are made so killing,' was his last.
Thus on Meander's flowery margin lies
The expiring swan, and as he sings he dies.
The bold Sir Plume by one decisive frown
From Lindamira's eye was knock'd flat down.
She smiled to see the doughty hero slain,
But at her smile the beau revived again.
'Ah! matchless maid!' the fallen hero cries,
'Both life and death are in those killing eyes!'"

Next let me record the triumphs of the fair Amanda, who, under the disguise of a sly quakeress, did shoot such deadly arrows from behind a little mischievous lawn cap, as never did Apollo himself, when at the siege of Troy he avenged the indignity offered to his priest. Had George Fox or William Penn been there, they would have adored her as the living representative of their simple and beautiful faith.

Here, too, floated along in the azure and happy folds of a sparkling robe, the conquering Ethelinda, of whom it was truly said that night, by a foreigner of distinction, that she actually outdid herself, and convinced him of what he knew before, that she was the most beautiful, as well as most graceful, of her sex. She appeared in the disguise of a virgin of the sun; and, had the sun ventured to shine out that night, he would have been eclipsed more totally than he was the other day. The following impromptu was made on the lady:

"Why is bright Ethelinda like the moon?"
Did Dapperwit inspired cry.
'Because she's ever changing?' "No, because,
She doth eclipse the sun with half an eye."

Here, too, appeared one fair and delicate maid, who came in her own character; justly concluding, I suppose, she could not adopt one more pure and spotless, or improve those beauties which nature in her prodigality had bestowed upon her. She came, like innocence, in spotless white; a few flowers stuck in her hair, a few in her bosom; and wherever she glided, the gaudy splendours of dress, the glittering gold, the shining silver, and the sparkling gems, seemed to turn dim with envy. Such is the magic of a tasteful, graceful simplicity.

Then came, but enough—other themes demand our song. It is meet that we immortalize the conquests achieved on this illustrious night; what ladies triumphed, what heroes fell, and who escaped the dreadful carnage.

Come, then, my muse, and dip thy pen in fire,
To paint the battle and the carnage dire;
Say who was caught, who fell, who ran away,
Who lost, who won, on that eventful day. (Night.)

First, Fanny Flutter, who made her debut at the illustrious fancy ball, unfortunately had her head so completely turned by the admiration she excited, that it is feared by her friends it will never get right again.

Next, poor Florinda Oriel was so severely wounded by a dart of envy from a rival belle, that the doctors have given it as their solemn opinion a voyage to Europe can alone restore her health.

Next, the unfortunate Miss Lappet Lovegold fell into a swoon, at seeing young Cæsus Creepingham exceedingly attentive to Florinda Oriel. N. B. Cæsus is almost as rich as his namesake, and no wonder the sensibility of Miss Lappet was overcome.

It is also rumoured, but this one particular I do not vouch for, that several ladies of the ancien régime, who attended the ball from mere curiosity, actually expired with envy at seeing its immeasurable superiority over those they had been boasting of to the young ladies for half a century.

But the fate of the bachelors is most to be commemorated and lamented. It may with truth be said they fell victims to their own generosity. They gave the ball, and they alone suffered the penalty.

First, Jemmy Tweedle was nearly annihilated at seeing the fair Juliana waltz with Count Flibbertigibbet, "an extinguished foreigner," as her mother assured me. But he was miraculously restored to his better self by a demi bouteille de Champagne.

Next, Bobby Blabington, who had defied big sleeves, short petticoats, and whole forests of feathers for ages past, was struck down by the apparition of a lady's back, whose name is unknown in the circles of fashion. But the worthy middle-aged gentleman was gloriously resuscitated by eating plentifully of gelée au rhum ou au madère.

The third illustrious victim was Slimmerkin Slammerkin, Esquire, who was instantaneously extinguished by a beam from the bright peepers of Charlotte Millifleur. He was, however, brought to life by a humane society of bachelors, who administered to him plenty of Charlotte de Pommes aux confitures.

Next fell Philibert Philpot. He was drowned in a flood of rapture at the sight of a lady dancing a quadrille; but a timely application of Baume humain at supper expelled the flood, and brought him to life again.

At the same fatal moment Jacky Dandy, he that was so fond of "plumb-cake and sugar-candy," fell senseless at the feet of Amanda D. But he was immediately recovered by a plate of Amandes fraîches, and now defies all the Amandas in the world.

Another bachelor of great promise was seized with a desperate yellow fever, occasioned by a lady in an orange robe; but he was saved by a timely application of some compote d'oranges, or orange glacée, which brought on a free perspiration after he got home.

The next I shall particularize in this melancholy bill of mortality was Master Silky, a delicate invisible sort of a gentleman, who is so thin that, like the wizard Michael Scott, he makes no shadow in the sun. But, though others may not see him, he likes above all things to see himself. Happening on this memorable night to behold his delicate form reflected in the blue heaven of a lady's eye, he who defied the arts and fascinations of the eye itself, and its beautiful owner, fell into, not love, but adoration. His case resisted all the applications usual in such extremities, and he died of this common, but incurable disease, in spite of Curaçoa and Mirobolanti.

Everybody, that is, everybody worth knowing, and all others I forbid reading this epithalamium of fashion and taste—everybody knows Tom Steady, one of the most determined insensible bachelors of the age, who has resisted all the beauties of nature and of art combined. This night was the crisis of his fate. A number of his contemporaries who had been subdued at last in this memorable battle, being resolved, for misery they say loves company, to have him for a companion in their desertion of the state of bachelorism, essayed to bring him up to the blissful state of matrimony. They first assailed him with Rosolio de Bologne, but in vain; next they tried him with a glass of Anisette de Hollande, but he continued immovable; thirdly, an application of Eau de vie de Dantzick, but it would not do; then Essence de Genievre, still he breathed defiance to the sex; but at length just as they were on the point of despairing, a couple of glasses of Huile de Kirsch-wasser, did his business. Like poor Ophelia, he went in a bachelor, but a bachelor never came out more. He offered himself to the first short unmentionables he met, was accepted as shortly, and will shortly be married.

But alas! in the midst of splendours, rejoicings, marrying and giving in marriage, the evils of this inconstant world will sometimes intrude and throw a shade of melancholy over the bright prospect! I grieve to announce to your readers, that Belinda Jonquil, Ellen Polyanthus, Julia Laurustinus, Arabella Convolvulus, and Caroline Matilda Hyacinth, being disappointed in getting their heads dressed by the inimitable Manuel, in consequence of his locomotive engine breaking down about seven in the evening, died that night of broken hearts, and their spectres appeared hovering round the supper table so pale that everybody thought they were in a decline. It is also rumoured that three or four would-be's, are in a bad way on account of the managers having forbidden the dancing of the gallopade, it having been detected in turning the heads of some of the stoutest and steadiest bachelors about town. Sic transit gloria Friday! F. ITALIAN LITERATURE.

ORIGINAL SKETCHES OF EMINENT CHARACTERS.

DANTE.

DANTE ALIGHIERI was born in 1292, of a noble family of Florence, at a time when the rival factions of the Guelphs and Ghibellines made that city the prey of carnage and civil war. He joined the party and shared the fate of the former; was driven from his native city, and lived for many years a life of exile, want, and danger. Receiving no aid from those whose cause he had espoused so unhesitatingly, he went over at last, either from revenge or despair, to the opposite party. He never, however, revisited the city which his talents were to immortalize, but his sufferings to disgrace for ever. He closed a life of trouble and sorrow in a foreign land, and yet sleeps, "Like Scipio, buried by the upbraiding shore."

There was much in the events of his life, and the situation of his country, to stir up all the bitterness of his naturally gloomy spirit. He saw his beloved Florence the prey of foreign violence and domestic treachery; sold by her children, plundered and trampled on by her friends. He was himself a victim, whose fortune and hopes had been blasted by the same pestilence which destroyed her honour and happiness. He had lost a noble rank and independent fortune. He had been the victim of injustice and insult, the sport of hazard, the prey of misery. Reduced to seek shelter with the enemies he hated and despised, he had felt, as he says himself,

"How salt the savor is of others' bread,
How hard the passage to descend and climb
By others' stairs."

No wonder, then, that we see at every line the workings of just and implacable resentment, proud and honest sorrow, wounded yet faithful patriotism; no wonder that his wrongs and sufferings have given the same dark tinge to his writings which they shed over his life and temper.

His principal work, it is needless to say, is "La Divina Commedia," called divine, not from a pardonable vanity in the author, but from the sacred nature of its subject. The word comedy does not indicate any thing dramatic in its form. He adopted it as denoting a lower grade of poetry than the epic, to which rank he supposed the Æneid to have exclusive claims; and as he most probably had never read, and certainly had never seen a comedy, he knew not that there was any impropriety in the title. The plan of the work is grand, yet simple. It is the journey of the author through hell, purgatory, and paradise, and describes the punishments of the one and the joys of the other. Entering at the surface of the earth he finds himself in a vast cavity, reaching to the centre by a series of circles, in each of which some crimes are visited with their appropriate torments. Lucifer sits at the centre, imprisoned in an ocean of ice. Beyond the fiend lies purgatory, in the form of a cone, reaching to the surface of the opposite hemisphere, where he places the terrestrial paradise. The celestial paradise is beyond this, divided into seven heavens, and sprinkled with stars and planets, the abodes of happy spirits.

It is in the first division of the work that he puts forth all his strength. There are a few fine passages in the Purgatory, but as a whole this and the Paradise are tedious, and disfigured by the perplexed metaphysics and polemics of the age. But the Inferno, to make amends, abounds with beauties; such, too, as few have imitated, and none have ever rivalled. In relating the punishments of the wicked he displays the greatest powers of thought and language; and nothing can be brought home to the mind with more horrible fidelity than their foul and fearful torments. He does not seek to dazzle or astonish; it is a man telling a story which he feels deeply himself, and whose only aim is to set the events he describes clearly before his hearers, no matter how rough the expressions or homely the images he employs. The great secret of the strong impression he makes is, that he avoids burying his subject under a load of extraneous circumstances, or surrounding it with bright but bewildering ornaments. He brings it before you, unadorned with pomp of language or beauty of illustration, but clear, natural, and forcible in its simplicity.

The measure of the poem is one invented by him, and since called terza rima, that is, two rhymes are repeated alternately three times each. This measure, singular as it seems, has been extensively and skilfully used in Italy, and Byron has employed it in "The Prophecy of Dante," with as much success as our language will allow.

His style in general is hard and rough; obscure sometimes from his abrupt energy; often from the metaphysical speculations into which he wanders, and oftener still from the local allusions with which his works are crowded. His are not the light touches of a pencil dipped in the rainbow; he is rather one who would write on marble, who strikes with rude strength, and whose blows sink deep. His works wear the gloomy colouring of his mind. He was of a grave, lofty, reflective spirit, hardened by adversity, and embittered by suffering, hence there is little glow of poetic fervour, little play of the sportive imagination about him. But when the frown of his face generally wears does relax, the smile that lights it up is doubly brilliant from the contrast; and when his genius does flash forth from the gloom in which it loves to shroud itself, it has the brightness of the lightning breaking the darkness of the storm. Hence when he interrupts his plain narrative for some episode of pathos or of power, the effect is inconceivably beautiful; in particular, we may instance the story of Francesca di Rimini, one of the most affecting tales of guilty, yet delicate and tender love, that ever was clothed in verse; and the darker, yet still more masterly picture, of the death of Count Ugolino and his sons by famine. In this last episode there is no load of ornament, no exaggeration of superlatives. It is a plain tale of intense suffering and mortal agony; but all the horrors of the diseased imagination, all the nightmare dreams of German mysticism, never came up to its simple, appalling reality.

No man ever exercised so great, so honourable, and so extensive a literary influence as Dante. Homer died without having instructed the ignorance or aroused the emulation of his countrymen; and Virgil shone but as a single star in a bright and thickly set constellation. But Dante found the Italians illiterate, and left them aroused and enlightened, and substituted strength and confidence for the helpless weakness of their minds; hence his popularity is one of the proudest that any poet ever enjoyed. The natural beauty of Shakspeare is unintelligible and displeasing to the artificial taste of other countries; and Milton soars beyond the reach of their short-sighted gaze. The very names of many of our poets are unknown to the foreign critic. But the sweetness and melody of the Italian language, which make it every where the chosen vehicle of music, introduce a knowledge of the riches of its literature as well as of the graces of its harmony; and Dante, like Homer, is appreciated and admired, where the noblest flights of the English muse would be pursued by the carplings of petty criticism. Abroad even national prejudice does not deny him the highest honours; at home his popularity amounts almost to idolatry. His works are studied as a branch of education, and the explanation of them has risen almost to the rank of a science. The beauty of his style, the grandeur of his conceptions, the living accuracy of his pictures, these the Italians admire, repeat and consecrate as the richest legacy of one generation to another. These are only claims on their respect, but he is entitled to and receives the further tribute of their gratitude. Their loved and boasted language is his gift. His strong creative mind brought together its scattered atoms, and they united in that fabric of beautiful strength and harmonious proportion, of which he is at once the architect and the noblest ornament. From his works, too, they draw the purest and noblest lessons of patriotism, and learn to cast off sectional jealousies, and glory in the name of that common country which he loved, forgave, and lamented.

It is doing no injustice to the memory of Milton to compare him with Dante. Both arose in times of fierce dissensions, tumultuous anarchy, and riotous license; and the mind of each was borne along by the strong tide of popular feeling which swayed their lives. Each arose also in the thickest of the struggle between prejudice and liberality, oppression and resistance; and to their credit, to the credit of genius, and the credit of human nature be it spoken, each was found on the side of truth and justice. Not like the indolent philanthropists of the school of Rousseau,

"Nursing in some delicious solitude
Their slothful loves and dainty sympathies;"

but armed champions in the lists, periling themselves and all that belonged to them in support of the good cause. Each was the eloquent apostle, each was ready to become the martyr of freedom. Both labored with the same benevolent zeal for the welfare of their countrymen. Milton employed his pen in the Areopagitica, the Tract on Education, the Defensio Populi Anglicani. Dante's works were of the same honorable and useful character, the Treatise De Vulgari Eloquentia, which led to the cultivation of the language, and La Divina Commedia, which formed and fixed it.

Such is the similarity of their characters—in their writings there are more points of difference than of resemblance. Milton's mind was high, excursive, and contemplative; Dante's quick, stern, decided. Milton's power of association was unbounded; it embraced and combined

"All thinking things, the objects of all thought."

Dante, whether the object before him was gloomy or beautiful, mean or majestic, saw it and spoke of it only as it was. Milton is like Noah's dove, which wandered over earth and air before it returned to its resting-place; Dante, like the falcon which fastens its eye on its prey, and lights upon it at once. Milton is like the sun, extending its rays throughout the universe; spreading undivided, and operating unspent; Dante like the lightning, flashing out from the midst of "thick clouds and dark," and descending in dazzling and blasting power on its victim. The difference of their characters we can discover, or at least fancy in their portraits. On the high calm forehead of Milton we can see enthroned the soaring spirit, which rose in its meditations beyond this visible sphere into the distant glories of immensity, and went on its way in pride and triumph, where other minds paused, bewildered and trembling. His features speak of a soul regulated by rigid discipline, stored with all wholesome learning, purified by fervent piety, which bore as little of the stain of this world as ever did any of mortal mould. Dante's face is that of a man of sterner and more intense passion, quicker and more irritable feeling. His brow has not the calm expansion of Milton's, it is contracted into a thousand wrinkles, the foot-prints of the various emotions,

"Love, hatred, pride, hope, sorrow, all save fear," which chased each other through his brain. Dante lived in the world, and found nothing uncongenial to his taste in his contests and employments. Milton became Latin secretary to Cromwell, and the champion of his party from a sense of duty; but, while he cheerfully performed his task, he would rather have retired from the "busy hum of men," to lead the peaceful religious life of penance but not gloomy melancholy, solemn yet not sad musing, he describes so exquisitely. Dante was of the Roman temper of Cæsar and Cato, Milton had more of the attic elegance of Plato and Xenophon. The one loved to be first in a crowd of combatants, the other

"Apart sat on a hill retired,
In thought more elevate, and reasoned high
Of providence, foreknowledge, will, and fate."

Dante we have always thought a greater master of the affections than Milton. He is more vivid and dramatic in his sketches; quicker, more fervent and impassioned in his tone of thought. Neither of them would have had much success in treating the other's subject. The Englishman wanted a fair field, untouched and unapproachable by man; the Italian could not "build the lofty rhyme," without the abundant material which the business and passions of the world supplied. The gloomy caves of hell would not have furnished him with inspiration had he not peopled them with real beings, and filled them with the vindictive jealousies and sharp contests of his own stormy and eventful life.

Dante is often rough and homely in his narrative. Milton's faults are the contrary, metaphysical obscurity and over refinement. He never forgets himself; though his wing after too high a flight may sometimes flag, he never entirely droops his pinion; to use his own happy expression, on him, wherever he moved

"A pomp of winning graces waited still."

He is a magician whose art can cover every barren spot with flowers, and beguile the tedious way he leads us by the splendid scenery he scatters round it. Dante is rather a fellow-traveller with us, who in a long journey is sometimes dull and tiresome, sometimes harsh and repulsive, but whom we always feel to be a man of no common order, and whose powers, when passion gives them eloquence or energy, can startle, soothe, dazzle, or terrify us at will. We love the honest hatred of wrong, the quick sensitive pride, the constant though wounded patriotism of his character; we admire the intensity, sternness, and simple majesty of his genius, and only regret that he speaks a foreign tongue, and not our own. Had he been an Englishman, he would have made a noble triumph to share with Shakspeare and Milton the empire of the literary world. Δ.

EPITAPH ON AN INFANT.

Stain not this urn with sorrow's tear,
Nought but a blighted leaf is here;
The cherished flower, not fully blown,
Its opening beauties scarcely known,
Was severed from its earthly stem
To deck an angel's diadem.

CAOETHES SCRIBENDI.

NEAR a pleasant little village on the Hudson lives a cousin of mine; a curious being, whom the neighbours call an original. His father possesses a fine farm, on which Will, (as he is familiarly termed,) in spite of his indolent disposition and poetic mania, is obliged to lend an unwilling hand to the plough. I speak of him rather as he was a few months since, than as he is at present; for the sequel will show that a trifling, yet mortifying circumstance, has effected a radical change in his character.

He takes sundry periodical works, among which is the New-York Mirror; and as these have tended to render him almost a drone on the farm, the editors of that paper must be willing to bear a considerable portion of the blame; for he is an admirer of it, and has repeatedly declared in my hearing that he would be the happiest man in existence if, by a lucky chance, he could produce something that would be considered worthy of a place in its columns. He was constantly scribbling verses, which I was compelled to read; and as they came to me by mail, I was also obliged to pay the postage, two equally valuable privileges allowed me on the score of friendship.

"His insatiable thirst for poetic fame," said his father, "is certainly a disease that has fastened upon his system."

The honest old gentleman was fearful that his son's health might give way under its influence. He assured me that Will spent whole nights in reading and writing, and seemed to care as little about the farm as if it were a tract of land in the centre of Africa.

"He will sit at table," said my uncle, "with his paper beside his plate, and in the ardour of composition will not unfrequently mistake his fork for his pen. When he goes to the village on horseback he reads the whole distance; and I have known him travel five miles out of the direct road before he discovered his error. O! had I foreseen this I never would have suffered one of those papers to be brought into my house; but, alas! it is too late—the disease, which is now raging with irresistible fury throughout the United States, has found its way into my peaceful habitation, and threatens us with dreadful consequences. O! that vaccination would prevent its increase!"

A few months ago Will wrote me that, notwithstanding the objections advanced by his father, he had fully made up his mind to become a literary man; and that, upon serious reflection, he had decided to establish himself as a writer for some popular magazine. He thought there must be a fine vein of poetry in the strata of his intellect, which, with some exertion, might be brought to light. At first he deemed there would be a better chance of his obtaining celebrity through the medium of prose, and for a considerable time he remained in doubt; but when he took into consideration his sensitive feelings—his liability to fall in love—his admiration of the beauties of nature—his melancholy taste for twilight, evening, and the moon, he determined that poetry was best adapted to his intellectual powers. After much reflection on this very momentous subject, he said to me one day, in a tone which indicated a heart glowing with enthusiasm,

"My dear cousin, why may not I acquire a name that shall not only be known in every corner of the civilized world, but that shall go down to posterity, and become an ornament to our country's literature? I am a farmer, it is true, but was not Burns the same? and did Bloomfield have more time to devote to such subjects than I have? yet they are known and admired wherever our language is spoken. I never learned Latin or Greek, neither did they; and it is proved that the immortal Shakespeare was but very little acquainted with classical literature."

"True, Will," said I, "they were men whose education was limited; but you must recollect that the genius which nature dispensed to them was of the most transcendent order; it more than compensated for the want of that which enables other men of less capacity to display their abilities to the greatest advantage; and where one such has succeeded in obtaining immortality a thousand have sunk in oblivion. I do not mean to insist, however, that a knowledge of what are termed the dead languages is absolutely necessary to the success of a writer, as we have abundant proof to the contrary in our own country; but I really think, that we have already as many writers, both of prose and verse, as are necessary to give us all the information and amusement of which we stand in need. Look at the formidable host of living authors of England and America, and say, if you will dare enter the lists in competition with them. Believe me, Will, it requires a man of very considerable abilities to become a tenth-rate writer; and none need hope to be regarded as a star in the literary firmament till he has passed through years of patient labour, study, and practice, unless he possesses the genius of Shakspeare or Homer. We are too apt to mistake an admiration of beautiful composition for a power to produce it."

On hearing this Will began to despond; he cast his eyes to the earth, and remained silent for some time; his unbounded ambition, however, gave him fresh courage, and unwilling to quit the field without an effort, he said, with much animation, "I will write, in spite of your exertions to discourage me. It always has been the fate of genius to meet with almost insurmountable obstacles, and, like those who have gone before me, I have had to contend with many difficulties, and like them I hope to succeed triumphantly."

"Courage, cousin," said I; "your enthusiasm and confidence persuade me that you are a poet. Let me see of what your extraordinary powers are capable. I will no longer endeavour to impede your progress up the steep of fame; and it shall not be said by my contemporaries and by posterity that I was incapable of appreciating merit. Who knows but that my company may be courted some day in consequence of my being related to the greatest wit of the age? Throw aside your hoe and plough, Will, and assume the pen; there is nothing like trying after all; and it will be a most excellent exchange to give your crops of wheat and rye, your pretty ponies, and the beautiful scenery on this most magnificent of rivers, for the rich harvest of dollars to be gathered from your publishers, for a residence in the city, and for the wreath with which your brows will there be crowned. Kill all your noisy geese, and pluck out their quills, for you will have need of many hundreds of them; sell your horses and waggon, and let nothing remain on the farm that can be turned into cash. Commence a novel after the fashion of Pelham, and—oh! I mistake, you are a poet—then begin a poem immediately, in imitation of Byron's Corsair, and by adopting his manners and habits, success must follow your labours. I will furnish you with materials for the proposed poem, instantly. Waiter, bring a glass of gin and water and a paper of tobacco. Roll down your shirt collar, and display your neck; place your right elbow on this table, and support your chin on your right hand; then contract your eyebrows; look as melancholy as you possibly can, and endeavour to persuade yourself that the whole world is against you. In the waiter's absence I will give you the plot—now listen attentively.—"On the shores of the Mediterranean—"

"Nonsense," said my astonished cousin. "I have no wish to part with an article of mine, nor to take up my residence in the city. I can manage my farm, attend to the ordinary duties, and employ my leisure hours in composition, which will be doing nothing more than others have done. I have no desire to live by my literary labours; my soul thirsts after fame, and I am resolved upon obtaining a name. I will write for the periodicals, and with your assistance, I hope to be able, with study and practice, to acquire a reputation, for which alone I live and breathe."

Seeing him so resolute, I promised my assistance. I continued to receive daily for some time pieces composed by him, on various subjects. It was with the greatest difficulty, however, that I discovered our author's meaning; whether his ideas flowed in such profusion as to render it impossible for him to clothe them in language sufficiently perspicuous, or whether it was the consequence of carelessness, I am unable to decide. In a few weeks my cousin came to New-York, when I had a conversation with him respecting his effusions. I told him that obscurity was the predominant quality of his style; he smiled, and said that obscurity was what he aimed at, and that his only fear was of expressing himself too clearly. He considered perspicuity and precision unpardonable faults, and positively asserted, that some of the most beautiful passages of Shakspeare are wrapped in impenetrable darkness.

"Have you not discovered," said he, "that the simplicity of the classic authors is now out of fashion? Who would read a piece where the sense is as clearly seen as pebbles in a running brook? Nobody. I should consider the poet who produced it as having arrived too late upon earth by half a century. Depend upon it, such stuff will never again be admired. I have determined to adapt my poetry to the prevailing taste. Ornament and drapery shall be my chief study. I shall endeavour to load it with high-sounding compound-words, which, taken in connexion with the fashionable similes and metaphors that are daily to be met with, cannot fail to give my poetry a high reputation. Here is a piece which I finished yesterday, and I think you will allow it to be one of my happiest efforts. I have lately been looking over the works of my favourite, Mrs. Hemans; the sweetness of whose verses has so captivated many of our poets, that they have formed their style upon hers. I have infused into this piece all those compound-words which I consider so peculiarly adapted to this species of composition; and there is scarcely a beautiful expression used by that inimitable poetess which I have not contrived to link together in this new production of mine. And now, my dear H., as you have promised, present this poem to the editors of the New-York Mirror, who certainly cannot fail to appreciate its merits. I have prepared it expressly for that paper, and be so good as to send me up the number that contains it."

Will handed me his lines, which three sheets of foolscap paper scarcely contained, and without reading one syllable of them, I sent them immediately to the editors, in order to make good my promise. My cousin, on being informed that his production had gone to the press, plunged into an ecstasy of joy; he was so impatient for the forthcoming number of the miscellany, that he neither spoke nor thought of any thing else. He concluded not to return home till he had procured a copy; and figured in his imagination the praises that his poem would elicit, and the inquiries that would be made respecting the author. He determined not to give his name to the public, nor any clew by which it might be discovered; and he exacted the promise from me, that I would neither say nor do anything that might lead to the disclosure of the very important secret; but he informed all the elder members of the family that he was about to appear anonymously before the world in the character of an author, and promised to make every one of them a present of a copy of his first printed poem.

At length the day on which the Mirror is published arrived. Will arose before the sun, and walked down to purchase twenty copies; but, not finding the office open, he returned, evidently much disappointed. The poor author was so much exhausted, from a want of sleep, that he several times nodded at the table. After breakfast he set off, with renewed energy, and in about an hour returned, with a large bundle under his arm. His eyes beamed with joy; and, throwing his hat carelessly aside, it rolled into the fire, and was with difficulty saved from the flames. He then proceeded with much haste to untie the bundle, at the same time relating the circumstances attending the purchase. He declared that editors must be the happiest of men.

"They have nothing to do," said he, "but to sit in a large arm-chair, looking over letters from their correspondents; now rejecting one, and now marking another for insertion. They are never called off from their intellectual labour by the duties of the field, nor obliged to throw down an interesting work to carry horses or to feed cows. O! delightful occupation! how I should like to be an editor!"

All things being prepared, and the family seated around the fire, Will eagerly seized a copy of the Mirror, and joined the circle. I discovered, from my situation in the corner, a smile upon every countenance, excepting that of my poor cousin; and I dreaded the unfolding of the papers, of which he had procured an abundant supply, in order that each of his New-York and country relations might possess one. He opened at the first page, and threw his glances over it with the rapidity of lightning—but his poem was not there. He turned to the others successively, till his eye rested on the music. His countenance then began to evince symptoms of mingled rage and mortification. I fully expected to see a flood of tears burst from his eyes, but he controlled his disappointment better than I anticipated. He sat in profound silence some minutes, and then, in an animated tone, said that the editors were no judges of poetry; and wondered how, in the name of common sense, they had been able to procure such extensive patronage. He threatened to return the numbers, and to demand the money which he had paid for them; but, upon further consideration, he determined to treat the editors with contempt, and to pity the men who were unable to discover the merit of that extraordinary production. He attributed its failure to its perspicuity, and declared that his next piece should be as dark as midnight, that no reader, however sagacious, might be able to come at its meaning. He said that we were all witnesses of the persecution of genius, and expressed his intention of writing a satire after the manner of Lord Byron, the motto of which should be,

Prepare for rhyme, I'll publish right or wrong;
Fools are my theme, let satire be my song.

We all joined in a hearty laugh at his vanity. Partially cured of his poetic mania, however, he returned home a few days after, since which he has married, and is in every respect a good husbandman. He has ceased to trouble me with his compositions, and I have every reason to believe that he will attend to the duties of his farm, and amuse himself with reading instead of writing poetry.

THE DRAMA.

THE PARK THEATRE.

TANCRED, KING OF SICILY.

THE production of a good tragedy, interesting in its plot, without being improbable, elevated and poetic in its language without extravagance, and yet properly adapted to the stage, is an undertaking of so great magnitude as to require a variety of ingredients sufficient to make up a dozen ordinary authors. The successful aspirant must possess a strong imagination, curbed by a knowledge of the world and of human nature; the wild luxuriance of genius must be brought down within the compass of narrow details; and its impulses be made to accomplish petty effects—as a tumbling stream is turned from its foaming course down the mountain, and made to meander through meadows, or to impel the wheel of a mill. He who attempts a mere reading poem is unrestrained by these considerations; he can follow the current of his own fancy; he can open what vein of thought he pleases, and trace it at leisure through all its ramifications; but what in him is a merit, is a fault fatal to the dramatist. To his genius must be superadded a thorough familiarity with the manner in which matters are conducted behind the scenes of a theatre. His hero must invoke the stars in a speech long enough to allow his heroine time to change her garments; his teeming imagination must learn to compress great ideas within a few words; action must often display what there is no time for language to utter; and important events must be so ingeniously introduced as to be comprehended by a mixed auditory, without any preliminary explanation.

It is, therefore, much more difficult to produce a good acting play than a good poem; and the many obstacles which interfere with the success of the former, have frightened away a host of ambitious authors from the ground. Byron made several attempts; but, although acquainted with the necessary requisites for stage effect, and one of the committee who superintended the affairs of a theatre, it soon became clearly apparent, that what was charming in the closet was dull and inappropriate before an audience. His theatrical pieces are full of fine sentiments and musical expressions; but the author of Childe Harold, formed to roam like an eagle through the realms of thought and fancy, when confined to the stage, resembled the same kingly bird, imprisoned and drooping in some narrow cage, with scarcely room to spread his wings. Shakspeare, on the contrary, with a fancy as wild as nature herself, and as brilliant as the glowing radiance of the morning sun, had trained himself to the task of embodying his thoughts in the fewest possible words, and of adapting them to the contingencies of a theatrical exhibition; and hence his wreath of fame is more green than that of any other poet. Yet, with the wonderful offsprings of his pen, modern productions of the same nature must be brought into close comparison; a disadvantage which exercises its own influence in discouraging the efforts of writers for the stage, or in subjecting them, when completed, to the severest scrutiny.

The author of "Tancred" has for some time been known as a dramatist. His pieces have met with much approbation, particularly, "Metamora," which, by the aid of several adventitious circumstances, besides the great talents and popularity of Mr. Forrest, who sustained the principal part, was borne triumphantly through the ordeal. Its extraordinary success, although no criterion of its merit, has covered the author with a load of fame, rather injurious to his subsequent efforts; yet, if he proceed in his career with as visible an improvement as is exhibited in "Tancred," he will, undoubtedly, assume a rank above that of most of his American predecessors. It is altogether a better play than "Metamora;" but it is not what the author, with more study, might have made it, nor what we confidently anticipate his future pieces will be. It is exposed to censure on various grounds. The most glaring is a too rapid accumulation of improbable incidents in the plot; too violent displays of passion, and too many unexpected resuscitations. Ends are accomplished by too daring means. It is not the province of a playwright to bring about any consequence which is not the natural result of natural circumstances. The character of human life should be ever present to his mind, as a guide to his imagination. We have to complain, in Tancred, not only of a tame invention to excite interest, namely, the conveying an impression to the audience of the death of one of the dramatis personæ, who turns out to be alive and hearty, but of several repetitions of this same stratagem. Three or four of these posthumous anomalies so bewilder the spectators that when it becomes necessary to kill the detested Angelo actually dead, they see him nearly cut to pieces before their eyes, and going through all the agonies of death, without any sort of decided satisfaction. The scene where Olympia extorts a pardon from Angelo, by a few flourishes of her dagger, is extravagant. An armed soldier, in his own palace, is bullied by a lady into an act, contrary to his plans and wishes. The inconsistency of these circumstances would be less glaring if Mr. Barry were to appear without his sword. We also recommend a revision of the manuscript, and the correction of numerous imperfect lines. These errors may be hereafter very easily avoided; and, we trust, that before the author of Tancred commences the dialogue of any subsequent tragedy, he will, in the first place, bestow more careful reflection on the plot. But we have exhausted the acumen of critical justice, and hasten to the merits of the piece. Bating the objections above alluded to, the characters are drawn with much force; the incidents, with all their improbability, are managed with skill and knowledge of the stage; and the dialogue is spirited, and sometimes poetic. Certain scenes are very adroitly wrought up to great interest, and discover a talent sufficient to produce a whole play of equal merit, with a little more care in selecting the materials.

We extract a few lines, although they may scarcely pass as a fair specimen, as we quote from a detached portion of the piece. The dialogue occurs in the third scene of the fourth act, between Angelo, the Sicilian usurper, and his brother Romano. The latter is in prison, and visited by the former:

Rom. Rail on, rail on; thou mayest in safety now.
Bore I a soldier's weapon, haughty slave—
Ang. Thou couldst not combat with my mighty hate.
Thou hadst a brother?
Rom. Angelo.
Ang. That same am I.
Rom. 'Tis false as perjury.
Ang. 'Tis sure as fate. Twin-born with thee
To the same noble name and dignities,
From which estate a wrongful father's hand
Forth thrust me like an alien, for thee.
And for what reason? For thy beauty's sake.
Thy curled ringlets charmed the gossip tribe,
While these rude locks no fond adorning knew.
Thy comelier visage graced the gladdened hall,
While these ill-moulded features shrunk away,
As noxious vapours from the morning sun.
The courtier's darling, throned on hearts, wert thou;
While, in despair, I sought some dark retreat,
And brooded o'er my boyhood agonies.
Rom. And was this form's creation work of mine?
My heart did ever feel a brother's love.
Didst thou e'er cheer it with a brother's smile?
Ang. No.
I could not to a Judas kiss conform
The lip I taught to mutter hatred only.
Rom. And wherefore hatred?
Ang. I hated thee that nature loved thee so.
Labouring for thee within our mother's breast, &c.

If we have been free in our strictures on "Tancred," it is not to discourage this young author, (for we believe he is not much "declined into the vale of years,") but to urge upon him the necessity of renewed vigour and severe application. We think we can discover in Mr. Stone a spirit which will lead him onward; and we hope the public will not be lukewarm in rewarding him for the creditable results of his recent labours. In conclusion, we have only room to state that Mrs. Barnes was continually and deservedly applauded in Olympia; and Mr. Barry as Angelo, and Mr. Simpson as the Renegade, contributed greatly to the success of the piece. Our old favourite, Mr. Richings, notwithstanding his forte lies principally in the Jemmy Green line of business, was much more than respectable in Romano. These stage associations will sometimes disturb the critic's fancy, but a stranger must have been pleased with his personation.

STANZAS.

Oh, 'twas but for thy sake I taught
My harp a louder tone,
And checked its low-breathed murmurs, fraught
With love for thee alone;
Thou bad'st me with a bolder hand
Awake a lofty strain,
And when, dear love, did thy command
Fall on my ear in vain?
Yet hard the task—each trembling string
Was formed but to express
The gentle thoughts from love that spring,
The dreams of tenderness;
They cannot breathe of dark remorse,
Of souls untamed and wild,
Of passions, to whose fearful force
The tempest's wrath is mild.
But of the pure and stainless soul
That keeps its onward way,
Though storms and clouds before it roll,
And lightnings round it play,
The soul that with an eagle's wing
Soars to the sun's bright beam,
Of such, belov'd one, I may sing,
For thou art then my theme.

THE NEAT MAN.

"neat, trimly drest,
Fresh as a bridegroom, and his chin new reaped
Showed like a stubble-land at harvest home.
He was perfumed like a milliner,
And 'twixt his finger and his thumb he held
A pouncet box, which ever and anon
He gave his nose."

It was really delightful to look at him. Such teeth, such hands, such a foot. His boots shone like mirrors even in the muddiest season, and his cravat and collar had a grace, easy, uniform and natural as the bend of the autumn forest boughs, or the half curl of rose leaves in June. I never strained harder to grasp a problem in Euclid than I have teased my imagination to conjecture, "how in the name of all the gods at once," he kept his hat in such a state of everlasting and inexpressible brushed-up-ness; and as for his garments—by Apollo! I believe there was some chemistry about them—some inherent principle of repulsion, by which all the specks and atoms which congregate so familiarly upon the habiliments of other people, were repelled from the magic circle of Mr. John Jackson.

I have spent whole hours before the looking-glass absorbed in experiments upon cravat-knots, vests, &c. I have wasted incredible amounts of the circulating medium upon whisks, whisker-curlers, patent-stocks, and other auxiliaries by which the uninitiated strive to appear like gentlemen; and I have brushed my hat, at the particular request of some of my friends, till the rims and edges afford the most melancholy presages of a premature end. Fruitless labours, vain hopes! The distance between myself and the neat gentleman continues still immeasurable. Mr. Jackson is held up before me as a model; and the agreeable insinuation "only see, how Mr. Jackson looks," has been dinned in my ears, till I conceived an utter hatred for the man. I was tired of hearing Aristides for ever called the just.

Notwithstanding many bereavements, fate has left me a pair of sisters, who themselves are addicted to neatness. It is an incurable complaint indeed in every member of our family except my unfortunate self. As for me, I am guiltless of any such habits. I have indistinct recollections from my earliest boyhood of divers rebukes and horror-struck examinations of parents, sisters, nurse, school-masters and friends. My shoe-strings were dangling about my feet—my hat-band hung down over my shoulders. I bit off the fingers of my gloves, and clambered into trees in my new clothes. Early habits are faithful friends. They stick to you through good and evil.

"Oh Tom," said one of my sisters to me the other day, as I came in to accompany them to a little merry-making among their young friends, "are you going in this style to Mrs. B's?"

"Dear me," exclaimed Mary, with an expression of despair, "where in the world have you been? Only look at your coat." And she took hold of the flap daintily with her thumb and finger.

I had been down in South-street, leaning against a flour barrel.

"And I should like to know, Tom," said Julia, "when you brushed your hat?"

"Last Wednesday," said I.

"Dear me, your cravat is all awry; and let me comb the hair from your forehead—and let me put on this clean cravat—and do fling away that great ugly silk handkerchief and take this white one."

With these and a few dozen other gratifying marks of approbation, they proceeded to fix me up so as to be fit to be seen.

"Oh!" exclaimed Mary, casting her beautiful blue eyes pathetically towards heaven, "oh, if Tom was only as neat as Mr. Jackson."

Fair and gentle reader, couldst thou have witnessed my resignation under the beauty-bestowing operations of my affectionate tormentors. I thought with the unhappy Lear:

"Ye see me here, ye gods, a poor young man."

They wound around my neck a starched cravat as broad and stiff as a plank board, and which elevated my chin in the air like that of a captain of the militia on parade. My hair was disposed of according to their satisfaction—they beat me with straw brushes, and then led me like a sacrifice to the scene of fashion, where the unnatural elegance of my personal embellishments did almost "make me waver in my faith, and hold opinion with Pythagoras;" for it seemed to me, not that the soul of a brute had entered my body, but that my soul had infused itself into that of some other animal, as unlike me as possible.

In the midst of my trouble, Mr. John Jackson made his appearance. Notwithstanding the extraordinary submissions I had undergone for the purpose of producing effect, I was totally eclipsed. When I compared my appearance with his, my heart sunk within me, and I inwardly resolved to abandon all future useless endeavours to attract by my exterior, and to depend solely on my own merits. Yet, beehrew the weakness of my nature, I did darken with a momentary feeling of envy and regret at the conspicuous graces of Mr. Jackson's person rendered him such an exclusive object of attention. All the pretty girls in the room were soon on sociable terms with him, and apparently flattered by his notice; and "Mr. Jackson says this," and "Mr. Jackson says that," and "Mr. Jackson, a little cream," and "Mr. Jackson, a few pickled oysters," saluted my ears from all quarters.

It so happened that in the little vicissitudes of city life, I was some time after a lodger in a boarding-house, and the very first evening which I spent under the roof, the conversation at tea-table turned upon one of the boarders, a Mr. Somebody, whose name I did not hear.

"He was the neatest man they ever saw; he walked through mud and was not soiled; was caught in a shower and not wet; he could go out when the wind was blowing a gale, and not a hair of his head or his hat would be out of order."

"And he is just so in his room," said the respectable fat old female head of the family, "his little arrangements are as nice and regular as clock-work."

My heart sunk within me. "It must be Jackson," thought I. The door opened, and the identical subject of my ruminations came forward gracefully, and proceeded forthwith to take his tea. He was perfect wax-work. "My sisters are right," thought I; "I wish I was as neat as Mr. Jackson."

A short residence in the family made me more familiarly acquainted with him. I found him a man of business, a merchant, rich, intelligent, and amiable. Our friendship increased to such an intimacy that I had an opportunity of examining the construction of his mind. This threw a new light upon the subject. I congratulated him one day upon the great apparent convenience of his present situation.

"Fine house this, Mr. Jackson," said I; "well furnished, neat, clean and handsome, good table, good attendance, and—"

He shook his head, one of those melancholy shakes by which a man means to say, "Ah, if you knew what I did, how different would be your opinion."

"The fact is, my dear fellow," said he, and he gazed around to ascertain that no one was within hearing, and drew up his face into one of those expressions with which an invalid looks into the cup of medicine about to be presented to his own loathing palate, "the fact is, they are very good people, but they are slovenly; there's no niceness in their arrangements. I have tried fifty places, and the truth is, this is the best of them all; but I am not satisfied by any means. I can't bear to think of it. It makes me wretched."

"Oh, ho!" thought I. "Now we have it. So much for Mr. Jackson's neatness."

I came home one evening. Voices were on the stairs; one a man's in a high key; the other a female's, low, diffident, and respectful. The gentleman was Jackson. He was scolding his washerwoman. I was astounded. He had appeared the meekest creature that ever curled his hair. He seemed a little confused, but apologized.

"I don't get into a passion often, sir; but these detestable, infernal, careless, washerwomen—they are perfectly reckless. This woman has sent home my linen in such a state, ironed abominably, plaited villainously, and with several specks on it. It's awful. I pay double price to have my washing well done, and yet," he stamped his foot, "it's enough to drive one mad."

So, so. I thought Mr. Jackson's neatness doesn't come for nothing.

We walked together one morning in spring, near the suburbs of the town. A gleam of the river shone like silver in the distance, grassy undulating hills spread beautifully around us, and the houses were surrounded with trees, flowers, and shrubbery. The lilac was breathing the delicious scent of its clustering flower; cattle were reposing in groups, as you have seen them in rich old pictures; not a breeze stirred the drops that hung from the bushes in sparkling gems, and the exuberant loveliness of spring was everywhere visible.

I was remarking on the fairest features of the scene, when he stopped suddenly. His face assumed an expression of horror, and he pointed to an object, which turned out to be a very plump, pretty chambermaid sweeping, with one of those quiet, sweet faces, which young unmarried gentlemen, of warm dispositions, love to fold their arms, and gaze on.

"Let us pass near her," said I. "Look at those eyes."

"Let us cross over," said Jackson. "Look at that broom."

"Why did fate make such a creature as that a chambermaid?" said I.

"Why the devil don't she sprinkle before she sweeps?" said he.

I am told he was quite attached to a charming young lady, and that he took her out one day to pop the question, when they were overtaken by a high wind. His companion was a novel-reading, piano-playing, devotee to modern fashion. She had Moore and Bulwer at her fingers' ends, and was as romantic as he was neat.

"How beautifully the clouds are disposed above the blue vault of heaven," said the lady languishingly, and by way of introducing the tender conversation, for she knew what he was at as well as he did himself.

"What a devil of a dust!" said Jackson, in a passion.

"We had better forget the evils of our earthly existence," said the lady.

"I think we had better go home," said Jackson.

"Hoity toity," thought the lady; "what a spitfire I'm to have for my husband!"

"Horrible!" thought Jackson; "make love to a woman covered with dust!"

In short, I discovered that the glorious reputation for neatness which my friend had established on so firm a basis, was purchased with an incalculable sacrifice of simple ease and pleasure. A windy day gives him the blues. He will not eat a loaf of bread of doubtful origin; children, dogs, cats, and brooms are his abhorrence. Chimney-sweeps, bakers'-shops, stages, and steam-boats make him nervous. He is wretched if he has to sleep in a strange bed; and thus he goes on, shuddering and trembling, through life, suspicious of every thing, and often unhappy. What an effort it must be to him to go through the ordinary routine of business. I cannot conceive of any situation wherein he would be perfectly happy, unless he were dressed to his mind, hermetically sealed in a glass case, and put up in the museum for people to look at. F.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Webster's Dictionary.—This work continues to occupy public attention. To speak confidently of its claims to so great an honour, requires more time than we have yet been able to bestow upon it. It may not, however, be inappropriate to remark that it is in general use among booksellers, publishers, and printers; and we hereby warn our readers, when they behold any striking deviation from the ordinary methods of orthography or orthoëpy, they must not give vent to their strictures till after a careful examination of the "American Dictionary." We are frequently asked whether or not this stupendous work is considered decisive authority. However accurate and meritorious it may be, as it is not a volume to be skimmed lightly over in a rainy afternoon, nor to be animated upon by the unlearned, it requires time to make its excellencies known and to place it in its proper rank. Appearances are, however, much in its favour. Many of the best scholars of this country and of Great Britain have concurred in their approbation of it, and we have every reason to believe that the time is not far distant when it will supersede all its predecessors.

Music.—We have been compelled to delay the publication of M—t's interesting communication on the subject of Cinderella. It shall, however, appear in due time. It is very creditable to our musical taste that notwithstanding the absence of strangers, and during the depth of winter, the worst period for theatrical exhibitions, the city has afforded a fashionable and brilliant audience to the new opera for twenty nights. Our improvement in the science is also apparent in the great number and superior style of the late musical publications. Mr. James L. Hewett has just issued, on fancy coloured paper, and with vignette title-pages, the following pieces: the "Sailor's Tear," the "Gondola Glides," "Love's Sweet Souvenir," the "Corsair's Bride," the "Chimes of Zurich," the "Moon is up," and the "Brigand's Cotillions."

The Park.—The period for commencing operations for the embellishment of the Park has arrived, and we solicit the common council to an inquiry into some better means of improving its appearance than those they have hitherto adopted. This pleasant enclosure was last year cultivated in a rather imperfect manner. The grass was coarse and thin, and bare patches of ground were visible in many places. For several years it has been the subject of unsuccessful experiments, from which we may conclude that the method of sowing seed hitherto used, however generally practised elsewhere, will not produce good grass in the city. It must be obtained by sodding, which would be attended with little trouble or expense, and which, we doubt not, would ensure to this ornamental promenade a carpet of very beautiful and constant green. We would inquire if the paling around the grass plots are intended for permanent objects of decoration? If the natives are so barbarous in their deviations from the ordinary paths as to render a precaution of this kind necessary, it might surely be constructed in a more tasteful manner. We look upon a new and tender grass-plot in a crowded town with a sort of natural kindness; and he who would cross over one which he knew was meant for preservation, unless pursued by a mad dog or a constable, we deem little better than a careless good-for-nothing fellow, with no poetry in his soul—"let no such man be trusted."

GERMANICUS.

GENTLEMEN—We have waited patiently in expectation that this personage would attempt some defence of, or apology for, the errors which we exposed in his late attempt at biography; but he has failed to do either the one or the other, and we are not bound to wade knee-deep through a slough of impertinence, and to quit the broad road of fair discussion because the writer in question has chosen to do so. A few remarks, however, may not be inapt in the present state of the business.

In politics, Messrs. Editors, consistency is justly considered a cardinal virtue; the assertion of one set of principles to-day, and a fresh set to-morrow, whether caused by interest, pique, or vacillation, heaps disgrace upon the politician, and he immediately sinks to the bottom of the political ladder with little chance of ascending. The testimony of the witness in a court of justice is nearly destroyed by prevarication, in consequence of which, should it amount to contradiction, the strong, but just arm of the law, lays its physical grasp upon him for perjury. What moral punishment, then, Messrs. Editors, is due to the writer, who, forgetful of his respect to his readers, and unmindful of the cause of truth, dares to insult the public by taking in vain the name of science under the specious garb of a professor, and who, thrusting himself forward as an historian, palms upon the community opinions which, according to his own showing, have arisen from the "servility of flattery?" Yet such are the humiliating confessions of Germanicus, as proved by his own language.

We lay before our readers the sentiments he has expressed touching the musical qualities of two ladies, contrasting them with his more recent effusions on the same subject; and we submit that should he in future feel inclined to venture into print, as he threatens, he will act prudently to change the signature of Germanicus.

"Mrs. Austin may be considered a singer to the heart; Madame Feron is one of the greatest to the fancy."

Contrast this comparison, which is in favour of Mrs. Austin, with the following:

"B. attempts to designate the actual qualities in which Madame Feron does excel, and contrasts her with Mrs. Austin. This is too much. It will create a smile even on the face of the gravest musician."

Quere. Would not the "gravest musician" be more inclined to smile at the contradictions of the sapient writer?

We now revert to the subjoined highly complimentary paragraph from the pen of this consistent gentleman:

"The delightful soothing cantabile of Mrs. Austin in 'Angels ever bright and fair,' is a qualification as uncommon as it is difficult to be imitated."

After this honey comes the following gall, which will serve as a specimen of the writer's usual lucid way of expressing himself, and form at the same time the strongest comment on the sincerity of his assertions and the accuracy of his opinions. Speaking of the same lady's musical capacities, he observes:

"Reputation is commonly lost where it was never deserved, and was conferred at first not by the suffrages of criticism, but by the fondness of friendship, and the servility of flattery."

Now a writer who can first term an artist inimitable, and immediately afterwards infamous, is a literary cannibal, devouring his own offspring, eating his own words, and swallowing his own sentiments.

When Germanicus can shake off this load of glaring contradiction, or when he can make up his mind to apologize to the public and to his publisher for thus libelling common sense, he may venture future visitations upon their good nature; until then we suspect that he will find the world too intelligent to be imposed upon. In conclusion, as Germanicus has quoted a scrap of Latin, found in most school-boy's horn books, we present him with the following uncommon Welch apothegm as exceedingly applicable to his writings:

"Rêdic on dâk hâk lla," which, roughly translated into the vernacular, means "All talk and no cider!"

FARE THEE WELL!

WORDS BY LORD BYRON.—MUSIC BY MOZART.

Moderato.

Fare thee well! and if for e - ver, Still for e - ver fare thee well! E'en tho' un - for - giv - ing p Dolce.

ne-ver 'Gainst thee shall my heart re - bel, 'Gainst thee shall my heart re - bel. Would that breast were bared be-fore thee,

Where thy head so oft has lain, While that pla-cid sleep came o'er thee, Which thou ne'er canst know a - gain, Which thou ne'er canst know a - gain.

SECOND VERSE.

Though the world for this commend thee—
Though it smile upon the blow,
E'en its praises must offend thee,
Founded on another's woe;
Though my many faults defaced me,
Could no other arm be found
Than the one which once embraced me
To inflict a cureless wound?

THIRD VERSE.

And when thou wouldst solace gather,
When our child's first accents flow,
Wilt thou teach her to say "father?"
Though his care she must forego!
When her little hands shall press thee—
When her lip to thine is prest—
Think of him whose pray'r shall bless thee—
Think of him thy love has blest.

FOURTH VERSE.

Should her lineaments resemble
Those thou never more mayst see,
Then thy heart will softly tremble
With a pulse yet true to me.
All my faults perchance thou knowest—
All my madness—none can know—
All my hopes—where'er thou goest—
Whither—yet with thee they go.

FIFTH VERSE.

But 'tis done—all words are idle—
Words from me are vainlier still;
But the thoughts we cannot bridle,
Force their way without the will.
Fare thee well!—thus disunited—
Torn from every nearer tie—
Sear'd in heart—and lone—and blighted—
More than this, I scarce can die.

NUMBER VII.

OBSCURITY OF LANGUAGE.—The three great causes of that obscurity which so frequently occurs in expressing our ideas, are indistinctness in the object, imperfection in the organ of perception, and the inadequateness of language to paint the precise shade of meaning we wish to convey. Either we do not clearly distinguish the object, or it is in itself dim and confused in its dimensions; or lastly, no language is copious enough to express exactly what we think and feel without addition or diminution.

THE STARS AND THE LAMP.—Men who are always running after unattainable pleasures and neglecting those within their reach, may be compared to astronomers contemplating the stars through a telescope, regardless of the more useful lamp that burns at their side.

THE BALTIC.—The waters of the Baltic are said by the modern Swedish geographers, to sink half an inch every year. If so, it accounts for the ancients calling Scandinavia the great islands. If the waters of the Baltic have sunk at this rate since the days of Mela, Pliny, and Tacitus, much of the low land in the neighbourhood must have been covered with the sea, and only the eminences visible.

CAUTION.—The blind should always move slowly, for it is better to grope our way where there is no danger than to fall over a precipice for want of groping.

OUT-DOOR TALKERS.—The frogs of Seryphus, an island of the Ægean sea, resembled some great talkers I have known. They were always silent at home, but when carried to other places, were the most noisy frogs in the world.

RELIGIOUS ARGUMENTS.—To enforce the doctrines of christianity by argument at this time of day, puts me in mind of Homer investing the invulnerable Achilles with armour.

THE DIFFERENCE.—The great difference between a tippler and his bottle, is, that the former is apt to fall when full, the latter when empty.

CONTRADICTION.—To contradict a man in argument is to knock at his door to see if there is anybody at home.

PROOF POSITIVE.

"You've broke your faith with me," says Sal to Ned;
"You swore you'd cleave to me till I was dead."
"Tis true," quoth Ned, "I might have once said so,
But she said it to died long ago."
"Tis false," cried Sal, enraged, and broke his head—
"I'll soon convince you I am not quite dead."

TIT FOR TAT.

A saucy blockhead once said to a maid.
"Your children will be fools, I'm sore afraid."
"No doubt they will," replied the little shrew,
"If I am fool enough to marry you."

EARLY LOVE AND CONSTANCY.

BY J. INMAN.

"When first the youthful bosom knows
Love's flame, it wanders never!
Deep in the heart the passion glows,
We love and love for ever."—Old song improved.

EDWARD CROSBY was the son of an English gentleman, who was himself a younger son of a noble family, and held a command of some importance in the Eastern India. Edward was an only child, and his father was a man of education and understanding, and a widower; there is nothing very surprising, therefore, in the fact, that when the boy had attained his seventh year he was sent to be educated in England, under the care of a maternal uncle. He was now nineteen, and rather handsome; somewhat dark in complexion, but with very white teeth, and hair like the finest brown silk, but far more glossy. If there was a fault to be found with his personal appearance, it was that he was a little too short, and slightly inclined to be corpulent. As to his character, that was rather more difficult of description: he was of a sanguine temperament; at least so one of his uncle's friends assured me, (a great philosopher and profound physiologist,) but I could never distinctly understand what he meant by the expression. Edward was undoubtedly a boy of very warm feelings; but then, like most boys of his age, he had but little knowledge of the nature of those feelings, and was very apt to fancy them extremely different, both in quality and quantity, from what they actually were. By way of illustration of which proposition, I merely mention en passant, that he had already found within himself, at different epochs, an irresistible, unchangeable, and ineradicable predilection for each and every of the six professions included in the range of his meditations upon the subject of his course of life, to wit, the army, the navy, law, physic, divinity, and doing nothing. He was very warm-hearted and affectionate, and was not headstrong; which last was considered a favorable point in his character. But I see that I shall never succeed in this delineation by negatives and affirmatives; let me, then, call phenology to my aid; a science which was not, indeed, in esse at the time of which I am writing; but in which I most religiously believe. I never measured his organs, for the simple reason that I never dreamed of his having any; but if I had, I am sure that benevolence would have been found large, and also love of approbation; self-esteem rather full; (Edward had not in his inmost soul a very bad opinion of himself;) combativeness moderately developed, but destructiveness scarcely perceptible, and firmness dreadfully diminutive—here was the weak point in his organization. How often have I thought within myself, "if the poor boy had but had my firmness, (five inches and seventenths by the craniometer,) how much happier he might have been; not but that he was happy enough and good enough, but then he might have been so much happier! As to the intellectual protuberances, no great fault was to be found with them; but I need not stop to describe them, for the name that I have given to my story is not that of a faculty.

Edward Crosby's life had been one of pleasantness for the last twelve years, for his uncle was rich, easy, and affectionate; his tutor not too difficult to please, and his occupations pretty much such as he chose to make them. He was not given to dissipation, and he had time and money enough to devote to the pursuit of pleasure in his own way. It must be acknowledged that his desires were not immoderate; so long as he had liberty to wander about the country, seeking out silent and lonely places, where he might indulge in the vague and aimless reveries that are exceedingly apt to infest the imaginations of susceptible boys, who have nothing to drag them back from the world of ideality to the world of fact, he had no longings for less excusable indulgences. Since the secret must be told, however, if his wanderings for the last six months had been closely looked into, I am not prepared to say that a more distinct and limited form had not within that period been given to his day-dreams.

Be that fact as it may, a change of some nature was now about to intervene, for a few days after Edward had attained his nineteenth year a letter from his father had recalled him to Bombay. The preparations for his departure were completed, and the very evening which I had selected for the exercise of that supernatural power by which all writers are enabled to accompany unseen their heroes, was the last of his abiding at Silverhay; on the morrow he was to depart for London, there to pass a week before sailing for India.

About a quarter before nine, then, (for I like to be particular,) on the evening of the seventeenth of June, 1790, did Edward Crosby make his exit, but very quietly, from his uncle's mansion, attended only by his favourite pointer dog, and followed, though utterly ignorant of that fact, by me, the writer of this narrative; my readers will be kind enough to receive this information without skepticism or inquiry, for I do not feel disposed at present to divulge the secret of my invisibility. It was a lovely moonlight night; and if his mind had not been too completely engrossed by one object to allow of any observation of the unpretending natural beauties that were lavished around him, he would no doubt, like me, have noticed with admiration the softened loveliness of the scene through which he was so hastily passing. His uncle's dwelling was the principal mansion of Silverhay, and the first which met the stranger upon entering that beautiful village; at the other extremity was the parish church, a gothic building of unusual size, in the form of a cross, with a noble square tower, containing a complete peal of exquisitely toned bells; between these edifices lay the village; but my companion, whether tempted by the beauty of the night to extend his solitary walk, or desirous to avoid observation, made a detour of the whole intervening space, and chose to follow the path which accompanied the diminutive but lovely river that skirted the village on its northern side. An hour's walking brought us to a low-roofed, ample, and antique-looking building, surrounded by a grove of magnificent oaks, and guarded from intrusion by a thick-set hedge of the most luxuriant privet. A light was burning in one room only, at the very extremity of the mansion, and an attentive observer might have caught glimpses of a female form that came at intervals to the open window, and as often withdrew, with slow and lingering steps, as if disappointed in its gaze. She was a pretty fairy creature of sweet sixteen, extremely small and delicate in person, with bright blue eyes, and flaxen hair descending in ringlets of living gold upon her ivory neck and shoulders, and a face beaming with sincerity and light-heartedness. Yet I must confess that she was by no means perfect, for her stature was but four feet ten; and she knew nothing—except a little music, a little drawing, and various unnameable accomplishments in needle-work. Her constant occupation was the pursuit of pleasure; her only study how and where she might find amusement. She was good enough notwithstanding, for she hated nobody, and would not willingly do harm to anything; she was docile, affectionate, and credulous; lively, good-natured, and indolent. For my own part, I could not bring myself to think her exactly handsome, but there was unquestionably something attractive about her; whether it was her youth and freshness, or a want of art, or the playful expression of her fine bright eyes; or whether it was not, after all, that I and Master Edward had nothing else to do but fall in love, and that Helena Minturn was the only being, just at that juncture, within reach, with whom we could have fallen in love without the imputation of insanity; most certain it is, that I could not look upon her without that involuntary emotion of kindness which the presence of beauty is said to be able always to excite, and that he was enamoured beyond all computation or comparison. I have said that Edward was a handsome boy; indeed, from the description already given of his mind and person, it will not appear surprising that Helena's little heart beat responsively to the tumultuous throbbings of his own; or, in plainer English, that she was as far gone as he in la belle passion; more especially when it is considered that he was the only idle, gentlemanlike, and romantic personage in that most matter-of-fact and worldly neighbourhood; and that unless for him, it was utterly impossible that the young lady could be supposed to tolerate the idea of a sensation without a most grievous impeachment of her taste and discrimination.

I might, if I thought proper, detain, if not amuse, my readers with a long and perhaps very interesting history of the origin of their acquaintance and their passion; how she was walking in the grove; how he was shooting, or trying to shoot grouse; how they met, and meeting looked, and looking blushed, and blushing sighed, and sighing loved; but all this to relate would be too troublesome, and besides has nothing on earth to do with my story. It is sufficient that all the old women of the village said they were made for each other, (or would have said so if they had thought about it,) and that now they met by appointment to take a tender and heart-rending farewell.

"Edward," murmured a soft subduing voice, "have you come at last? How I have wished and waited for you!"

In a moment his arm was round the maiden's slender waist, and they were seated beside each other on the sofa. As he spoke her classical little head fell upon his shoulder, and the small white hand that clung so fondly to his, trembled in its clasp.

"Oh! that my father were here," exclaimed he, "that he might gaze upon thee while I revealed to him the secret of our bosoms! Could he refuse his consent to that union which would constitute our happiness, and meet the pleading glance of those dear dovelike eyes? I know the plans that he has formed for me, of wealth and splendor; but what are they if purchased with the heart's repose? He would wed me to the daughter of his friend, and she is the envied mistress of thousands; but thou, in thy beautiful humility and thy unostentatious charms art dearer to my soul than all the riches of that hated India to which I am banished from thy presence."

"What dreadful meaning lies in your words? Has your father then selected!—Does he intend to bestow your hand upon another?"

"Calm your fears; such is indeed his desire; but he is kind and reasonable, and when I disclose to him the truth he will not oppose my wishes. But even should he, I will never be another's; my constant heart can know no change."

But I do not perceive any particularly excellent and convincing reason why I should betray more of the secrets of that last meeting; any lady or gentleman of reasonably acute sensibilities and the least experience, can easily conceive the remainder of the dialogue, and for such as have not those facilities I need only observe, that it was composed of materials exactly similar to the portion which I have allowed myself to give; (and which, by the way, I have given merely to show what exquisite nonsense men and women can utter when love has stolen away their brains, and think it the perfection of all earthly eloquence and wisdom;) there were consolations, sighs, protestations, vows, and kisses, and at the last, the trying moment of "farewell," no lack of tears. I can afford no further information, but that at about one o'clock in the morning of the eighteenth of June, 1790, I (still invisible) accompanied master Edward Crosby to his uncle's mansion for the last time, and saw him safe in bed. And now, with permission, I intend to take leave of this sorrow-stricken pair of lovers for some eighteen years, which may be supposed to have been passed by them, just as my readers may think proper to imagine. In the mean time I have another scene to introduce.

It was a bright and bracing morning of December, in the year of grace 1808; the ground was enveloped in a thick mantle of snow, and a sharp wind was blowing piercingly, so that notwithstanding the brilliant glare of sunshine that gleamed and was reflected dazzlingly upon the white and glittering surface, no man of sense and reasonable delicacy of feeling could have hesitated for a moment to give preference to the in-door comforts of a snug back-room and a sea-coal fire, over all the pleasures that the most felicitous and luxuriant imagination could discover in a ride or ramble. The scene of which my readers are now to be spectators was precisely such as they, or at least I, would have selected for a locality; it was a comfortable parlour in a small but cheerful dwelling; a glorious fire was blazing royally in the polished grate, and before it on a soft and downy rug, reposed the graceful form of a fire-loving Angola cat of unequalled beauty; a work-table occupied the centre of the apartment, at which sat a smiling rosy matron who bore her four and thirty years as though they were but five and twenty; her plump and comfortable fingers were engaged in knitting; beside her was a youthful Hebe, just budding into her teens, too palpably a fac-simile of her companion, except in years and size, to be mistaken for any other than her daughter; a curly headed boy of some eight years' growth was zealously engaged in building card castles on the floor, and from a cradle in one corner might be heard the soft and placid breathing of an infant. One only ornament adorned the mantel-piece; it was the portrait of a gentleman in canonicals, of perhaps forty, with a round good-natured face, black eyes, and smiling mouth, the very beau idéal of a respectable and contented English country clergyman; upon the opposite wall was suspended a slight sketch in water colors of a youth of fifteen, who might be guessed without a Yankee's gift, to be the son of that other portrait's original.

The lady into whose presence we have thus unceremoniously entered, was conversing with her companion, and, as it seemed, their discourse was of former days.

"Our passion," said the matron, "was indeed a childish freak. I was but little past your age, a foolish, ignorant, thoughtless girl, and Edward was an idle boy oppressed with want of occupation, and knowing as little of himself as even I. He loved, or fancied he loved me, and I was enamoured to distraction. I often have a hearty laugh in thinking over our parting scene."

"Was it very tender, mother?"

"Oh, very; we sighed and vowed and wept. I sometimes wonder how we escaped committing the most foolish thing on earth—a secret marriage; but the fact is, I believe, that we were too innocent and simple to think of such a step."

"How old was he, mother?"

"But nineteen, and I was three years younger; but childish as we were, our passion was desperate enough for any thing. Who would have thought that such a beginning would have had an end like this, or rather, what would we have thought, had it been predicted to us?"

The conversation was at this moment interrupted by the entrance of the reverend original of the portrait that adorned the mantel-piece; his great coat and overshoes were white with snow, and his ears and nose deeply purpled with the cold. His kind-hearted and affectionate helpmate hastened to disencumber him of his outward integuments, his daughter brought a pair of slippers, and the architectural urchin lugged, with a mighty exertion of strength, a huge arm-chair before the blazing fire; and when all these attentions to his comfort had been paid, and his reverence was satisfactorily established, he produced a package from his pocket, and threw it on the table with the benevolent look of a man who has taken trouble to provide for the pleasure of others, and whose pains are sure to be rewarded—at least with thanks.

"There, Helen," said he, "there is a famous bundle of papers for you; and now, Charlotte, my daughter, bring me a glass of cider; my walk to the village has made me thirsty."

The rosy-cheeked lassie ran to minister to her father's wishes, and our old acquaintance Helena Minturn, for she indeed it was, although somewhat increased in stature, after glancing hastily over one of the papers, placed it with a smile of peculiar meaning in her husband's hands, and pointed to a paragraph, the sight of which appeared to amuse him equally. It was this:

"Married at Chingalore, on the twelfth of September last, Sir Edward Crosby, K. C. B. to the amiable Lady Dorothy Harrup, widow of the late David Harrup, Esq. of Calcutta; the distinguished bridegroom receives by this marriage an accession to his already splendid fortune, of nearly half a million of rupees. It is confidently reported, that the nephew of the bride is shortly to lead to the hymeneal altar, the fair and accomplished daughter of Sir Edward by his former lady."

MYTHOLOGY.

THE MONTH OF APRIL, IN NEW-YORK.

This is the season of smiles and tears, showers and sunshine, melting glances and chilling frowns. Miss April, we all know, is a pale, timid, weak-nerved, coquettish sort of a fair one, who weeps and laughs by turns, without rhyme or reason; and is, not unfrequently, to be caught smiling through her tears. Every pearly drop she sheds, however, is miraculously converted into verdant leaves and bright-tinted flowers, to decorate her blushing sister, who follows close at her heels; or, as some nameless bard of antiquity has expressed the same beautiful idea,

"April showers produce May flowers."

April, like all her sister months, is distinguished by several characteristic peculiarities. Her very entrance on the stage is attended by one extraordinary circumstance, for which philosophers have vainly endeavoured to account; for, instead of paying reverence, like a good christian, to any of the canonized fraternity, she makes her first courtesy to a far more numerous class of mere every-day mortals. Instead of paying her earliest respects, like her predecessor March, to some particular saint; or, like her immediate successor, May, to two saints; or, like the russet-robed November, to all-saints, Miss April, most irreverently and eccentrically, lavishes her first smiles (or tears, as the case may be) on fools alone! and they are all fools who believe her smiles sincere. For even this gentle, timid girl, "can smile, and smile, and murder while she smiles," having the address to induce a premature change of apparel, which, at this season, too often injures the health, and sometimes destroys life.

To be serious, however, the absurd custom, which almost universally prevails, of attempting to make our friends appear ridiculous on the first day of April, has, we believe, never yet been satisfactorily accounted for, notwithstanding all the speculation it has excited among the learned. To throw a ray of light on the mist in which this momentous subject is enveloped, some writers have gravely referred us to the fourth verse of the tenth chapter of the book of Esther. Others, again, have directed us to Lemprier's Dictionary, under the proper name Sumstultus; and a third class have pretended that a clew to the mystery may be found in the six hundred and thirty-sixth number of Addison's Spectator. For our own part we agree with neither, being satisfied that the following supposition possesses at least as much plausibility and reason as any other we have yet seen. We forget the author, and quote from memory:

"It is well known that the year formerly began (as to some purposes and in some respects) on the twenty-fifth of March, now commonly called the annunciation; and it is equally certain that the commencement of a new year, at whatever time it occurred, was always esteemed and celebrated as a high festival in every age, and almost every country, by the ancient Romans as well as the modern christians. The great festivals of the Romans, however, were usually attended with an octave; that is, they continued eight days, of which the first and last were the principals. Hence it follows, that the first day of April, being the octave of the twenty-fifth of March, was the close or ending of that feast; and, consequently, a day of extraordinary mirth and festivity, particularly among the lower orders, who are apt sometimes to pervert and make a bad use of institutions which might have been originally very laudable in themselves."

At the present time, however, the first day of April, among several religious sects, is devoted to more solemn and rational purposes than playing the fool, it being the "feast of the pass-over" with the jews, and "Good Friday with the christians"—the last day but one of the fast called lent, which precedes the festival of Easter. The latter word is derived from Easten, a goddess of the Saxons, in honour of whom sacrifices were offered about this time of the year.

Nor is April, with all her volatility and fickleness of disposition, altogether regardless of saints. The fourth day is inscribed to St. Ambrose, archbishop of Milan: a man eminent for his zeal in the cause of christianity, for his learning, and for the noble severity with which he censured and corrected the emperor Theodosius, who had barbarously ordered several innocent persons to be put to death at Thessalonica. He is said to have composed the celebrated thanksgiving ode, so often chanted in catholic countries on occasions of public rejoicing, called "Te Deum." The twenty-third day of this month is sacred to George, one of the seven champions of Christendom, and the tutelar saint of England; a knight-errant, who was celebrated for many marvellous feats of chivalry, one of which was his desperate combat with a dreadful, fiery, flying dragon, covered with impenetrable scales, like the monsters of the Nile. In this encounter George like to have met with his match, and might have said, as England's modern champion did of Buonaparte at Waterloo, that he "never came so near getting beaten" in all his life. The dragon, not to speak irreverently, was a deuce of a fellow, and the saint had a hard tug to overcome him. But he fixed him at last, and pinned him to the earth with his spear, as any one who doubts the truth of the story may be convinced, if he is lucky enough to obtain a little coin, called a sovereign, on which is a striking and correct representation of the combat, with the death of the dragon, "drawn from life." The twenty-fifth is ascribed to another saint, of a less militant but more literary character.

This month is distinguished also by several important historical events, a few of which shall be mentioned. The first meeting of congress under the federal constitution took place on the first day of April, 1789. The celebrated doctor's mob, as it was called, in which three persons lost their lives, occurred in this city on the thirteenth of April, 1788. Shakspeare was borne on the sixteenth, and died on the twenty-third; Franklin died on the seventeenth; the battle of Lexington took place on the nineteenth; and the revolutionary war, of which that battle was the commencement, terminated on the same day, eight years afterwards, when Washington issued a proclamation, declaring a cessation of hostilities.

On the twentieth of this month the sun enters that sign of the zodiac which astronomers term Taurus:

The golden-horned bull, which so gallantly bore
The lovely Europa to Crete's happy shore.

This lady they call Europa, it seems, was no less a personage than the daughter of a king—a princess of Phœnicia; and so very beautiful, that, among numerous other admirers, Jupiter himself (who, in many respects, resembled Charles the second of England) became enamoured of her; and, like some modern lovers, determined on an elopement, or rather an abduction. For this purpose, he thought it would be advisable to assume the form of some animal, which, without exciting her suspicions, would be capable of conveying his intended prize to a great distance from her father's court. The golden-fleeced ram had been immolated on the altar of Mars, and Europa was perhaps too timid to travel on horseback. The lover, therefore, finally hit upon an entire new character, and succeeded in carrying her off in the form of a beautiful milk-white ruminating animal of that species to which the ancient Egyptians paid divine honors: a class, to the females of which we are now indebted for Goshen butter, Cheshire cheese, milk-punch, and vaccination.

The ancients certainly had some strange whims, though our colleges wont permit a boy to become a scholar without them. But there is no accounting for tastes, so with this sage remark we will take leave of mythology for the present.

The entrance of "bright Phœbus" into this sign of the zodiac, though not the nominal, is the actual commencement of spring; agreeably to the language of the inimitable Thomson, in his description of the vernal season. After alluding to the fickleness of the weather during the month of March and the early part of April, he thus proceeds:

"At last from Aries rolls the bounteous sun,
And the bright Bull receives him. Thien no more
The expansive atmosphere is cramp'd with cold;
But, full of life and vivifying soul,
Flies the bright clouds sublime, and spreads them thin,
Fleecy and white, o'er all surrounding heaven.
Forth fly the tepid airs; and, unconfin'd,
Unbinding earth, the moving softness strays.
Joyous, the impatient husbandman perceives
Reclining nature, and his busy steers
Drives from their stalls, to where the well-used plough
Lies in the furrow, loosened from the frost.
There, unrefusing to the harness'd yoke
They lend their shoulder, and begin their toil."

April in the city of New-York, however, differs, materially from the same month in any other part of the world. Here one half of the population are busily employed in making preparations to abandon their present domicils, and seek for peace and happiness in "others that they know not of;" while the rest are posting their books, and making out their bills for the current quarter's rent, dreaming of landlord's warrants, sheriff's sales, and bank stock. Many who are compelled to remove by an iniquitous increase of rent, a curtailment of present privileges, or an inability to fulfill their contracts, are still anxiously, and perhaps unsuccessfully, seeking for new tenements. The wives and daughters of those unfortunates (sometimes accompanied by the husband himself) travel through the streets from "blushing morn till dewy eve," prying into all the domestic mysteries of their neighbors, whose houses happen to be "to let."

We have said that the very entré of April is attended with some extraordinary circumstances; what then shall we say of her exit?—as respects the good citizens of Gotham:

The busy matron and her daughters ply
With peevish fretfulness their annual task.
Down come the bedsteads, tumbled in the yard,
Where hot ablutions drive their tenants out,
And take their lives for rent. The mirrors next,
And all the pictures, with their dusty frames,
Are loosened from the walls, to grace the floor.
Now thickly strewn with broken glasses round:
Baskets of crockery, tables, stands, and chairs,
And all the nameless lumber, conjured forth,
Of garret, cellar, pantry, and the rest.

* * * * *
'Tis expectation all—the curtain soon
Will rise upon a busy, noisy scene:
Like as, perhaps, old Goshen erst displayed,
When every family at once removed.

RECIFE FOR NEVER GROWING OLD.

Keep always in the sun in summer, and all winter in the wet; never go to bed at night, and sleep all day; fret at every thing that comes across you; eat your meat cold, and drink nothing but whiskey; meddle in every body's business, and you may be sure you will never live to grow old. L.

THE FINE ARTS.

EXHIBITION AT THE ARCADE BATHS.

We have published a description of Mr. Dunlap's great picture of the "attack on the Louvre, July 1830," and our opinion of the artist and his work. We will now proceed to notice the very valuable collection of paintings by the old masters which, with the above mentioned historical composition, forms the present exhibition at the Arcade Baths.

Mr. Macgavin has brought together more fine and truly original specimens of the Italian, Spanish, and Flemish schools than have yet been presented to the public of New-York, except, perhaps, by Mr. Abrams. We say perhaps; because although Mr. Abrams displayed, and under very favorable circumstances, more originals by old masters, he did not show us one of the higher or historical order, of such merit as at least four of Mr. Macgavin's. In landscape he had a decided advantage in possessing the Ruysdaal. We will mention in detail some of the best of this truly excellent collection.

No. 1. A cattle piece, by Rosa de Tivoli. We know of but one other production by this master in the country, and of none superior to this.

No. 5. Lady and Trumpeter delivering a letter, by Terborgh. The high finish, true drawing, and beautiful drapery, must recommend it to every eye. The heads are very fine.

No. 6. The Magi offering gifts to the Infant Savior, by Rubens. This is one of the noblest compositions of that great master; whether it was ever painted by him on a larger scale we do not recollect. It is rich in coloring, and the disposition of the lights and groups evince a masterly knowledge and the true feeling of genius.

No. 9. Is in true Flemish style, but well painted and possessing humor.

No. 11. A very valuable small landscape.

No. 13. Game piece, by B. de Brie. Whether original or not, this picture will recompense the spectator for a long and minute attention. The drawing is good, the coloring admirable, and the whole skilfully composed.

No. 14. Called in the catalogue, "Portraits of Isabella and Columbus," and attributed to Velasquez. It is far superior to that shown as a Velasquez by Mr. Abrams. The heads are both fine, but that of the man is of the very first order. If we could feel assured that it was a portrait of Columbus, it would add much to its value; but merely as a picture, it will delight every person of taste.

No. 16. Christ bound. Said to be by Guido. A noble piece, whoever was the master.

No. 17. Flowers. These subjects are not generally interesting; yet we must be pleased to see that well imitated on canvass which delights us in nature. The perfume is wanted with flowers, as the roar of mighty waters is looked for from the cataract of Niagara.

No. 22. Last Supper, by Guido. This was probably intended as an altar piece. The head of the Savior is beautiful and sublime in the expression. Every part of the picture is full of the grace of Guido, and he was the painter most favored by the graces. This is to be studied, and the young artist will be well rewarded for the closest examination.

No. 26. Landscape, by Salvator Rosa. In the collection of Mr. Abrams, now in England, and before referred to, the landscapes were the best, and yet the Claude was a copy. Not so in Mr. Macgavin's exhibition; historical painting with him takes the lead, but No. 26 may vie with any thing of the same style. It has the peculiar charm of the very powerful master to whom it is ascribed.

No. 31. The Poultry Yard is a delightful piece.

No. 32. Portrait, by Rembrandt, said to be of himself. This is a fair specimen of the manner of one of the greatest painters. His style is well known from engravings, and by this undoubted original the untravelled American may judge of his unrivalled excellence.

No. 38. Is better than any landscape of Mr. Abrams, the Ruysdaal excepted. Let the spectator mark the true making out of the objects in the foreground, (even the herbage) and the noble disdain of false show which has made the artist throw a mantle of shadow over the whole, and keep as in nature his light for the sky.

No. 38. St. Peter. Every one will acknowledge the excellence of this piece.

No. 46. Is the Adoration of the Shepherds, by Murillo. We are apt to associate with the name of this artist scenes of low life, similar to that exhibited at the old almshouse last year, under the patronage of the directors of the American Academy. Though the subject was disgusting, the skill shown by the painter was admirable, and nature was faithfully copied by an able hand. The Murillo now exhibited by Mr. Macgavin, is as noble in subject as it is sublime in conception and masterly in composition. The upper part of the sky appears to have been re-painted owing to some injury, but the body of the picture is sound, and the heads incomparably fine. The countenance of the virgin, whose eyes are lifted towards a choir of cherubim, glows with an expression almost divine. The other figures are only inferior as they are subordinate in character. When we see, as we are informed we soon shall, the fine collection made by Richard Mead, Esq. in Spain, and which, though rejected by the old Academy, will be exhibited in Clinton hall, after the annual exhibition of the National Academy, we may perhaps look upon a Murillo equal to this Adoration of the Shepherds; heretofore we have never seen one that can compare with it.

ON THE PERFORMANCE OF SACRED MUSIC.

We consider it to be one of the duties of the press to guard the interests of music, rapidly progressing as that delightful science evidently is in the city of New-York. In fulfilling this task, just and unbiassed criticism of artists and compositions, and an exposure of the erroneous opinions printed by superficial critics upon the subject, are indispensable. If this censorship be deemed essential in Europe, where precedent is common, and the rules of musical criticism are distinctly laid down by undoubted authorities, it is clear that watchfulness is more essential on the part of the press in America, in the absence of those precedents and those tested critics who preside over good taste elsewhere. We consider that Shakespeare, Milton, and other giants of English literature, are the property of Americans by inheritance—that such men as Byron, Scott, and Moore belong not exclusively to England, but to the English language; and this principle is also extended to those musicians who have established a glorious school of music in England, inferior to none. We allude, in thus strongly expressing ourselves, to the sacred music of the protestant church, from the time of King Henry the Eighth to the present moment. If then we claim among numerous composers a Purcell and a Handel, and rejoice in their writings, it is surely but reasonable that we should endeavour to secure for the performance of their works the same advantages which are bestowed upon them in England; and we cannot too forcibly impress upon our readers that a close adherence to the rules laid down by the great artists who are in possession of the orchestras and organ-lofts of that country, is the surest mode of arriving at perfection in this. Acting on the above principles, we have now to offer a few remarks on some opinions which we have lately read touching the performance of sacred music, and which opinions appear to have a tendency to mislead us from the path of good taste. The following specimen is from a critique on the late oratorio at St. Paul's, and signed Musæus:

"Madame Brichta sang Handel's 'Rejoice greatly.' Her style was that of Handel, save only that evidence of bad taste, a shake, the common-place appeal to the galleries of a theatre, but one out of place in the more exalted and refined music of the church and oratorio!"

The writer goes on to doubt the existence of the shake in Ciani-chettini's bravura, but excuses himself from a decided opinion because the music is not before him, and therefore he is not quite sure whether the fair vocalist or the composer has committed this horrible faux pas. Now it is somewhat strange that Musæus did not contemplate the possible existence of a trifling mistake on his own part; but if he will do us the favor to peruse any decent edition of Handel's works, in the absence of the full score of the Messiah, say Corfe's or Clarke's edition, he will there find shakes enough to give him an ague in his present state of mind; and we must add to his distress by acquainting him that without the said shake there exists no possibility of bringing the song, "Rejoice greatly," to any thing like a decent or effective conclusion. We subjoin the following cadence of the song in question, which we think will prove conclusive to any moderately informed musician as to the necessity of using this embellishment, supported by the fact that Handel so wrote it.

The above example is descriptive of the cadences with which Handel usually concludes his songs. We have now shown that the shake is to be found in "Rejoice greatly," but we have only mentioned a single instance, when in fact it will be very difficult to select sixteen bars of that song without meeting one. But as the writer, Musæus, insists upon it that the shake is "an evidence of bad taste," "out of place in refined and exalted music," had he not better bring forth a new edition of Handel, and thus immortalize himself by correcting that writer's vulgarities? Suppose he commence with the allegro penseroso, and give us "Sweet bird" divested of the shake: such an improvement might meet with others of the same sort to keep it countenance; for instance, we once were fortunate enough, at Boston, to inspect a printed copy of Haydn's chorus from the Creation, "The praise of God," in which the words were altered thus, instead of "The praise of God and of the second day," some worthy gentleman had inserted "The praise of God and of his only son;" and we believe that a similar judicious alteration is to be met with in an edition of Handel's chorusses published here. The improvement we allude to is in a chorus from Judas Maccabeus, "Hail Judea, happy land;" the compiler has there most patriotically interpolated "Columbia" for Judea, thus recording forever evidence of this country's felicity. The shake is an ornament in which no mediocrity is endurable—it ought to be perfect, or ought not to be used: but when clear and distinct, it is the most chaste and appropriate embellishment for English sacred music, and although in dramatic, and especially Italian music, it may be more easily dispensed with, yet in the church and at oratorios it is indispensable. We make this assertion with the more confidence because Musæus quotes the oratorios in London, and professes to be acquainted with the performance of sacred music in England; we therefore can call to his particular attention the following great examples of vocalists who have raised an imperishable name by their mode of executing sacred music.

Bartleman, whose majesty of style and splendid musical oratory, have justly caused him to be esteemed the best representative of Handel, used the shake in almost every cadence. Henry Philipps closely follows his example. These two gentlemen, in chastity of style and as examples for bass singers, are placed in the foremost rank. The late Mr. Harrison has handed down the same embellishment to Vaughan, Braham, and W. Knyvett, who all use it. Mara and Billington transmitted it to Salmon, Stevens, and Paton. And these distinguished vocalists continually delight the most fastidious assemblages of persons at the ancient concerts, the oratorios, and the musical festivals held in places of worship, by a display of this libelled embellishment.

At those great seminaries for musicians, St. Paul's cathedral, Westminster Abbey, the Chapel Royal, and in all the cathedral churches in England the shake is taught, and used as an appropriate ornament for the church service. It may be heard under the superintendence of an Attwood, a Greatorex, a Crotch, a Clarke, and a Camidge—in anthems of thanksgivings, and in those of mourning for the dead. On the death of George the Third, Kent's anthem of "Hear my prayer," was sung in the course of the funeral service, the duet and solos by Masters Marshall and Gear.* We were not present, but we perused the papers of the day, which spoke of their pathos and skill. At the oratorios at the patent theatres of the same season, this anthem was sung by the same boys, in consequence of the effect produced by them at the king's funeral, and we then had the satisfaction of hearing them: their shake, we beg leave to add, was not the least prominent part of the performance. At the funeral of the great American artist, Benjamin West, at St. Paul's cathedral, the anthem "Lord let me know mine end," by Green, was sung; and in the beautiful duet the shake of both the choristers pealed through that gigantic building with extraordinary effect.

We could enlarge on this subject ad infinitum; but we have said more than sufficient, we think, to prove to Musæus that he has made an assertion somewhat too hastily, and that the charge of bad taste with which he has (perhaps unconsciously) assailed the very first vocal authorities in the world, is not with justice to be preferred against Madame Brichta, who has only followed in their footsteps, as we conceive correctly, and with good taste. B.

* The song, "Sweet bird," is written apparently for the express purpose of introducing the shake in all its variety, and is a composition now seldom heard excepting at oratorios.

* Mr. Gear, of whom mention is made above as chorister of the Chapel Royal and St. Paul's cathedral, at present holds the situation of organist at Grace church, in this city.

ORIGINAL COMMUNICATIONS.

Letters from Correspondents.

TO THE EDITORS OF THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Messrs. Editors—I was delighted with the letter in a late number of the Mirror from your fair correspondent Portia—for fair she must be, and sprightly and sensible she is, I am sure. It is a just reprehension of those who involve the beauteous belles of our city in one general censure of extravagance and dissipation. As I am under some apprehension she rather glances at me in several parts of her letter, I feel called on, as a man of honor, to defend myself from these implied charges; and I do so with the more readiness, because I can see with half an eye that your charming correspondent is one of those young ladies in whose favour I always make exceptions, in ridiculing or reprehending the follies and foibles of fashionable life.

The fair Portia, if she considers a moment, will at once recognise in my strictures an entire devotion to the sex. It is because I consider them as among the most charming ingredients in the composition of society; as the fair ministering angels of human bliss, without whose agency man can no more be happy than he could exist and have a being. It is because I regret to see so many young women, born for better, more important objects, flinging themselves away on the foaming billows of fashionable dissipation, who might, and would become the delight of the domestic fireside, as well as the charm and the life of the social circle and the sprightly ball.

It is not that I would have them live always in the chimney-corner, and devote themselves entirely to the homely acquirements of domestic life, any more than I wish them to sacrifice their hours, their health, their in-born delicacy, their usefulness, and their happiness to the unceasing pursuit of pleasure, dress, and dissipation. There is a happy, a beautiful medium between these two extremes, becoming a young woman of fashion; and which every one belonging to that class of society may easily attain. Instead of dealing in generalities, I will attempt the sketch of such a being as I have often imagined; nay, as I have seen and studied, as the master-piece of nature and art combined. The original still exists, the delight of the social circle, the ornament of fashionable life, whenever, as she sometimes does, she gives an evening to the world, in return for the civilities of that society in which she moves.

This young lady is rather refined than fashionable, that is, as fashion is at present—a mere aping of a certain style of dress, a certain style of walking, and a certain style of doing every thing; which, I must be permitted to say, is neither becoming nor graceful. She will neither adopt an extravagant, disproportioned hat or sleeve, nor shorten her garments, nor walk as if she had lost the use of her limbs, because it is the fashion; and yet, somehow or other, she is always sufficiently in the fashion not to appear unfashionable. She neither mistakes pertness for wit or noisy mirth for good humor and vivacity. She is neither a wit nor a blue stocking, still less is she ignorant and without accomplishments. In conversation you will discover, by accident as it were, that her mind is well stored with all the materials of polite knowledge; and be perfectly convinced that if she had the inclination she possesses the power not only to shine, but to be actually witty, if not severe. She dances well, yet is content sometimes to sit still and look on at a party, without appearing as if she was at a funeral; nor have I ever seen her maintain possession of the floor, to the exclusion of others, with the heroic determination of an amazon; or sit down before the dance was concluded, leaving others to dance by themselves. She never dances with a plate of eatables in her hand; or attempts to talk with her mouth full of ice-cream or pickled oysters. I never saw her waltz or dance the gallopade, to the best of my recollection.

She plays and sings with a taste, a skill, and a touching expression that I have hardly ever heard equalled; and indeed excels in all the lady-like acquirements and accomplishments, so becoming, nay so essential, to the perfection of a fine woman. But it is her manners—her simple, easy, graceful manners, that constitute, to my taste, her greatest charm. It is here that the real lady is exemplified, and not in the mere possession of a few superficial accomplishments, which any woman of the most ordinary talent, with the most ordinary application, can acquire. There is no bustle or noise about her; she receives her company, and does the honors of the house, with a sprightly ease, a careless grace, the result of long habits of good breeding, good sense, and good taste combined. She takes no pains, displays no graces to please, yet she always pleases, and nobody can exactly tell why. She is, in short, a mysterious woman; and if she were old and ugly enough, and the days of witchcraft had not gone by, would be in great danger of the ordeal.
